Meanwhile the tramps have made their way to the Black Eagle Inn, situated high up in a mountain resort, and here we find them in possession of the rooms which have been reserved for Prince Adolar. With the glamor of the diamond necklace and the aid of the 1,000-mark bill, which the tramps found again in the official clothes of the magistrate, they are enabled to lord it in new costumes, and to create with mine host the impression that they are the expected princely couple. All goes well up to the moment when the latter arrive in reality. But also in this critical situation the two tramps do not lose their presence of mind. They make a clean breast of it to the prince, who, on his part is bound to silence because he travels with a ballet girl under the assumed name of Meyer, and thus the threatening disaster is once more averted. The diamond necklace is restored to the prince, who immediately places it upon the shining neck of Mimi, and pays besides a finder's reward of 5,000 marks to the tramps. All this takes place during the preparations for the golden wedding celebration of the host of the Black Eagle. The festivities are at their height, when the magistrate, whom the longing after his sweetheart, the landlord's daughter, has led thither, appears upon the scene, and of course recognizes the tramps. Thus for the second time they are threatened with arrest. Their genius, however, does not forsake them, and once more they avoid "the heavy hand of the law," for they boldly assume the uniforms of two lieutenants, while the latter are taking a bath at the hotel. The tramps escape in this disguise, while the real prince, who travels incog., is made prisoner. All this happens in the first act. The second one merely brings the solution. The prince, who is by no means so very eager to present the ballerina with a necklace of immense value, has ordered an exact copy of it with false diamonds, from his jeweler. He meets the tramps at a masquerade ball, and asks them to get the genuine necklace back for him from its present owner, and to substitute the spurious one in its stead. This difficult task they solve brilliantly in the disguise of magicians, and they fool the vain Mimi in such amusing and funny style that the audience roared with laughter.

Ziehrer's music is not much more than an exhilarating frame embroidered around the action, and in episodes it breaks forth in approved operetta style in waltzes, marches and the usual final ensembles. It is not particularly original music. Who demands that of modern operetta anyhow? But it is well written, euphoniously orchestrated and has a certain swing and go to it that is always sure to catch the public at large. Though specifically Viennese in its character, it does not grow wearisome through the continuity and sameness of the waltz rhythms in which some other operetta composers of that school indulge themselves to a degree producing monotony. Ziehrer, however, who has become known as a good military march composer gives evidence of his not uninteresting gifts in this direction by varying the rhythms in his score through frequent introductions of common time and two step music, while at the same time he does not neglect his Viennese waltzes.

The second operetta novelty was proffered at the Theater des Westens, where Director Hofpauer, after vainly trying to rival with the Royal Opera House in producing grand opera in a more or less worthy style, seems to be drifting gradually but surely into the exclusive domain of operetta, or at best of light opera, Spieloper, as the Germans call it.

The name of the novelty is "The Débutante." The well-known "Father of the Débutante" has nothing to do with the libretto, which was constructed, or let me say misconstructed, out of Meilhac and Halévy's vaudeville "The Husband of the Débutante," into a new concoction which had the Viennese librettists H. von Waldberg and A. M. Willner for authors. They were also the parties present at the première, and came out smiling after each of the three curtain falls to thank for the applause which a not over numerous audience bestowed in a not hyper-enthusiastic fashion. The composer, however, Alfred Zamara, had stayed at home, having been prevented through illness from attending the Berlin première of his work. And yet he deserved the lion's share of the public's good will, for his music has many merits, except the one of originality. Another one, also one of a negative nature, is that Zamara refrained from co-posing, or setting to music, a good deal of what the librettists wrote down in their joint book. The jokes they attempted and the puns they perpetrated were too much for him, at least too much for utterance clad in music. What he did compose, however, shows the hand of a good musician in every way, especially in effective and yet not over elaborate orchestration. One feels in the instrumentation the experienced and trained musician who was brought up in the orchestra, for Zamara's father was for many years first harpist of the Vienna Court Opera, and his son performed upon the tympani in the same renowned body of artists. What distinguished Alfred Zamara's first operetta, however, more than the mere technical artisanship, is the fact that he holds aloof from the conventional operetta style. His is not the customary and approved dance phrase music to which the trivialities in the libretto seem to coax him, and I consider it high virtue that he was able to avoid the employment of banalities. On the other hand, he asks more of himself than he was able to fulfill, when he tries to write really dramatic music, as for instance in the third act of "The Débutante," where the intentions of the composer are manifestly of a higher order, while his themes lack pregnancy and he himself is as yet incapable of giving them the development which from a mere talented sketch would make of them a complete musico-dramatic art work.

The story of "The Débutante," in the garbled version of the above named two Viennese librettists, freed from all the clap-trap of buffoonery which they added to the French original, is shortly told as follows: Lamberthier, an employee in a savings bank at a small salary, is about to marry a conservatory girl, who loves him, but who also loves art, having made a hit as soubrette in some amateur theatricals. The marriage is about to take place, when the man who is officiating as registrar, but who is at the same time also director of an operetta troupe—in France and in operetta such things are both possible and permissible—learns that his diva has fallen ill and that the young woman whom he is on the eve of making a bride would make a good substitute. He engages her on the spot, viz., in the registrar's office, and the débutante, in whose breast love for matrimony and love for art fight a duel, is won over for the latter by an aunt, a sort of mother of a wonder child, who point out that the high salary would go well with her husband's scanty earnings, and his own misgivings are overcome by the truism that even on the stage virtue and marital faithfulness are not an impossibility.

He begins to think somewhat differently of the aspect of things in general and of his wife in special, when he sees her ready to go on upon the stage in the second act. Director and stage manager have to employ a trick by sending him into a cavernous abyss by means of a stage trap before they can get rid of him and his jealous ravings. The débutante, however, makes a tremendous hit à la Nitouche, and in the third act we find her on the high road to financial success. Like so many other prima donna husbands, hers also has become her manager, and he plays off that he is satisfied in this sole employment. Not she, however, for she wants him, who she loves with true conjugal affection, also in his capacity as husband. In a really quite dramatic and passionate scene the débutante renounces her artistic career and wins over her impresario as her husband; so that, when the curtain falls, the audience can rest assured that with the money the famous prima donna has earned and the salary of the savings bank clerk, who resumes his old position, they will live comfortably and happy ever after.

The performance of the operetta was not by any means a very smooth one; in fact, Korolanyi did not seem sure of his score, for he conducted without lifting his nose from the music sheets. But in the role of the débutante I made the acquaintance of a young woman who is bound to make a career as soubrette. Her name is Doninger, and she is just as nice, comely and appetizing in her stage appearance as she is histrionically pleasing and vocally gifted. Hers is not a big voice, but it is of very pure and sympathetic quality, and she sings with far more than average musical feeling and intelligence.

Outside of this rising young star the cast contained of noteworthy interpreters only the irresistibly funny comedian, Mr. Wellhof, who, the more I see and hear of him, the better I like him, and who always reminds me of Max Lube, of New York, with this difference, that Wellholf also possesses a voice, while Lube's vocal organ, as far back as I can remember, always sounded to me like a cracked copper frying pan.

This time Teresa Carreño is going to try it "for the fourth and last time." She feels sure that she has struck the right husband at last and that she never before in all her experience knew what "real love" was. The funny part of it is that number four is the younger brother of number two. You all knew Tagliapietra, the quondam baritone, "Tag," as we used to call him for short, and Talgpeter when we were in Dutch mood. Well, here is luck to the young couple! May they live long and prosper!

Privy Councillor Henry Pierson, director of the Berlin Royal Intendancy, was decorated by the young Queen of Holland with the Commander's Cross of the Netherlandish Order of Orania-Nassau.

A new two-act opera entitled "The Polish Jew," by Karl Weis, was yesterday produced for the first time at Leipsic, with considerable success.

Among the first concert announcements for the coming season is advertised a composition soirée of Karl Kaempf, to be given at Bechstein Hall on the evening of October 2. The Berlin papers mention in the advance notice that the composer will perform three tone poems upon the Mason & Hamlin organ, especially written for that celebrated instrument of American manufacture, and that he will also play the accompaniments to four of his songs upon the same.

Arthur Nikisch, whom I had the pleasure of meeting at Ostend a fortnight ago, was in Berlin last week, where he settled with Manager Wolff the preliminaries and programs of the cycle of ten Philharmonic subscription concerts of the coming season. The scheme will embrace the usual quota of Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, Brahms, Schumann and other well-known symphonies. Furthermore, Volkmann's D minor and one symphony each of Bruckner, Tschaikowsky and Saint-Saëns will be performed. The novelties will comprise Sigmund von Hausegger's "Barbarossa" Symphony, which I described in words of praise

VICTOR HARRIS IN SAN FRANCISCO.

THE interesting photograph reproduced above was made during the annual jinks (or summer festivities) held by the Bohemian Club, of San Francisco, last August. The club includes in its membership most of the best known composers, singers, painters, sculptors and actors of the Pacific Coast, and at its last encampment in its own grove among the celebrated big redwood trees of California it extended the honor of conductor to Victor Harris, of New York, who spent last summer in a four months' tour of travel all over the United States. Mr. Harris conducted the orchestra of forty, and chorus of forty-five, at its performance, and composed several special numbers for them. The above is a reproduction of one of the morning concerts under the redwood trees, with Mr. Harris conducting.

when I heard it for the first time last season under the composer's direction; also a new symphony with chorus by the Russian Scriabine; a new symphonic poem, "Elaine and Lancelot," by the young Hollander, Anton Averkamp, and two orchestral legends by the Finnish composer Sibelius, which were performed at last summer's Tonkuenstler meeting at Heidelberg. Of Strauss the program promises "Thus Spake Zarathustra" and "Death and Apotheosis." Wagner will be represented by the "Tristan" Vorspiel, "Siegfried" Idyll and the "Faust" overture; Berlioz by the "Carnaval Romain" and the "Benvenuto Cellini" overtures; and Mendelssohn, poor, neglected Mendelssohn, with the "Meeresstille und gluecklichc Fahrt" overture, while Liszt has also to be contented with only one performance, that of the symphonic poem, "The Ideals."

For the six subscription symphony soirées of Richard Strauss at Kroll's the following novelties are announced: Mahler's Fourth Symphony (very first performance), Charpentier's "Impressions from Italy," Bruckner's Third (D minor) Symphony, Love Scene from Richard Strauss' newly completed opera "Die Feuersnoth" (first performance), and Vincent d'Indy's "Enchanted Forest." Among the soloists, aside from those I mentioned before, will be Scheidemantel, from Dresden; Ernst Kraus, Professor Halir, who will perform C. H. Loeffler's Violin Concerto, and Dr. Otto Neitzel, from Cologne, who will venture to play here his own piano concerto.

At the Royal Opera House the complete cycle of "Der Nibelungenring" was given during the latter half of the past and the earlier part of the present week. For October the intendancy is preparing a newly studied and newly mounted representation of Marschner's "Hans Heiling," with Baptiste Hoffmann in the title part and under Dr. Muck's direction. Also newly studied and staged Goetz's opera, "The Taming of the Shrew," will soon be put on again, and the valuable much neglected work will be conducted by Richard Strauss. The two novelties promised for the earlier part of the season are Charpentier's opera "Louise," and Richard Strauss' "Feuersnoth."

Bechstein Hall has at last been decorated with a bust of the late Carl Bechstein, the great piano manufacturer and founder of the world-renowned house of Bechstein, after whom Mr. Wolff's pretty concert hall was named. The bust is an excellent likeness cast in darkly colored bronze, and is placed upon a yellow marble slab on the rear wall of the hall opposite the podium.

My next budget I shall probably write on the ocean blue, bent upon a short visit to my friends in New York, whom I have not seen for a period of more than nine years.

Among the musical callers at the Berlin office of THE MUSICAL COURIER during the past week was Daniel Visanski, the young American violinist and favorite Joachim pupil, who spent the summer at Sassnitz, on the Baltic, who intends to study for one year by himself in Berlin and then will go for a short while to Paris, after which he will start upon his career as a concert performer; Mrs. Leopold Godowsky, of New York; Sam Grimson, the young and talented London violinist, who is also one of Joachim's personal pets, and who will be heard in a number of concerts in Germany in the course of the coming season. Louis Hirsch, of New York, brought with him a letter of introduction from my old and esteemed friend Rafael Joseffy, and truly he could hardly have delivered a stronger recommendation. The young man has studied the piano with the great New York pedagogue and master for two years and a half, and intends to place himself in Berlin under the guidance of Dr. Jedliczka for finishing lessons. Miss Germaine Ames, a young vocalist from Chicago, informed me that she began studying with Professor Blume here, and so far is satisfied with the progress she achieved in the cultivation of her alto voice. Miss Jessie Belle Wood, an auburn haired young woman of a face and figure that justify her middle name, also hails from Chicago, and has come on to Berlin in order to be able to resume and continue here her pianistic studies with the eminent virtuoso and equally excellent teacher Leopold Godowsky. Miss Rose Halpern, from Warsaw, one of the most musical amateur pianists, and at the same time an excellent and charming young lieder singer, who made vocal studies in Paris under Madame de la Grange and others. Mrs. Anna F. and Miss Beatrice M. Davidson, of New York, which latter young lady will make her operatic début at Elberfeld on October 16 as Leonora in "Trovatore." Mrs. Stencel, of San Francisco, who came with the amended program for her daughter, young Alma Stencel's first Berlin concert. The fourteen year old miss will perform the Sauer and Liszt E flat piano concertos with orchestra, and between these virtuoso compositions will interpret a group of classical unaccompanied pieces. Ernest Schelling, the young American pianist, after having studied with Paderewski, as his only pupil for several years, will give his first concert in Berlin on October 7, when he will perform with the Philharmonic Orchestra the Schumann Concerto, the Chopin F minor Concerto and the Polish Fantasy of Paderewski. Miss Leona Clarkson, from Atlanta, Ga., a talented pupil of the excellent piano pedagogue Alfredo Barili. The young lady has made application for entrance in the Royal High School, and by the way she performed for me the Chopin G minor Ballad and Bach's Chromatic Fantaisie and Fugue, I am justified in thinking that she will find no difficulty in being accepted as a pupil, provided at the examinations the number of applicants is not, as usual, ten times greater than the Royal Institute of Music can accommodate. Lastly, Jaques Weintraub, court concertmaster at Gera, who will concertize here on October 3, the very night on which Arthur Friedheim intends to give his first piano recital in Berlin, after an absence of more than a dozen years.

O. F.

MAXSON, OF PHILADELPHIA.—Frederick Maxson, the well-known organist and instructor of Philadelphia, has begun what promises to be an unusually busy season. Many new pupils have come to him, hearing of the invariable engagement by churches of his competent students, and he is just reorganizing his choir at the Central Congregational Church, preparatory to the notable musical evenings he gives. His next organ recital is at the opening of the organ in the Presbyterian Church of Richmond, Philadelphia, and he plays at a wedding at Germantown the same week. It will be seen his services as executant and teacher are much in demand.

GREGORY HAST.—Gregory Hast, the celebrated English tenor, who will make his first visit to this country this season, under Manager Charlton's direction, is to sail on the Umbria, October 26, reaching New York just in time to fill his first booking, November 4. Mr. Hast has been enjoying a delightful and well earned summer holiday at a beautiful place in Buckinghamshire, after a very exacting season which averaged some weeks twelve and fourteen engagements, including recitals, concerts and "at homes." Liza Lehmann's song cycle, "The Daisy Chain," was written for Mr. Hast, who sang it at the first performance in England at one of the London ballad concerts.

NEW YORK ARION.—The dates of the New York Arion concerts for the season are: November 17, December 15 and April 6. On March 30 the Arion will give the annual children's festival, and the carnivals and other events will be given as usual.

LONDON NOTES.

LONDON, OCTOBER 1, 1901.

TO illustrate the present activity which is centred in one spot musical here I send you some dates and programs of events at the Queen's Hall Promenade Concerts. An enormous amount of work is being done when one considers the time limitation and the fact that one single headed management is doing it. The character of the work must also appeal to the musical mind and its approval can be depended upon on the part of fair thinking musical people:

NORDICA.

Madame Nordica leaves for the United States on October 26, on the St. Louis from Southampton. Mrs. Fox, of Philadelphia, will be a passenger on the same steamer.

HUNEKER.

Mr. and Mrs. James G. Huneker leave for America on the Palatia, October 21, starting from Portsmouth. They are in Paris to-day.

NEVADA.

Madame Nevada and her concert company leave for America on the Savoie from Havre on November 2. The company consists of Pablo Casals, 'cello; Leon Moreau, pianist, and Magnarre, flutist. The tour will run for six months in the United States and Mexico, and much of it is already booked.

HAROLD BAUER.

After a successful tour in Northern Spain, Harold Bauer, the pianist, returns to that country about October 15 for another line of performances. FIS.

BESSIE GREENWOOD, MERRIMAN'S PUPIL.—The following is from the Buffalo, N. Y., Commercial of recent date:

At the organ recital given by Mrs. L. Huntington Woodman, of Brooklyn, Thursday afternoon, at the Temple of Music, Miss Bessie Greenwood, of Hornellsville, N. Y., a pupil of Dr. La Frone Merriman, sang Dell' Acqua's "Villanelle," the Bach-Gounod "Ave Maria" and Gounod's "Repentance." Miss Greenwood is the coloratura soprano who aroused so much interest by her singing at the reception to Mrs. McKinley on President's Day, September 5, and who was just about to sing the next day at the President's reception in the Temple when the fatal shots were fired by the assassin Czolgosz. Miss Greenwood possesses a voice of great compass and flexibility, and her singing is extremely sympathetic. She was repeatedly encored at the organ recital, and the purity of her voice and the ease and beauty of her extreme high tone, notably a high F sharp in the "Ave Maria," caused much comment. Many of the ladies who were present at the reception to Mrs. McKinley and the members of at least one of the bands went to the Temple purposely to hear her. Miss Greenwood has a charming manner as well as a beautiful voice.

ARTISTS THEIR OWN MANAGERS.

IN a recent issue of this paper appeared an editorial headed "What Is the Trouble?" in which the growing tendency of artists to manage their own tours was lucidly treated. The editorial has aroused a lot of controversy, and the following letter from R. Norman Concorde, of the Concorde Concert Control, of London, may be interesting:

LONDON, August 17, 1901.

Editors The Musical Courier:

I have read with interest the leader in THE MUSICAL COURIER of August 7 on the subject of artists being their own business managers and hope that you will have space for this letter, in which I will try to give a glimpse of the other side of the question.

You wonder, and kindly enough—or at least so I read your remarks—what will become of the poor managers if the fashion for artists to conduct their own business becomes general. Musicians are proverbially and sadly unbusinesslike and the more engrossed they are with their art and its continuous study the less likely are they to find time, strength and peace to manage their business. Ask any artist who has arranged even a single concert at which he has performed if he did his art and himself justice on that occasion. Ask him also if he saved money by it and if everything "went" to his satisfaction. I find that those artists who have had a taste of managing their own concerts are most anxious to hand over all future trouble to a competent manager.

Of course there are artists whose positions are assured, who do not, or need not, give concerts, for their engagements are numerous, but it would take a lot of "black and white" to convince me that they have arrived at their positions without the aid of some manager. Two at least of those you mention (I have not the honor of knowing them all) would certainly have taken longer to arrive where they now are had it not been for the reputation and pushing of their respective managers. Managers can make mistakes; they can be and often are lazy and incompetent (even as a great many artists are lazy and incompetent); they can sometimes even be so ungrateful as to expect payment instead of glory only for their labor in introducing and placing an artist, but they are still necessary middlemen, while the supply is so much greater than the demand, and if for no other reasons their existence is justified on economic grounds.

As regards the engagers, what guarantee have they as to the ability of an artist if they do not get him through some reliable bureau? With all due respect to the nobility of the artists' nature, I do not think I should care to engage an artist on his own recommendation! Would you? The artist needs someone to blow his trumpet for him, and woe be to the trumpeter if the tune is not to his satisfaction. I assure you that to manage business for these hypersensitive and generally impossible (as far as business is concerned) creatures is often enough to drive a manager mad, and the trouble he has is very underpaid by the 10 per cent. on which he is supposed to grow so rich. The majority of engagements are of course for small fees, and it is quite an every day occurrence to have so much expense in telegrams messengers, postages, &c., over a single engagement for some thoughtless and inconsiderate artist, or some unbusinesslike engager that the commission does not cover the out-of-pocket expense.

To return to the question of recommendation (excuse my wandering, I have not time to compose a concise letter), there is no denying that there is a glut in the artistic market, and the agent is needed to weed them out and offer the public only the flower thereof. If an agent is honest and knows his work his word will soon be relied on as to the quality of those people he recommends. Of course, as in other business, the individual work of the principal is as necessary as that of the agent, and artists must not expect that their mere existence will secure success. The public are not musical bloodhounds, with an instinct for scenting out geniuses. The artist must consider himself from a commercial standpoint, and unless he has something to sell that no one else possesses he must not expect to become known without intelligent advertisement.

Merit only cannot secure success quickly, and even mediocrity can obtain a position if it has the wherewithal to put itself in an advantageous light before the public. It is only necessary to look round at modern successful artists to verify this. In other professions the expenses of articling or college fees have to be borne and afterward probably a large sum laid out in the purchase of a practice. And those in the musical profession must also see that a prosperous position cannot be expected in a comparatively short period without ability, hard work and the expenditure of money to let the public know of their existence.

It would cost far more for an artist to make himself known than it would if he obtained the services of some good agent, and he could not do it satisfactorily with even double the money. A new artist needs someone to place him for many obvious reasons. Once placed, if he hits the popular taste, he will soon find himself too busy to wish to manage his own business, unless he means to sacrifice his art and his dignity in "puffing" himself. Even the most money grabbing should see that this would be an expensive and shortsighted policy. A truly great artist can perhaps afford an individual manager, though no doubt if we knew the details of each case then we should find that each manager has other ways of adding to his income. Certainly the 10 per cent. does not pay, and if it were not for other business we poor managers would soon be begging the artists to conduct their own affairs. No; certainly the artist has the better of it—and very much the better of it! The good artists will still want managers, and the bad ones—but there we come to an end.

In conclusion I would add that I think that my reputation for independence and what some people are kind enough to term my "Quixotic" attitude toward incompetent performers and my refusal to act for them should make my opinion on this subject acceptable as that of an unprejudiced person. Yours faithfully,

R. NORMAN-CONCORDE.

Musical Clubs.

Mendelssohn's oratorio, "St. Paul," will be sung at the first concert this season by the Choral Union, of Newburyport, Mass.

To-day, October 16, the members of the Ladies' Musical Club, of Richmond, Ind., opened their season with a piano and vocal recital.

The Twentieth Century Chorus, of Indianapolis, Ind., gave an interesting musicale to open the season in Lyra Hall, 1228 South Meridian street.

Arthur Plagge has resigned as musical director of the Syracuse (N. Y.) Liederkranz to accept the conductorship of the Buffalo (N. Y.) Saengerbund.

Conductor Swan, of the Mendelssohn Choral Club, of Roseville, N. J., conducted the first rehearsal of the autumn in the large hall of the Roseville Athletic Association. This club is reported to be in a flourishing financial condition.

November 19 is the date set for the opening musicale by the Diatonic and Amateur musical clubs, of Albany, N. Y. A series of joint musicales will be given this autumn and winter, and the co-operative plan is expected to be more successful than independent efforts.

Rehearsals of the Arlington (N. J.) Choral Society will be held this year in the chapel of the First Presbyterian Church at Arlington. Carroll Beckel, the conductor, promises excellent programs for the two concerts to be given by the society on December 5, and in April, 1902.

The Schubert Oratorio Society, of Newark, N. J., expects to sing at its concerts this season "The Light of Asia," by Dudley Buck, and Verdi's "Requiem." Louis Arthur Russell, the conductor of the society, is hoping for an addition to the ranks of the active membership.

Joseph Mosenthal's setting for Bryant's "Thanatopsis" is the first work taken up by the Orpheus Club, of Newark, N. J. The rehearsals, under the direction of Conductor Ward, are being held in the lecture room of the Church of the Redeemer, corner of Broad and Hill streets, Newark.

John C. Dempsey conducted the recent concert by the Patchogue (L. I.) Choral Society, given at the Carlton Opera House at Patchogue. The soloists were Mrs. Eva Gardner Coleman, soprano; Mrs. Wilmot M. Smith, mezzo soprano; Theodore Van Yorx, tenor, and John C. Dempsey, basso.

The Orange (N. J.) Mendelssohn Union, of which Arthur Mees is the musical director, will give two concerts this season, January 16 and April 23, 1902. Chadwick's "Judith," sung at the Worcester Festival, and "The Spectre Bride," by Dvorák, are two works which may be rehearsed by the Union.

The Friday Morning Musical Club, of Worcester, Mass., opened its nineteenth annual season with a Chopin program. Miss Frances Morse read a paper on the life of the Polish composer, and illustrations on the piano were played by Miss Morse, Mrs. Brand and Mrs. Schmidt.

The first rehearsal this season by the Cleveland (Ohio) Vocal Society was held on October 7. At the first concert, to be given in the Chamber of Commerce hall, December 12, the following works will be sung: "Noël," an oratorio by Saint-Saëns; "Te Deum," by Verdi; "The Sailor's Christmas," by Chaminade; "A Calm Sea and a Prosperous Voyage," by Beethoven.

Baxter Hall, at Rutland, Vt., has been engaged by the local Philharmonic Club for the first concert of the season, December 11. The dates of the study meetings of the club are November 6, December 4, January 15, February 5 and March 5. February 18 the club will give a reception. Miscellaneous programs are announced for the study meetings, with classical, romantic and modern composers as topics for discussion.

Musical matters at Seattle, Wash., will be interesting this autumn and winter. The Ladies' Musical Club gave a concert on the last day of September. The officers of the club for this season are: President, Mrs. R. W. Emmons; vice-president, Mrs. W. H. White; recording secretary, Mrs. G. F. Meacham; corresponding secretary, Mrs. George A. Hawley; treasurer, Miss Beach; financial, Mrs. A. B. Stewart, Mrs. F. R. Van Tuyl, Mrs. Maurice McMicken; press, Mrs. M. A. Gottstein; social, Mrs. W. D. Perkins, and librarian, Mrs. Ivan Hyland.

Vittorio Carpi.

THE New York Tribune of Sunday, October 6, publishd a good picture of Vittorio Carpi, the vocal teacher, with the following:

Sig. Vittorio Carpi, who will be remembered by patrons of the old Academy of Music as a member of the Strakosch company in the season of 1875, has taken up his residence in New York. Signor Carpi was a director of the vocal department of the Chicago Conservatory of Music from 1890 to 1896, but before and after that period he taught in various parts of Europe, chiefly Milan, London and Homburg. He counts Lady Curzon (formerly Miss Leiter, of Chicago) among his pupils.

Signor Carpi is already very busy with pupils at his studio, 210 West Fifty-ninth street. Although born in Italy Signor Carpi is a great enthusiast of this country. The following anecdote is very interesting:

"In his opera tour in the United States in 1875-76, Signor Carpi sang on the night of December 31 at the Grand Opera House, in Cincinnati, in the opera "Martha," and at the end of the drinking song, instead of singing 'Hurrah! trallallera la,' he promptly substituted the words 'Hurrah for '76!' it being the New Year's eve of the first century of American liberty.

"The public, surprised and enthusiastic, raised a storm of applause for him, and made him sing it four times, at the same time singing it with him. The entire press gave him splendid notices praising the patriotic thought.

"Signor Carpi was one of the few favorite artists who sang in Florence, Italy, on the occasion of the Michael Angelo celebration. The night of August 18, 1876, he had the honor to sing at the serenata given by the Venice Artistic Club in the Lagune, in honor of Her Highness the Princess Margherita. Princess Margherita's gondola was attached to the concert boat, and thousands of gondolas were all around preceding or following the concert gondola. A clear and a splendid moonlight completed the magnificent spectacle. The artist was personally congratulated by Her Highness the Princess."

LEWING-STEWART CONCERT.—Mme. Adele Lewing gave a successful concert in James' Hall, Madison, N. J., October 9, in conjunction with Miss Effie Stewart. Both artists are re-engaged for a concert at the same November 6.

MRS. EUNICE ST. CLAIR MARTENS.

AMONG the concert artists who bid fair to achieve great success this fall and winter in the concert field is Mrs. Eunice St. Clair Martens, of Chicago, who has already been heard in New York, and who has earned the title of "The Lark."

Mrs. Martens was born in Quebec, but her parents moved to the United States when she was a child, and she considers herself a Western girl. Her laurels as a singer to a great extent have been won in the West. She was given the title of "The Lark" when a child because of the clearness and purity of her singing tones.

In Chicago she studied music under Mrs. Pauline Lathrop, and under her advice went to Paris and placed herself in the hands of Sbriglia. She only returned to this country a short time ago, and gave an evidence of the magnificent quality of her voice when she appeared here last July at one of the Kaltenborn concerts. Her voice is a dramatic soprano of wide range and charming quality. She sings with exceeding purity of tone and great flexibility. Her pronunciation is distinct and her interpretation correct. She is considered by experts to possess the great secret of temperament, which is the one thing so essential to the success of singers.

Mrs. Martens' reading of ballads is pronounced exceptionally fine because of this temperament and her ability to so clearly enunciate and phrase perfectly. Her talents are very certain to bring her most conspicuously to the front among the admirers of fine singing in New York city when she is heard here this fall.

EFFIE STEWART.—While in Boston and Providence recently, Miss Effie Stewart met such men as Emil Mollenhauer, Arthur Foote, George Chadwick, B. J. Lang and Jules Jordan and all expressed themselves pleased with her singing. A sterling artist like Miss Stewart deserves the encouragement she is receiving, and doubtless she will be heard at concerts in New England this winter.

BOSTONIA SEXTET.—C. L. Staats, the noted clarinetist and director of the Bostonia Sextet Club, was obliged to decline Mr. Gericke's offer to resume his old place in the Boston Symphony Orchestra on account of the engagements of the club. Beginning January 6, 1902, Mr. Staats and the club, assisted by Miss Edith Viola Ellsfree, will make a tour of fifteen weeks through Canada, Ohio, Pennsylvania, the West and South.

THE APOLLO CLUB.—The Apollo Club, of New York, enters upon its tenth season with the promise of greater musical success than it has ever before enjoyed. Concerts will be given on Thursday evenings, December 5, 1901; February 20 and April 10, 1902, in the grand ballroom of the Waldorf-Astoria. A new and attractive social feature has also been inaugurated. Complimentary invitations will be issued to the club's private rooms, whereupon three evenings during the season a musical program of high merit will be given by the club, assisted by its artist friends.

The officers of the club for the year are: President, Frank S. Hastings, the widely known patron and lover of music; first vice-president, William R. Pitt; second vice-president, Charles Forster; secretary, John J. Page; treasurer, O. B. Thomas.

THE CAPPIANI COTTAGE.

AMONG the many pretty cottages along the Old Orchard Beach there is none which offers so many attractions as the charming and spacious summer home of Madame Cappiani, the eminent vocal teacher. Situated upon a prominent point of the beach, it commands a magnificent view of the ocean, which stretches out on the one side to Biddeford Pool (about a mile away), and on the other so far that upon a clear night the lights of Portland can be easily seen.

To the west lies a large pine forest, which, with its balmy pine odor, in combination with the bracing oxygen of the sea breezes, makes this villa delightful.

It is through these beautiful woods and the shady avenues of Old Orchard and Saco that Madame Cappiani is seen daily from 7 to 8 taking her morning horseback ride. There are also many charming drives round about, which enable the madame to entertain her guests in a most delightful manner with her own horse and carriage. In front and on all sides of the two story house the lawn is adorned by prettily arranged flower beds, and to the south stretches out into a broad level, which affords an ideal ground for croquet and all kinds of outdoor sport. The 7-foot wide veranda, running around three sides of the house, gives open air enjoyment even in rainy weather. Another convenience is the Boston and Maine dummy railroad, which runs through the premises, from Old Orchard to Saco River, a delightful excursion in the summer. Harriet Beecher Stowe spent a fortnight in this cottage, and pronounced it the loveliest spot on the beach.

The stable on the grounds has as its chief ornament a huge American flag, painted on the door by the madame herself, and this brought her the reputation of being the most patriotic American on the beach. It is this charming-villa that Madame Cappiani seek in the summers that she does not spend in Europe, and here she receives those pupils, mostly teachers, who wish to seize the opportunity of their vacation to perfect their singing under Madame Cappiani's exquisite skill in vocal culture and style. She sets aside the morning for lessons, which leaves the rest of the day free for the usual summer enjoyments, such as bathing, for which the Atlantic Ocean at the door offers excellent opportunities, and boating as well as driving and walking. The beautifully colored water effects and the exquisite sunrises and moon are indescribable. But it can easily be imagined that this constant view of nature's wealth of beauty has done much toward inspiring the madame to write many of the enthusiastic and instructive articles which appear from time to time in the leading magazines of the day.

The following is from an article written this summer for the Deutsche Gesangs-Kunst:

CAPPIANI ON VOICE CULTURE.

At the conclusion of the Manuel Garcia article in the issue of June 2, No. 18, of the Berlin Deutsche Gesangs-Kunst, I feel compelled to comment upon its principal points of light and dark color of tone, portamenti, legati, the swell tone, crescendo and anatomy. In vocal teachers' essays physiology and psychology are often commented upon without mentioning the real cause, which can only lead to the psychological expression. To attain this result the freedom of phonation, as Dr. Burns Molar rightly says, must first be mastered, without pressure or muscular effort in the throat. Free or elastic tones are only capable to resound in different shades of light or dark color. The old Italian maestri excelled in vocal culture and in the art of singing, without possessing an anatomical or physiological knowledge of the throat. They produced many more celebrities in a shorter time than is done at present with anatomical teaching. On the contrary, when an anatomical teacher has finished with a pupil, the voice is also finished, for the reason that when a singer thinks of the action of his throat while singing the more pressure he uses, which wears on the vocal cords, and moreover causes him to become a "throaty singer." It is appalling to read of so-called good German vocal teachers who assert that tone-building or tone-training takes long years—(why this English phrase in a German zeitsoprift?—tone-lehre is just as well). I wonder that with such theories Germans ever have the courage to study singing. These long years of mysterious tone-training is only an admission that they do not know themselves how to train the voice, and in this case the number of years cannot accomplish it either. If the teacher understands the free emission, that is, the natural phonation of a tone, and its placing into the acoustic chamber, the talented pupil succeeds in acquiring it in thirty or forty lessons, and the swell tone, crescendo, must be taught from the first, not as Garcia suggests for after study. The teacher of the 60's, whose name was omitted in the article, was right in applying the portamenti and legati for juvenile voices. It has the same importance as with adults. Light and dark color-tone must also be taught to beginners by the movement of cheek and lip muscles; although the vowel must remain the same in lighter or darker shades. Garcia's great merit is the invention of his speculum, laryngoscope, consisting of two looking-glasses, one placed on the outside of the mouth and the smaller one inside to reflect the motion of the larynx while singing. This invention proved a great benefit to physicians and surgeons—hence the large number of throat specialists—but to the singer it did much harm, as the vocal teacher tries to excel the other by anatomical teaching. It is of no consequence whatever, for the art of singing, if the singer knows whether the circo-arytænoid or tyro-arytænoid muscle, or one or the other membranes are moving at this or that sound. How is it possible in a range of three octaves to feel the action of the voice from one half tone to the other, when the vocal cords are no longer than a lady's little finger nail? It is sufficient for the singer by the correct natural emission not to form the vowel in the throat which would cause the tone to become hard and unsympathetic, and to form the consonants in their proper place forcibly and short.

The shorter the consonant the more the liquid vowel will flow from the lips, and this is what the old Italian teachers meant in calling good singing "Cantar a fior de labbro." The element of language should be improved in general. Its principal fault lies in the primary schools. Teach the children to form the consonants distinctly, and they will understand the intrinsic value of a syllable and word. By this distinctness of enunciation and pronunciation the adult, in order to become an actor, orator, minister or lawyer, will not have to go to an elocutionist as in second childhood to learn to speak in public; especially for the singer whose own voice with the accompanying musical instruments overpower the consonants, therefore, they must be pronounced with double force. How many lawsuits may have been lost by the defendant's indistinct pronunciation, the judges failing to grasp the proper meaning. On the contrary, a distinct pronunciation creates enthusiasm in the speaker's own soul, who instinctively finds then the right emphasis for his words. Enthusiasm is contagious and carries the listeners. This explains itself how much the singer will gain in his art of singing by a distinct and clear pronunciation of the consonants.

THE CAPPIANI COTTAGE, BAY VIEW (FERRY BEACH), ME.

FRIEDA STENDER.—Frieda Stender, who appeared with the Maurice Grau and Savage Opera Company, will not sing in opera this season; she has been engaged for a number of concerts and festivals in the West, and commences her tour under the management of L. M. Ruben, October 28, in Detroit. November 7 and 8 she will sing in New York city.

W. DONLEY, of Indianapolis, gave two delightful organ concerts in the Temple of Music October 2 and 3.

Had I the power to dip my pen in the glowing tints of the rainbow then I might be able to describe these two concerts adequately. The news that an organist of extraordinary talent presided at the organ for two days soon was spread broadcast, and at his second concert Buffalo musicians turned out en masse. A man imbued with the enthusiasm for his art as he is must certainly create a contagion wherever he gives his recitals to spur on other organists. We all admired his warm temperament, good execution, perfect legato and rhythmic phrasing in all he does. Among his numbers was a Toccata in B minor, Batiste, arranged by himself, which was enthusiastically applauded. It is a selection deservedly popular in Europe and but little known in this country. Mr. Donley has largely rewritten the first part and given a part of the first theme to pedals and supplied an accompanying figure for the right hand. An entirely new obligato has been added to the second theme, giving to the right foot a melody of its own, much the same as the first part, but the coda has been treated much the same as the first part, but with the pedal in doppel movement. A lovely, quaint selection was the "Assyrian March," Botting. The "'Tanhauser' Fantasie," Wagner-Morgan, he played as though inspired. Then there were selections from Capocci, Hollins, Gigout, Dethier, Widor, Smart, Thorly and others. Mr. Donley has given 150 recitals in Indianapolis alone and a great many recitals all over the country. In 1896 he was elected organist and choirmaster in Memorial Presbyterian Church, of Indianapolis, Ind., where he lives. He studied under E. W. Burnham, Otto A. Schmitt and Professor Havernick, New York city. In 1886 he went to Boston, where he studied the piano with Dr. Louis Maas, organ with G. E. Whiting, voice with C. E. Finney, and harmony with Stephen A. Emery. Mr. Donley is booked for a number of concert engagements this fall.

The women organists who have played thus far at the Pan-American have well maintained the high standard of organ playing. Following Mrs. Chappell Fisher, of Rochester, we have had Miss Emma Maynard, of Gary, S. Dak.; Mrs. Raymond, of Lincoln, Neb.; Miss Marie McConnell, of Buffalo; Miss Gertrude Sans Souci, of St. Paul, and last, but not least, Miss Fanny M. Spencer, of New York.

W. DONLEY.

At the New York State Federation of Women's Clubs, held at the Delaware Avenue Baptist Church, Buffalo, October 10, the star paper of the day was that of Katherine Evans von Klenner, on "The Literature Which Inspired the Great Musical Composers." I am sure that if the speakers of the morning session had taken a few lessons of Madame von Klenner, on the art of tone production, the demand of the audience in the rear for "louder, louder!" would not have occurred so often. Surely every tone and utterance of hers was clear and distinct. Sorry that want of space will not permit me to give more than a few points of interest in her lecture. The part of her lecture which appealed to me most is the following:

"Wedded to the word 'tone' conveys an understanding not attainable in any other way, and the scope of the united powers of speech and tone lies far beyond the possibilities of word and gesture. Infinite in their combination, the seven tones express vastly more than speech may, even more than the average mind is able to comprehend and appreciate. They convey to the hearer that which the author and playwright feels when penning his brilliant word pictures, reading and re-reading, filling here and changing there, only to acknowledge that what he has written falls far short of what he felt and wished to say. Something lacking—what is it?

"It is that which words cannot convey, it is that which a few notes, a single chord is able to make clear beyond doubt; it is the language of the soul immortal, which dwelleth not in speech, but is found in its highest expression in eternal song, that greatest and noblest gift from Higher Spheres.

"Has anyone put pen to paper to give shape and thought to his innermost feeling, without expecting that even words were not sufficient to the task? Is there an writer who does not know that miserable feeling of utter discouragement which overcomes him as soon as he strives to leave the well-trodden path of platitude and soar to the height of Corthurnus.

"We all know it; it is familiar to writers great and small. It will miserably fail to create that deep emotion he experienced while the same words came to him clad in the waving melodious sound which gave them infinite more meaning and spoke to heart and soul far more eloquently than the sweetest, most expressive poetry. He who doubts this statement should critically listen to a song and then peruse the poem which forms its burden.

"It is deeply to be regretted that the literature and music of so many highly developed nations of ancient times, foremost among them Egypt, Babylon, Assyria and Persia, are either lost in utter oblivion or transmitted only in fragments, which, however, speak loudly of the grandeur and excellence of science in those almost forgotten times. The earliest age that gives us undeniable proof of speech and song entwined is that of ancient Greece. Sophocles and Æschylus, those peers of the classic stage, introduce the chorus to make dramatic situations still more dramatic. With them we also find the earliest instance of musical recitation in precisely the same outward form and to the same purpose as Richard Wagner employs to a thousand years later."

At the end of Madame von Klenner's lecture, many of the audience came to thank her personally, and a good number engaged lessons from her at her next summer residence at Lakewood, near Chautauqua.

John P. Lawrence, of Washington, gave a recital in October 1. He played compositions by Grieg, Bach, Wagner, Guilmant, Saint-Saëns and Lemare. Mr. Lawrence played his entire program without notes. I have never witnessed this feat of memorizing but once before, when William Kaffenberger played a very long and difficult program at the N. Y. S. M. T. Convention at Glens Falls without notes.

On the night of October 7 a concert of exceptional attraction was given at the Temple of Music, when the Buffalo Orpheus sang several selections under the direction of John Lund, and the instrumental portion of the concert was given by the Innes Band. The society's made rapid strides in the past two years, both in excellence of their singing and in numbers. All this is owing to the excellent training of their conductor and the genial good fellowship which draws new members. The accuracy of attack, fine shading and comprehensive interpretation of both music and words were the points observable. The thousands of visitors will leave Buffalo with the impression of having heard the best male chorus in the State, for they were very enthusiastic in their applause. They sang "Die Drei Gesellen," Podbertsky; "Abendgebet," Kreuzer, and "Sonntag auf der Alm," Kaschat.

Harry B. Jepson, a member of the Yale music department faculty, gave three organ concerts at the Temple. I had contracted a bad cold, and much to my regret I was unable to attend. From all sides I have heard his concerts spoken of in terms of highest praise.

Miss Ione Riddell, of Cincinnati, gave two good organ concerts, asisted by Miss Eleanor Bain, contralto. Annotations and pictures will follow in my next.

Innes and his band are being lionized to their hearts' content at the Pan-American. On Orpheus Night they gave the following program:

Soloists, Miss Frances Boyden, soprano; Sig. Achille Alberti, baritone; Sig. Edgarde Zerni, tenor; Bohumir Kryl, cornetist.
Overture, Mignon.....Thomas
Serenade Rococo (for reed instruments).....Meyer-Helmund
Descriptive Fantaisie, Kammenoi Ostrow.....Rubinstein
Concert Polka, The Whirlwind.....Hartmann
Cornet solo by Kryl.
Intermezzo, Cupid's Story.....
Prince Charming Two-step March (new).....Innes
Concert Waltz, In the Vienna Woods.....Strauss
Scenes from Faust.....Gounod
(Not in costume.)
Marguerite.....Miss Boyden
Faust.....Signor Zerni
Mefistofele.....Signor Alberti
Spectacular Fantaisie, The Village Blacksmith.....Michaelis

The cornetist Kryl carried off many honors, and after repeated recalls he gave as an encore "Im teifen Keller itz ich bier," in compliment of the thirsty Germans, who were eagerly anxious to see the inside of Alt Nürnberg, where they held their commers.

Miss Silence Dales, the violinist, who gave such a successful concert at the Pan-American on Nebraska Day, has been giving an equally creditable concert under the auspices of Cornell University at Ithaca. Program and press notice as follows:

Prelude.....Rachmaninoff
Frühlingsrauschen.....Sinding
Miss Hoover.
Concerto in G minor.....Max Bruch
Miss Dales.
Legende.....Wieniawski
Miss Dales.
Autumn.....Chaminade
Miss Hoover.
Butterfly.....Schubert
Swan.....Saint-Saëns
Bee.....Schubert
Polonaise, D major.....Wieniawski
Miss Dales.

The auditorium of Barnes Hall last night was filled to its utmost capacity by those who had come to hear the violin recital given by Miss Silence Dales, of Lincoln, Neb. From the very first the audience was captivated by the skill of this young artist. The audience reached the height of its enthusiasm when, in response to an encore, Miss Dales played Remenyi's arrangement of "Old Folks at Home."

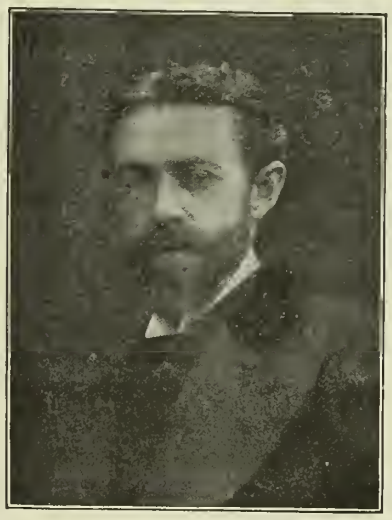
In Miss Dales' manipulation of the violin there is, in the Bruch concerto especially, an authority about her work, a breadth of tone, a virility coupled with feminine sense and grace, which at once appeals to the musical taste. The remarkable technical ability which has resulted from years of practice appeals to the listener at once.

This is the first time Miss Dales has appeared as far East as New York State. In the country from the Mississippi River to Salt Lake City she has established an enviable reputation. She came to Ithaca yesterday from Buffalo, where she appeared at the Pan-American Exposition as the State musical representative for Nebraska Day.

Miss Marie Hoover, who accompanied Miss Dales, gave two solo numbers on the program. She proved herself the artist and played with much feeling, broad interpretation and a finish of technic.

In response to persistent encores, Miss Dales played a portion of Remenyi's arrangement of "The Suwanee River" and Miss Hoover played "The Fawns," by Chaminade.—Ithaca Daily Evening News, October 5, 1901.

The Buffalo public, as well as thousands of visitors, have been eagerly looking forward to the coming of William C. Carl, the well-known organist of New York city. Mr Carl has played at the World's Fair, the Edinburgh International Exposition, the Stockholm, the Nashville and the Philadelphia expositions; at the Crystal Palace and the Queen's Hall, London; at the Worcester Festival with the New York Symphony and with Emil Paur's Orchestra.



WILLIAM C. CARL.

He has dedicated many organs all over the country and has given nearly 100 concerts at his own church, the "Old First" Presbyterian of New York, where he is the organist and choir master. Mr. Carl is also director of the Guilmant Organ School, New York. How Mr. Carl has crowded all that work into his short career, he being still a young man, passes one's comprehension. Following is his program:

Allegro from the Sixth Organ Symphony.....Widor
Romance (new).....Richmond
Menuetto, in the ancient style.....Maurice Lee Fugue in D major.....Bach
Vorspiel to Parsifal.....Wagner
Violin solo, Faust.....Sarasate
Señor Mariano Bracamonte.
Organ Concerto in D minor.....Händel
(With cadenzas by Alexander Guilmant.)
Reve Angelique.....Rubinstein
Fantaisie on a Welsh Air.....Carl
The King's Coronation March.....Duncan
(New, first time in the country. Composed in honor of the coronation of King Edward VII.)

The Allegro from the Sixth Organ Symphony, Ch. M. Widor, instantly riveted the attention of the audience, and revealed the composer at his best. Romance (new)) by William H. Richmond, rich in melody, of rather a soft, dreamy character, was played by Mr. Carl with that delicacy of shading that only a master can give.

"Reve Angelique," by Anton Rubinstein, is the most beautiful, delicate, subtle, suggestive and pensive air that was ever written. And how the audience applauded Mr. Carl's fine rendition of it! Right after that, in complete contrast, Mr. Carl played his own arrangement on the Welsh air, "Men of Harlech." It is an exceedingly brilliant number and requires the utmost skill of a well schooled organist to play it. The pedaling is extremely difficult and the entire piece technically exacting, yet Mr. Carl overcomes all difficulties with an ease and grace truly marvelous.

In the "King's Coronation March," composed in honor of the coronation of King Edward VII., which is new and the first time played in this country, Mr. Carl had the opportunity to display the brilliancy of his technic. When we have watched the virtuoso's technical ability then we begin to admire his poetic temperament, his own individuality in style, the perfect legato and phrasing and his true interpretation of the composer's works.

At the time of going to press Mr. Carl has only given one concert. Annotations of the other two will appear in the next number. [More about Mr. Carl on another page.—Ed.]

MRS. KATHERINE RIESBERG.

MRS. L. P. MORRILL.—Mrs. Morrill, teacher of scientific voice culture, has resumed teaching in New York at her studio in the Chelsea. For fifteen years she was identified with all that is most refined in musical Boston, but is now firmly established in New York. Two of her pupils who will be heard in public during the season are Miss Florence Clark, contralto, of Ridgewood, N. J., who spent part of the summer with Mrs. Morrill at New London, and Mrs. Wm. Innis, mezzo soprano, who does some of the solo work at the beautiful new church at Sixty-eighth street and Central Park West.

During the winter Mrs. Morrill will hold her usual receptions on the second Thursday of the month, beginning in November.

WHAT better indication of musical activity than the pages of THE MUSICAL COURIER? Forty-four pages of the best news of the world in this issue herald the opening of another season. Not another musical paper on earth has the resources to compile such an issue as this, and THE MUSICAL COURIER will grow larger and more interesting as the winter progresses.

SOUND business methods in the management of the New York Liederkranz have raised that society above any financial worry for some time to come. At the annual meeting the treasurer's report showed a net surplus of $176,096, the assets being $328,449, and the liabilities only $152,352. Dr. Henry Rallpfeiffer was elected president. The membership is 1,069.

THEY have a music trust in Spain now, a certain Louis G. Dotesio, of Bilbao, having organized a company with a capital of 1,000,000 francs, by means of which he has secured control of all public musical events in the whole of Spain, outside of opera. Dotesio is a piano agent, born in England of an Italian father and an English mother. His trust is all powerful and all artists who desire Spanish engagements must pass through his managerial apparatus.

AT the Synagogue of Reichenberg (Bohemia), on the Hebrew New Year's Day, the Ninety-second Psalm of Schubert, for four male voices and baritone solo, was performed, after having adapted to the music the original words. This work of Schubert has never been executed publicly and is unknown to most of his admirers. It was reproduced without any indication of the author in a collection of Hebrew liturgical music, published after Schubert's death at Vienna, under the title of "Shir Zion," and the good cantor of Reichenberg had no suspicion that the psalm he performed did not come from the Promised Land.

IT is sad indeed for the exchange editor to find such a lack of originality and want of appropriateness in the selection of names for musical clubs all over the country. One of the most overworked titles of all is "The Ladies' Musical Club." As a matter of course it is presumed that all women who are admitted to membership in a musical club are ladies. What would intelligent women think of the men who organized a musical society and then named it "The Gentlemen's Musical Club"? In art such words as "ladies," "gentlemen" and "professor" are as absurd as the prefix "Miss" or "Mrs." upon the professional card or circular. It is high time for the Americans who have artistic aspirations to discourage provincialisms and vulgarity.

RICHMOND, Va., Friday.—F. Flaxington Harker, a well-known English musician, arrived at Biltmore to-day, having reached New York from Liverpool Saturday. He will on Sunday succeed Caryle Florio as organist and choir director of All Souls', George W. Vanderbilt's half million-dollar church, at Biltmore.

In engaging Mr. Harker, Mr. Vanderbilt learned that there are some things that a man cannot do without difficulty, even when he has millions at his back. Some persons, presumably living in New York, strongly opposed Mr. Vanderbilt in his efforts to bring Mr. Harker here. They hold that Mr. Vanderbilt cannot bring an organist here from abroad under contract, and the efforts to prevent his doing so were carried as far as possible. The servants of the estate were approached by secret agents with the idea of learning the name of the organist and the time of his arrival, in the hope of being able to interfere.

The Rev. Dr. R. R. Swope, rector of All Souls' Church, was asked some time ago by letter to tell what he knew of the matter, but it is understood that he paid no attention to the request. The fact that Mr. Vanderbilt contemplated the importation of an organist is said to have been brought to the attention of the Immigration Bureau at Washington some time ago.

THE above was published in the New York Herald last week. Whether or not the Immigration Bureau can interfere in this case will be seen later. The Vanderbilts have made their great fortunes in this country, so why send to Europe when there so many good organists to be secured right here in America? The American artist has good right to complain.

All doubts as to the visit of Ignace Paderewski to this country were removed when Carnegie Hall was engaged for the pianist's first recital on February 14. Other recitals will follow later. His opera "Manru," which brings him to this country, will be sung on February 12. This date is the twenty-eighth anniversary of Maurice Grau's first activity as a manager. In order to come here Paderewski will be compelled to give up his tours in Spain and Italy. On the 24th of this month he will begin a tour in Germany and Austria, and he will play in London at the end of December. He leaves for this country the last week of that month in time to begin with the "Manru" rehearsals on January 1.

THE above appeared in the New York Sun October 9. The Philharmonic Society's public rehearsal takes place February 14 in the afternoon. Up to this writing Carnegie Hall is not engaged for that evening. No one has negotiated for a date at Carnegie Hall for Paderewski.

There is no doubt that the municipality of Paris has granted a concession of the site of the Cirque d'Hiver to Leoncavallo, the brother of the composer, who proposes to erect thereon an international theatre. He announces that he will produce there the Italian repertory of the publishing house of Sonzogno, which seems to have been driven out of Italy by the Ricordis, and the Wagner repertory sung in German with a German orchestra.

INTERNATIONAL THEATRE AT PARIS.

The French do not look with much favor on the project. They regard it as merely an opening wedge for the introduction of the Italian and German schools. Of course they profess to have no desire to close their artistic frontiers to strangers, but are always glad to welcome masterpieces, wherever they come from, which, moreover, always are favorably received at the two subventioned theatres, the Opéra and the Opéra Comique. But the journal that gives this expression to its feelings cannot at the same time but feel disgusted at seeing so many native composers, of quite as much talent as those with whom the country is threatened, dancing attendance for half a score of years at the doors of the opera houses, while musicasters, singing scenes like "La Bohême," are graciously installed. In fact, Paris is like New York: "No native need apply."

What is the lesson to be learned from this invasion? is asked. It teaches Paris and France that in other countries people can, without calling for aid from the Government, organize and open theatres for their productions. In France national production is choked by want of union and good understanding, and consequently the slightest effort by one is opposed by the hostility of another. "The noblest initiatives fall into the hands of scamps who first exploit them and then ruin them." Who may perhaps guess at some of the "filous," but there are so many whose trade it is to prey on artists. We all know how a composer has a début performed, or how an artist makes a début, in Italy.

Meanwhile the poor composer curses his fate instead of cursing himself, he gnaws the bones that are thrown him, while the publisher sits behind his desk, occupied solely in exchanging paper covered with semi-quavers for good 5 franc pieces. But what use can it be to ask the men who have made themselves rich by sucking the brain composers to build or aid in building a théâtre d'essai for lyric pieces, or a concert hall for symphonists? None whatever; we prefer to put things off till to-morrow and watch our neighbor and shut the door in his face.

"The best remedy for this state of things," our contemporary writes, "seems to be the success of the proposed Italian and German theatre. When the avenue that runs from the Louvre to the Arc de l'Etoile shall become the triumphal road through which march the Italian trombones and the German big drums we may begin to open our eyes and close our ranks."

Very pretty. Here in New York we have had the big drums of Germany and the trombones of Italy parading our streets for years, but where is the American opera?

SCIENTIFIC AND LITERARY TRIBUTES TO MUSIC.

HERE is a lament by the late Charles Darwin that should make some agnostics think:

If I had to live my life again, I would have made it a rule to read some poetry and listen to some music at least once every week, for perhaps the part of my brain now atrophied would then have kept active through use. The loss of these tastes is a loss of happiness, and may possibly be injurious to the intellect, and more probably to the moral character, by enfeebling the emotional part of our nature.

It is plain after reading the above that Darwin deplored his neglect of music and poetry, but supposing he could have lived his life over again and cultivated his emotional nature, would he in that event have expounded his scientific doctrine of evolution? The pros and cons of this question would make an interesting debate. Other scientists have left their tributes to the power of music and their reverence for music as an art, but there seems to be none whose regrets over having neglected music are sadder or more pathetic than those bequeathed to the world by the author of "Origin of Species."

As music is frequently called the sister of poetry t seems natural to find many eloquent tributes to nusic by poets of all countries and centuries. William Shakespeare leads all the other poets in the number of his sayings that exalt the divine art. That the immortal bard of Avon understood something about the foundation of music is made clear in his familiar quotation by him:

Keep time. How sour sweet music is,
When time is broke, and no proportion kept!

Another Shakespearian tribute to music and one hat might serve to test our friends is expressed n this statesmanlike verse:

The man that hath no music in himself,
Nor is not mov'd with concord of sweet sounds,
Is fit for treasons, stratagems and spoils.
The motions of his spirit are dull as night,
And his affections dark as Erebus.
Let no such man be trusted.

Lord Byron in one line says:

There is music in all things, if men had ears.

The doctors who are recommending the "music ure" will find that Alexander Pope antedated iem when he wrote this verse:

Music the fiercest grief can charm,
And fate's severest rage disarm;
Music can soften pain to ease,
And make despair and madness please;
Our joys below it can improve,
And antedate the bliss above.

John Milton in one of his flights of fancy wrote:

I was all ear, and took in strains that might Create a soul under the ribs of death.

This practical and wholesome remark is attrib-ed to Horace Walpole:

Had I children my utmost would be to make them mu-ians. Considering I have no ear, nor even thought of usic, the preference seems odd; and yet it is embraced on equent reflection.

Victor Hugo voices his sentiments in prose-oetry as follows:

Music is the vapor of art. It is to poetry what revery is to thought, what fluid is to liquid, what the ocean of clouds is to the ocean of waves.

And here is the great Napoleon's endorsement:

Music, of all the liberal arts, has the greatest influence over the passions, and is that to which the legislator ought to give the greatest encouragement.

Both the state and the Church can applaud these sentiments by Addison:

Music is the only sensual gratification which mankind may indulge in to excess without injury to moral or religious feelings.

In one of his yielding moments the stern essayist and biographer, Thomas Carlyle, wrote this line:

Music is well said to be the speech of angels.

The more sympathetic poet Longellow said something very similar, for here are his words:

Music is the language spoken by angels.

Here is another statesmanlike tribute credited to Cicero:

Plato says that a change in the songs of musicians can change the state of commonwealths.

This beautiful utterance is found among the writings of Thomas Morley:

I ever held this sentence of the poet as a canon of my creed, that "whom God loveth not, they love not music."

The English author, J. H. Shorthouse, writes in one of his chapters:

The life that is in tune with the melodies of heaven cannot fail of being happy.

In Edwin Arnold's "Light of Asia" we find this musical stanza:

Rich, celestial music thrilled the air
From hosts on hosts of shining ones, who thronged
Eastward and westward, making bright the night.

The poet Heine was something of a music critic and on occasions was aroused to expressions like this:

Franz Liszt's playing often seems to me like a melodious agony of the spectre world.

Chopin—the Raphael of the piano.

Charles Kingsley, the author of "Hypatia" and "Westward Ho," has contributed the following sane and delightful paragraph:

There is something sacramental in perfect metre and rhythm. They are outward and visible signs of an inward and spiritual grace; namely, of the self-possessed and victorious touches of one who has so far subdued nature as to be able to hear that universal sphere-music of hers, speaking of which Mr. Carlyle says that "all deepest thoughts instinctively vent themselves in song."

There were moments in Schopenhauer's life when he was not pessimistic, and in those moments he penned lines like these:

Music, therefore, represents the real thing, the thing itself, not a mere appearance. The other arts only speak of the shadow; music speaks of the real substance, for it represents the will.

The following stanza will be recalled by the lovers of Tennyson:

Love took up the harp of life, and smote on all the chords with might;
Smote the chord of self, that trembling passed in music out of sight.

Shelley enriches the tributes to music thus:

Music, when soft voices die,
Vibrates on the memory;
Odors, when sweet violets sicken,
Live within the sense they quicken.

John Ruskin, critic, philosopher and philanthropist, wrote:

Music is the nearest at hand, the most orderly, the most delicate and the most perfect of all bodily pleasures; it is also the only one which is equally helpful to all ages of man—helpful from the nurse's song to her infant to the music, unheard of others, which often, if not most frequently, haunts the deathbed of pure and innocent spirits.

From the humane and gifted Cowper one may look for such lines as this:

How soft the music of those village bells,
Falling at intervals upon the ear
In cadence sweet!

A powerful truth is embodied in this statement by Homer:

Music was taught to Achilles in order to moderate his passions.

It is said of Goethe that he did not appreciate Schubert's wonderful setting of the "Erl König," after first hearing the song. Nevertheless, the great German poet and novelist was not wholly indifferent to music, for here is his fine advice to the world:

A man should hear a little music, read a little poetry and see a fine picture every day of his life, in order that worldly cares may not obliterate the sense of the beautiful which God has implanted in the human soul.

George Eliot, the greatest woman writer of the nineteenth century, was a good pianist and possessor of a rich, contralto voice. That she should utter eloquent words about music was not strange. On one of the days when she wrote poetry (which was not often) she penned these lines:

So faith is strong
Only when we are strong; shrinks
When we shrink.
It comes when music stirs us, and the chords
Moving on some grand climax shake our souls
With influx new that makes new energies.
It comes in swellings of the heart and tears
That rise at noble and at gentle deeds.

Harriet Beecher Stowe, author of "Uncle Tom's Cabin," expressed a grand truth in this tribute:

Where painting is weakest—namely, in the expression of the highest moral and spiritual ideas—there music is sublimely strong.

Although it is many years since Benjamin Disraeli wrote:

Were it not for music we might in these days say, the Beautiful is dead, it is even more true now than when the great English statesman uttered the words.

SAINT-SAENS AND GERMANY.

M. SAINT-SAENS was lately decorated by the Emperor William with the order "Pour le Merite," a distinction which he justly deserves. Then as there are enterprising journalists in Germany as there are in America, a report became current that M. Saint-Saëns was about to write the music to a German libretto, presumably on a German subject, and a German paper, the Boersen Courier of Berlin, commissioned one of its correspondents, M. Levin, to interview the celebrated composer on the subject. The correspondent wrote politely to the musician, inclosing a letter of introduction and asking when he could be received. M. Saint-Saëns replied:

SEPTEMBER 8.

DEAR SIR.—It would have been quite easy for you to see me at Beziers. There was no need of a letter of introduction for that.

The Boersen Courier, which was lately my most bitter enemy, may have changed its attitude; I am thankful for its doing so. As to granting to you an audience, I cannot, for it would be inevitably an interview, and that I never grant any more to French than to foreign journalists. Pray excuse me, and accept my thanks for your marks of sympathy and my compliments. C. SAINT-SAENS.

The Berlin correspondent replied that during his connection of sixteen years with the Boersen Courier he had never written an "irreverent" line about M. Saint-Saëns, that on the contrary he had written a warm eulogy on the occasion of his sixtieth birthday. To this the composer replied:

SEPTEMBER 9.

DEAR SIR.—Do not have such a bad opinion of me, I beg. I am very little sensitive to criticism and also to praise, not by an exaggerated feeling of my importance, which would be foolishness, but because, as I produce my works to accomplish a function of my nature, as an apple tree produces apples, I need not trouble myself about the opinions which may be formed about me.

The Boersen Courier was at the head of the movement directed against me when I was received at Berlin with hisses and a veritable revolt; it was, I think, in 1887.

Since then I have never wished to visit Berlin nor Germany. At present my nomination as a member of the Academy, the success of "Samson et Dalila," and finally the high distinction which the Emperor has been kind enough to honor me with, have effaced all that.

C. SAINT-SAENS.

M. Levin then asked permission to publish these letters and to his request received a reply:

PARIS, September 11, 1901.

DEAR SIR—You can publish my letter if you think fit, but I should wish no more importance be attributed to my words than I wished to give them.

I can forgive personal insults; I can be grateful to the public for its applause, to the artists for their assistance and to His Majesty for his imperial courtesy; but there is another thing which I ought not to forget and never will forget. I have had three generals in my family. Chauvin I was born, Chauvin I will remain till my last sigh.

Receive, &c. C. SAINT-SAENS.

Levin sent these letters to the Temps, and declared that while he could not but bow to the decisions of M. Saint-Saëns he could not but regret them, all the more that the welcome which his compatriots would have extended to M. Saint-Saëns would have been warm and cordial.

Then M. Saint-Saëns took his pen and wrote to the Temps a kind of postscript:

DEAR SIR—In thanking you for having published my letters addressed to M. Levin I beg you to add a word of explanation respecting the conclusions drawn from them. M. Levin seems to believe that I refuse to return to Germany, which would little agree with the sentiments of gratitude expressed in my letters.

It is true I have refused offers of an engagement, but much against my inclination I am nailed down at Paris till the end of October by rehearsals of "Les Barbares," afterward I shall be compelled, as every year, to go and seek nearer the equator the temperature which is necessary for me. For the same reason I cannot go to Russia during the concert season. Believe me, &c.,

C. SAINT-SAENS.

From which change of tone it may be inferred that M. Saint-Saëns, the born Chauvinist, will some day revisit Berlin.

A VITAL QUESTION.

The following interview with Marc A. Blumenberg, editor-in-chief of THE MUSICAL COURIER, by Leonard Liebling, was published in the Berlin "German Times" of September 23:

FOR six years, the length of my residence in Europe, I have been asking myself the Question. I have put it to others, too. Most of them lacked the answer even as I did. Some few knew, but they spoke not. Once I tried to answer the Question myself. Then those who knew said that I was wrong. But they said nothing else, and left me unknowing.

Last week there came here from the strenuous city of New York the one man who could answer the Question fully, freely and fearlessly. To him I resolved to go and ask.

He calls himself Marc A. Blumenberg. I have often heard him referred to as the Napoleon of musical affairs in the United States. I have heard that he dictates musical conditions there. I have heard that he fixes the market value of artists. And I have heard him called all the names with which all successful men are favored by distanced competitors and empty handed friends.

For a very successful man is this Blumenberg, a man who knows not only how to win success, but understands also how to retain it. A man is he who has thoroughly mastered his chosen field; a chessplayer who knows his board and its every figure. He plays the game scientifically. No move without cause, and no cause without effect, might be his motto. A man is he of keen vision and wide range, a man of to-day by all means, but one who understands yesterday and divines to-morrow.

Because he is all this, and, incidentally, Senior Editor of the New York MUSICAL COURIER, I went to him with my Question. I found him coming from the Dresdener Bank—a good sign—and just about to step into his waiting cab.

"I have a Question to ask," I began.

"Jump in; I've an appointment to keep, with Manager Pierson of the Opera. Vorwarts, Kutscher. Now fire away."

He fixed his keen eyes on me, and I asked the Question.

"You wish to know," he repeated slowly, as one given to accurate weighing of details, "what becomes of the thousands of Americans who come to Germany, Austria, England, Italy, France and Belgium, to study music? That is to say, the thousands of Americans who have come, those who are here now, and those who will come? What becomes of the young pianist, the young singer, the young violinist, the young composer, the young violoncellist, the mature teacher and the middle-aged organist, who for a decade have been traveling eastward in endless, religious procession, with rapt eyes fixed on the musical Mecca of their own making?!!

"That's what I would like to know," I replied, modestly accepting this elaborate amendment to the Question.

"By Stcherbatcheff, so would I," cried out my wise man, bringing down his umbrella with a terrific whack onto the floor of the cab. "That is to be taken relatively," he continued, calm at once, "for I know what becomes of them."

"What?" I ventured.

"The pianist becomes the powerful and purse proud President of a gigantic Trust, the singer marries him and organizes a local musical society; the violinist goes West, just in time to reach the bed of a dying miner who hands him a paper, sere and yellow, and apparently worthless, which soon after proves the violinist to be the sole and undisputed owner of the richest gold mine ever discovered in America—"

"But—"

"The young composer becomes the trusted partner of the fortunate violinist. The violoncellist is raved over at Newport by seven of the richest heiresses in the Four Hundred. Seven enthusiastic papas press the young man to marry, and he finally weds the very richest of the seven maidens, who is also marvelously beautiful. The mature music teacher at once upon his return goes into the banking business, and finds his chief pleasure in making Wall Street tremble. The middle-aged organist—"

"I don't believe all that. You are making fun of me," I interrupted.

"You are shrewd," said Mr. Blumenberg; "you have guessed that I was joking. Now I will tell you the truth. The painful fact of the matter is that the pianist has no need to become a Trust President, for he gives many recitals each season that attract vast audiences of his admiring countrymen. The money pours into the box office, and Paderewski realizes at last that he has met his match in America. The singer is secured by a cast iron contract to Grau, who, happy that at last he can pay an American more than his foreign artists, literally loads her with money. The public listens only when she sings, and the critics come to learn. The violinist causes duels among the managers, who fight for the privilege of engaging him. The composer sends boxes to his friends for each new production of his numerous grand operas. Grau mounts them at fabulous expense to his privy purse. The critics snarl because all our symphony concerts are addicted to the works of the young American composer, and absolutely ignore the efforts of talented foreigners like Tschaikowsky, Beethoven, Strauss and Brahms. Quartet societies play his works ad nauseam. The programs of all our piano recitals look like a publisher's list of his compositions. And the mature music teacher! Lessons at $10 the half hour are laughed at; $15, or you go to one of his seven assistants. He has a suite at the Waldorf—"

"I'm afraid you're in a jesting mood to-day. I see you won't answer the Question."

"You wish to know what really becomes of nearly all your compatriots who study music here?"

"Yes."

"Nothing—absolutely nothing. Nothing that warrants the sacrifice of time, money and health, laid on the altars of European teachers, by these misguided students, these—"

"Why misguided?"

"Because half, three-quarters of them have no right to enter the musical profession, and even fewer, to practice it. The pianist, the singer, the violinist, the organist, the violoncellist, they all become teachers. There are too many teachers now. And the majority of them are absolutely incompetent. That is because they have been insufficiently educated."

"But the conservatories here—"

"They offer no academical training. There are no graduates proper, and those who have studied in them for a year or two consider themselves finished musicians. There is no authoritative institution, no University of Music that makes our musicians as our doctors, lawyers, engineers and architects are made."

"But those things are done by the Government. Naturally enough, public safety demands that a doctor be legally entitled to practice; you can't expect a Government to interest itself seriously in such a comparatively unimportant subject as music, a subject"—

"And do you mean to tell me that an incompetent singing teacher is not a menace to public welfare? Does he not ruin throats, and chests, and muscles, and larynxes, and lungs? Does he not time and again cause pathological conditions? Have therapeutics never corrected the crimes of singing teachers?"

"But instrumental teachers"—I protested.

"Just as bad. They ruin the ear, and the sense of touch, and the wrist, and the muscles, and the shoulders."

"But, granting all that, is not Europe the home of music?" I asked, making a wide detour and avoiding the corner into which I was being driven; "and if nobody had ever come here to study, how could we have hoped to possess teachers in our own country?"

Not at all nonplussed, Mr. Blumenberg promptly replied: "Of course our musical young men came, and they returned home and taught. But their pupils came here, and their pupils' pupils. Now, if this thing has been going on for years and is going on to-day, of what use is the priceless knowledge that can't be imparted to others? Why come to Europe for the same thing that can be had much cheaper and as good at home? For instance, to make my logic clear: Thirty years ago there were some great teachers of piano, like Liszt, Tausig and Kullak. They had many pupils, American, German and all nationalities. The pupils of them are the teachers of to-day. Did the Americans learn less than the Germans? Are they less receptive? Strange that a people who are not usually slow in proclaiming its citizens quick of intellect should draw the line at its musicians, and believe that of all the disciples who sat at the feet of those great masters the American learned and understood least. And so with singing, and violin, and composition."

Again I tacked, and drove home what I considered a fatal shaft. "But how about almost the last words of our lamented President McKinley?" I asked; "did he not tell us that we must not expect to live on ourselves alone; that we must import from other countries, that reciprocity"—

"Reciprocity? Yes, indeed, we want reciprocity, but where is the reciprocity in this wholesale annual emigration of our young blood and energy to Europe, where the reciprocity in this pouring of millions of dollars into foreign countries for board, and clothes, and lessons, and music, and instruments, and amusements? What do we get? Where is the return demanded by the simplest rule of political economy? We get musical instruction, which we impart to others so successfully that they too must exile themselves before they in turn—bah! what a hideous roaring farce! What with his lack of proper academical training and authorization, and his self-confessed inadequacy—just proved conclusively by me—it is no wonder that the American musician has no standing in the community."

I began to feel that somehow Mr. Blumenberg and I had changed positions. He was the inquisitor, and I, who had come as a harmless interrogator, suddenly stood forth as the unwilling champion of a cause in which I did not believe. I cared not to fight further such a one-sided battle; I had heard enough, and was fearful of more truth. All this encouraging information was destined for the readers of the musical department of the German Times, nearly all of whom are music students. For them as much as for myself I have asked.

"Ah! here we are," announced the Inquisitor cheerily as we stopped before the Intendantur in the Dorotheestrasse; if you'd care to wait in the cab, I could give you some further points—"

"No, thank you, I think I have enough. You've answered the Question, you know."

As I walked away it suddenly struck me that he hadn't after all. I wonder if anybody can? LEONARD LIEBLING.

Madame Poole-King.

MME. CLARA POOLE-KING'S success at the Worcester festival has secured for her other important engagements. The Handel and Haydn Society, Boston, has engaged her for the special performance of "Elijah," on November 11, and also for "The Messiah," which the same society will sing on December 22.

Following are some of Madame Poole-King's criticisms on her singing at Worcester:

There was so much to be satisfied with in the performance of the Requiem that the disposition to find fault gave way to the pleasant duty of thanksgiving and gratulation. The soloists formed more than a fairly capable quartet, and performances might easily be recalled in which a much higher individual talent was enlisted and less satisfactory results attained. Madame Poole-King was most successful, and together with the tenor and bass made a most sympathetic and ingratiating harmony, painstaking and satisfactory.—New York Tribune.

The performance of the "Beatitudes" was an improvement over that of last year. Better discretion was shown in casting the solo parts. Among the artists Madame Poole-King should be mentioned as being wholly adequate to the demands made upon her. In the Requiem Madame Poole-King was also wholly successful in her role, and taking it altogether this latter work was of an exceptionally high order.—New York Times.

Madame Poole-King acquitted herself most creditably. Her work was well received, and her singing deserved special mention. Madame Poole-King looked younger than she did when she was here in 1888, 1889 and 1890. She was in excellent voice, charming and altogether attractive. This is her début in the United States after a most successful career of over six years in Europe.—Worcester Gazette.

Madame Poole-King appeared to much better advantage than on the previous night, her voice showing to greater satisfaction and more brilliant in tone. She had a fine grasp of the idea and spirit of the work.—Springfield Republican.

Madame Poole-King of all the artists is perhaps the best known. She sang, as is her wont, like a painstaking and thoughtful artist, giving intense satisfaction to all.—Boston Herald.

Madame Poole-King appeared to fine advantage in both works. In the one instance the mezzo-soprano role is really more strenuous, calling for more intensity of expression, more pathos and has more variety in it. Madame Poole-King was highly dramatic, and in her important climax carried the audience with her. Her singing was particularly effective and by far her best work was in the "Aeterna." This trio for mezzo, tenor and bass was one of the most satisfactory things of the evening.—Worcester Telegram.

CHICAGO MENDELSSOHN CLUB.—The soloists engaged for the three concerts of the Chicago Mendelssohn Club are Joseph Baernstein, Charlotte Maconda, Mabelle Crawford and Esther Feé.

FANNY RICHTER-FUCHS.

MME. FANNY RICHTER-FUCHS, a pianist who has resided in New York for some years, is about to re-enter the ranks as a concert performer. She has already, for that matter, re-entered public life, for she played at the concert which the New York Liederkranz gave at the Pan-American last June. Her recitals here in New York have all been under the auspices of society. Among her patrons Madame Richter-Fuchs includes the Vanderbilts, Stillmans, Rockefellers, Tiffanys, Knoxs, Norries, Callenders, Mortimers and other wealthy and influential New York families. But an artist of her rare gifts and training belongs to the greater public, and arrangements are now being completed for a series of recitals and concerts throughout the country. Before the music committee of the New York Liederkranz and a few other invited guests Madame Richter-Fuchs played last Friday afternoon at Steinway Hall. The style and variety of the compositions upon her impromptu program at once established her as an artist of supreme endowments, emotional yet balanced; virile yet throughly refined and polished and with a technical equipment the equal of certainly the great composers of her own sex.

Here is a list of compositions she played on this interesting occasion:

Nocturne, C minor.....Chopin
Papillons .....Schumann
Legende .....Liszt
Waltz in A flat.....Chopin
Sonata Appassionata.....Beethoven

The above works were played in the order requested by the guests, and were all the more enjoyable because the conventional program regulations were not followed. Her Chopin playing was as remarkable for its wholesomeness as for its poetical insight, and her limpid, full, rich tone and correct phrasing were shown in the "Papillons." The "Legende," by Liszt, was strong and moving, and in the "Appassionata" she revealed the Beethoven of maturity, and altogether gave a convincing performance of the great sonata.

After reading this brief criticism of Madame Richter-Fuchs' performance the musical public will not be surprised to hear that she made a name in Germany as a wonderkind, and that she studied with such masters as Liszt, d'Albert, Stavenhagen and Barth. Fanny Richter was born in Berlin. Her father was a high school director, and her mother an accomplished musician. She played in public at the early age of five years, creating a profound impression at Wiesbaden, where the infantile prodigy made her début. A tour through Germany, Belgium and Holland was arranged by the father of the child. In the meanwhile her education went on, for we read of her taking an examination when she was twelve years old at the High School of Music in Berlin. After four years' study it is recorded that she passed with the highest honors, and all of her subsequent study as a child was earned, she having won the scholarships or stipendiums offered by the Government. Those present at her final examination at the High School of Music were Dr. Hans Von Bülow, Joachim, Heinrich Barth and Rudorff, Bargiel and Raif. While still a student Fanny Richter distinguished herself at a Berlin Philharmonic concert, playing with the orchestra the C minor Concerto by Beethoven.

It was Van der Stucken who first influenced Fanny Richter to visit the United States. She came and made her début in this country with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Among the criticisms she received at the time are the following from the Boston Herald and Journal:

FANNY RICHTER-FUCHS.

The appearance of a pianist announced simply as "Fanny Richter" at Music Hall yesterday afternoon proved to be one of the pleasant surprises of the season. The lady brought thus abruptly before the public was in no need of an introduction, for her abilities at once gained her the attention of her audience, and made her a favorite with all who heard her performance.

She had the assistance of an excellent orchestra under B. J. Lang's direction, and played the "Concerto No. 3," in C minor, op. 37, Beethoven (cadenza by Clara Schumann); the Polonaise in A flat major, op. 53, Chopin; the Nocturne in F sharp major, op. 15, Chopin; the "Legende," Liszt, and the Concerto No. 2, in A major, Liszt.

She has a striking individuality as a player which few pianists of the day possesses, and she recalls with rare distinctness the playing of Teresa Carreño at her best. She has a complete mastery of the keyboard, and her technical accomplishments are used with the taste, skill and judgment of a true musician. The fire of a true genius flashes out continually in her work, and she at once charms and delights by her playing.

The contrasts of the program were brought out in an admirable way by her readings, and she showed herself to be a most intelligent student of the composers represented in her day's selections.

Her audience was at her control after the first movement of the Beethoven Concerto, and from that on her value as an artist was enthusiastically admitted on all sides. She is an acquisition to the list of concert pianists that would have found a hearty welcome earlier in the season.

She has but recently arrived in this country, coming here from Berlin, and it is to be hoped that she may remain to have further hearing in this and other cities.—Boston Herald.

The Boston Journal said: "Miss Fanny Richter made her first appearance before an American audience (and a very large one, too) in Music Hall yesterday afternoon. The young pianist had the assistance of an orchestra conducted by B. J. Lang in the following program: Beethoven, Concerto No. 3, in C minor, op. 37; Chopin, Polonaise in A flat major, op. 53, and Nocturne, in F sharp major, op. 15; Liszt, 'Legende' and Concerto No. 2, in A major.

"This young lady has evident talent, well and intelligently cultivated. Her technic is sure, facile and brilliant; her tone strong, full and telling; her use of the pedal admirable. She plays with absolute concentration upon the music, and evidently has sufficient self-command to listen to what she is playing and judge of its effect. We do not know who her teachers have been, but she gives evidence of having been brought up in, and sympathizing with, a rather conservative school. Thank heaven for that! In the Beethoven concerto, for instance, she showed a regard for rhythm and unity of tempo which did one good to find in any young artist. Now and then a phrase might sound a little stiff to ears accustomed to all the finesse of modern 'rendering' and 'interpretation'; but the fine musical feeling was to be detected by him 'der heimlich lauschet.' And it speaks well for Miss Richter's musical insight that she threw off this 'classic' reserve as soon as she attacked the things by Liszt.

"Of her playing yesterday afternoon we liked her performance of the Beethoven Concerto and the Chopin Nocturne best. In these things she showed not only genuine appreciation of the gist of the music, but also ample power to do what she tried to do."

Mme. Richter-Fuchs will play on November 18, as soloist of the concert of the A Capella Club, of Milwaukee, and while in the West she expects to fill other engagements. The husband of the pianist, Albert Fuchs, is a man of artistic tastes, and one who is at heart and soul in sympathy with his wife, and since their happy marriage several years ago has been a great inspiration to her. Although an artist of ripe gifts Madame Richter-Fuchs in her private life illustrates the charm of well bred, refined and modest womanhood.

AS the last form of this issue went to press yesterday information reaches us that Paderewski will reach here early in February. Negotiations concluded recently and made public at a late hour yesterday announced that the pianist will make a three months' tour here, beginning in February.

BERTA GROSSE-THOMASON.—Mme. Berta Grosse-Thomason, the pianist, assisted the Schumann Quartet at a chamber concert given on October 9, at 11 Elm street, Morristown, N. J., the home of Mrs. Herman Behr. Two movements from the Schumann Piano Quintet in E flat were played and the other ensemble pieces were an Andante by Rubinstein, a movement from the Haydn Quartet in D, and a quartet by Rheinberger. The vocal soloist was Herman Hovermann, baritone. The audience was composed of the fashionable residents in the vicinity.

ANOTHER SUCCESSFUL ARENS PUPIL.—Miss Grace Carroll, contralto, recently a pupil of F. X. Arens, sang with great success at recitals and various concerts since her return to her home in San Francisco, Cal. Owing to her success she was promptly engaged as voice teacher at Miss Head's seminary, one of the best known young ladies' schools on the Pacific Coast. She has also been engaged as solo contralto for one of the leading Presbyterian churches in San Francisco.

Martha Remmert is not going to Gotha, as she has just opened a Liszt Academy at Berlin.

PARIS, October 3, 1901.

AS is the case in all such communities where concerts engage public attention Paris, like other similarly conditioned cities, has its peculiarly piano infected and affected atmosphere and the pianist becomes an especial item of musical interest. The pianist, ever since the days of the manufacturing rivalry, has been made a formidable concert feature and that artistic industrial contest originated here where the same old firms are engaged in it as they were some seventy-five years ago in the days of Kalkbrenner, Doehler, Chopin and Liszt, and Herz, and Thalberg, and Pixis and Heaven knows who, including the merely local players.

Right now Erard and Pleyel are the chief supporters of the two Philharmonic concert schemes—that is Paris orchestral institutions, the Colonne and the Lamoreaux Orchestras, outside of the Government subsidy; they were far back in the nineteenth century also the two rivals that vied with one another to appear before their compatriots as supporters of the musical art.

No one ever questions their disinterestedness. Piano manufacturers who support concert schemes and who pay artists, or help towards paying them, do immeasurable good towards the propagation of the best kind of music and are the elements that insist upon public performances because they desire to have the public learn how artistic their pianos are built. There may be selfishness in all this, but it is the kind of selfishness that builds up cities and nations. Outside of the newspaper business every man should work to advance his interests, because in doing so he advances the interests of his surroundings and helps to advance his community on the road of progress. The only persons who should not work for themselves are newspaper men, for they commit crimes in being selfish. Selfishness in the newspaper business may also help the community by building up a great newspaper, but the newspaper man ought not to share in the benefits unless he proposes to be condemned.

The piano business in its artistic divisions has brought the piano virtuoso to the foreground as the prominent faculty in the concert system, just as the newspaper has made the artistic piano known to the masses. It is all one community of interests and an intermingling of benefits. Erard and Pleyel began this work first, because in those days the United States was unknown as a piano producing country and the Chickering house was, as yet, in its infancy. Germany was dismembered and was not only suffering from the ravages of the Napoleonic wars, but had its revolutionary fevers on, which prevented industrial development. Broadwoods in England had no rivals and therefore made no progress, having no incentive.

Never since the beginning of the piano question has there been such a season of piano virtuosi as the approaching one promises to be, the appended list, although extensive, showing only the preliminary engagements. I shall do my utmost to be correct in the classification of the pianists and the pianos they use, to illustrate how commercial rivalry enters into the artistic arena to stimulate the combatants.

NOUVELLE SOCIÉTÉ PHILHARMONIQUE DE PARIS.

Before doing so, however, I desire to recount the proposition made by the New Philharmonic Society of Paris, recently organized by Dr. Frankel, a Pole, I believe, who conducts a sanitarium at Zurich and another here at Auteuil, a suburban town. A Philharmonic society with us or in England, Russia and Germany, is usually an orchestral organization; here anything with or without musical pretensions can properly designate itself as a Philharmonic society, and this new one, begun by Dr. Frankel with a private subscription of his own of 50,000 francs, is a chamber music scheme, which will give subscription concerts in a small hall at 8 Rue d'Athenes. There are accommodations for about 250 people, and there are no music halls in Paris, except the private enterprises known as Salle Erard and Salle Pleyel, both connected with piano firms, neither of which could be used by the new Philharmonic because it engages soloists using both pianos, and it cannot move about from hall to hall as it would be compelled to do, using Erard Hall for Erard pianists and Pleyel Hall for Pleyel pianists. This cannot be done; hence an independent hall had to be leased, and as there is no music hall here the best was done under the circumstances.

It is strange that Paris has no music hall, but when one considers that music is virtually under Governmental control, beginning with the National Conservatory and its branches throughout France and passing through the schools and operas to the sibsidized orchestra, it is not strange, for the people depend upon the State to build a concert hall, and as long as the people have no use for one the State doth not build one. The Trocadero was built to include its present large hall with organ, but it is too large except for fêtes, and its acoustics are so defective as to make it useless for artistic musical purposes. Symphony concerts are given in "circuses," in theatres and in large sheds such as are used for hippodromes, but that is of no consequence, for many people are engaged in conversation constantly during concerts in Paris and these talkers are not heard as distinctly in such buildings as they are in halls.

This new Philharmonic Society having engaged a number of pianists, paying them fees, which is not the case with the two symphony organizations, who get the piano soloists through the piano manufacturers, the list of piano soloists for next season is consequently swollen to the following Falstaffian proportions—all kinds of performances being included, although all engagements are not yet closed:

Teresa Carreño.....Erard
Gabrilowitsch .....Erard
Mme. Roger Miclos.....Pleyel
Riera (the Spanish player).....Erard
Levin (Rubinstein medallist).....Erard
Diemer .....Pleyel
Risler .....Pleyel
Pugno .....Pleyel
Wurmser (not Wormser).....Pleyel
Cortot .....Pleyel

Some of these are engaged by the New Philharmonic, which has also secured for its season:

Harold Bauer.....Erard
Mlle. Therese Chaigneau (very talented young artist) ..... Erard
Frederic Lamond (great artist).....Erard
Mlle. Cecile Silberberg.....Pleyel
M. Stavenhagen.....Erard

MORE NAMES.

Both Erard and Pleyel being liberal supporters of the regular symphony concerts—Lamoureux and Colonne—insist that no foreign pianos shall be used at these events. This we would call Chauvinism, but it is a kind of patriotism we should emulate. If our opera subsidizers were to insist that no foreign singers should be heard in America on an opera stage supported solely by Americans we would soon have a large number of American singers engaged in studying and singing in opera. But we are not Chauvinistic—as we shall see—and therefore not one American piano soloist is announced for next season in the United States (and certainly not in foreign countries), and our American resident singers still continue to do good work in church choir lofts, to which places they are exiled by the lack of the very Chauvinism that engages so many artists at home in their own countries—even for small or no salaries at all.

Erard and Pleyel and their supporters insist that as long as the French State subsidizes the two symphony organizations and they—the piano firms—contribute to the schemes, no foreign piano shall be played at these concerts. At the new symphony concerts any piano can be introduced, and therefore Eugen d'Albert, Moriz Rosenthal and Busoni will play at these concerts, each of them using a Steinway piano. Adding these names to the above it will be observed how formidable the pianistic scheme becomes this season in Paris.

Notwithstanding the opposition of the piano houses here and the press, to some extent, the Steinway piano has been used at symphony concerts here, once by Eugen d'Albert and once by Leonard Borwick, and big commotion ensued, and this season the inimitable, aggressive and fearless Rosenthal, pianist par excellence to himself and the world generally and a manipulator of tremendous resources, will play at one of the Lamoureux concerts, using a Steinway piano. This gives him an enormous advantage, for with all due respect to Paris piano builders I do not believe their piano could successfully parry an attack by Rosenthal who is going to give four recitals here after his symphony performance. The Steinway piano is ages ahead of any Parisian piano, and no one admits this with more grace than the makers here, who are now about to put pianos on the market after the full overstrung method of Steinway and the Bechstein and the American and German makers. Well, it is about time! Rosenthal is sure to create a sensation here, and if Harold Bauer could play on a Mason & Hamlin, instead of an Erard, the Parisians might find good reasons for congratulating themselves more that he is one of them. Playing on old scale pianos, no matter how carefully made, is a most ungrateful task. If the piano makers who produce these instruments would only hear what the suffering artists—men and women—say to me regarding these old-fashioned coffins they would at least attempt improvements and try to make modern pianos.

OTHER ARTISTS.

The self-same New Philharmonic Society has also engaged the following violin virtuosi:

Marteau.
Ysaye.
Kreisler.
Geloso.
Hugo Heerman.
Mme. Norman-Neruda.
Rebner.
Jean Ten Have (not Have Ten), and the 'cellists Hugo Becker, Julius Klengel, Casals and Mme. Marguerite Chaigneau, one of the Trio of Chaigneau sisters who are creating such a sensation over musical Europe. A manager who can get the Trio for America can make a fortune. The Trio is engaged for these concerts, as is also the Trio of Frankfort.

The Quartets engaged are:

Geloso (Paris), Hayot (Paris), Marteau (Geneva), Parent (Paris), Rosé (Vienna), Schörg (Brussels), Zimmer (Brussels), Ysaye (Brussels), Tchech (Prague).

The singers who are to appear are, some of them well known to us. How some of them can do justice to themselves in such a small hall seems incomprehensible to me, unless the walls and ceiling are removed. I may mention Marie Brema. How she going to control her voice in a 20x40 room. The list contains the names of:

Gulbranson, of Bayreuth fame.

Eleonore Blance, who is going on a Scandinavian tour under the energetic management of M. Robert Strakosch.

Felia Litvinne. (How is she going to sing in the room?)

Marie Olénine.

Mme. Richard Strauss (née De Ahna).

Mr. and Mrs. Henschel, and others equally long known.

The hearts of American managers would break if they knew the fees paid to most of these artists for the Parisian appearances. The two Symphony societies seldom pay anything and other societies very little more than that. Artists appear here for the prestige—most of them, of course, must do so—and then the English people must pay them about 25 per cent. of the amounts the Americans must pay to hear them. For instance: A singer getting nothing for singing here in Paris charges an English manager £20, or $100; the same singer will charge an American manager $400, and the American manager must guarantee a large number of concerts. Singers will cross to England for one or two engagements just to get London notices to reprint them—like Paris and Berlin notices—in THE MUSICAL COURIER, to show how great their successes have been in these cities over here. Artists sing and play very frequently free of charge, and most of the time for their expenses, for the sole purpose of getting good notices to have them read by the musical people of England and America through this paper. Many artists pay to be heard; actually pay money out of their own overladen treasuries, so that some of the leading papers here (for money, frequently) print criticisms about them, these notices to be used for an English and American campaign.

Why have I been propagating the theory that we Americans are fools for paying such inordinate figures to hear foreigners sing? Why? Because I know they get very small fees here and I know that they look upon us as idiots for paying them so lavishly and I know that American singers can never make headway under the prevailing conditions. It is not a prejudice against foreign singers, for they are entitled to all they can get out of America so long as we are willing to submit to such injustice; it is a prejudice against our American system which forced me to lay bare the iniquity, and I submit to all fair-minded people if the prejudice is not justified when I see how niggardly the people here support singers to whom we give forty times in a season. I recently found in Brussels that one of the stars at the opera there, a star who sings twice a week and sometimes more, gets 500 francs per week; another one singing star roles of lighter calibre 200 francs per week. These ladies ask us to pay them $600 a night—one asked—and the other $1,000 a week for a twenty week engagement. If we will pay these prices so much the better for them, but how about the moral support of the art of music in Europe and how about our moral support of our own people here?

These conditions must and will change through the compensating principle which is always at work. The artists who for years past have been singing for Frau Cosima Wagner for nothing will now get offers from the Prinz Regenten Opera at Munich. Bayreuth will be compelled to pay something hereafter. The old play, "Oh, you will get the world's reputation if I permit you to sing here at Bayreuth," is about used up. And so it will have to be in the United States after a while. The high salaries with us will drive the salaries higher on the Continent through the increased demand, and then we shall be compelled to pay such fierce figures that no manager can afford to enter into contracts with European singers without danger of bankruptcy. There have been many such bankruptcies already, and because of them the management pursuit in America is not viewed with envy. When salaries reach a prohibitory point bankruptcy will cease, because no manager will be found so foolish as to submit to the exaction. Then will come the day for a little Chauvinism with us; then we shall have good English opera. Then Americans will play the piano at home and abroad, for it is a paradoxical fact that Chauvinism carries with it a subjective admiration, just as our high protective tariff has made Europe stare at us aghast at the self-confidence we exhibited in locking out whatever we pleased, regardless of outside feeling.

With all its demonstrative Chauvinism which France betrays at every turn and which Parisians demonstrate in nearly every act, the whole world flocks to Paris, no other city carrying daily within its walls so many strangers. Paris does not invite us; if it did it would not be Chauvinistic, but it does passively invite us with its aggressive hostility to all institutions not Parisian or sympathetic toward Paris. Human nature admires the position assumed and actually sneers at the eclectic cosmopolitan who has no patriotism, no home, no country, no art and no conceit. When we give up our indifference and become practical disciples of Chauvin we will get some kind of American art and music the world outside of America will look into; as it now is we will pay outsiders to come to us to show us how Chauvinism pays them. It does certainly pay Paris.

Gregory Hast.

GREGORY HAST, the foremost concert tenor of England, sails on the Umbria, October 26, for a brief tournée of this country. Besides a repertory of between sixty and seventy cantatas and oratorios, the latter of which he studied with the veteran, Sims Reeves, Mr. Hast sings with equal artistic mastery a vast number of Italian, French, German and English songs. The two appended sample programs are illustrative of the versatility of the eminent English tenor in his recitals which are in such vogue on the Continent, as well as in London and the English provinces.

JAN KUBELIK.

UNQUESTIONABLY one of the interesting virtuosi of the present musical season in this country promises to be the young Bohemian violinist, Jan Kubelik, whose London successes the past two seasons have been both brilliant and sensational. Daniel Frohman, the well-known theatrical manager of this city, and Hugo Gorlitz, for so many years associated with the Paderewski tours, are to be the managers of the American tour, which opens in New York Monday evening, December 2, at Carnegie Hall, when Kubelik will have the assistance of Emil Paur and his Symphony Orchestra, and Miss Jessie Shay, solo pianist. On Saturday afternoon, December 7, Kubelik gives his first recital at Carnegie Hall, assisted again by Miss Shay, who has been engaged for the entire tour, and Ludwig Schwab, accompanist, who has been associated with him for the past two seasons on all these tours.

Accounts of the extraordinary scenes witnessed at the Kubelik concerts last season in London have been published in all the principal papers and magazines of this country, and it is safe to say that the interest in musical circles over the coming of this young artist will equal anything of the kind known here in recent years.

Dr. Hans Richter, who first introduced Kubelik to a London audience, has already engaged him for two Philharmonic concerts during the coming year in London, and his farewell tour through Germany and Austria, which is now in progress, has been a series of triumphs and ovations in every city, while his London concert, which is set for November 17, the day before his departure for America, will unquestionably be the scene of one of the greatest demonstrations ever accorded a musician in London. Information regarding his tour will appear later in these columns.

Ernest L. Thibault's Benefit Concert.

THE benefit concert given for Master Thibault at Knabe Hall Thursday evening, October 10, was signalized by the presence of a large audience of music lovers and critics. Master Thibault is an orphan boy of sixteen without any relatives who are able to assist him, and the concert was given to raise means to enable him to finish the course of study comprised in the free scholarship which he has won at the West End Private School of Piano Playing.

The young beneficiary played the Bach Fugue and Prelude in C major with a crispness and repose which at once showed he was master of it. This was followed by a brilliant performance of Beethoven's Sonata, op. 2, No. 3 (the last movement), which brought out the spirit of virtuosity, and showed a musical temperament of distinctive character, the melodic passages being given with a singing touch and variety of tone shading.

But it was in a group of Chopin pieces, including the Nocturne in D flat, the Ballad in A flat and the great Polonaise in A flat, op. 53, that the young artist excelled. There was the poetic, dreamy tone color in the nocturne, so Chopinesque and a singing touch that melted into liquid tears the passionate song of night. There was technical skill, clear cadenzas, and in the ballad and polonaise a degree of power and reserve force which astonished and captivated the audience. The Liszt Rhapsody No. 6 was given with fire, variety of expression and brilliancy of technic, which thrilled the audience and caused an outburst of applause. Mrs. Clarence Burns, E. B. Southwick, R. Walter Levy and many others at the close of the concert came forward to congratulate Master Thibault and Silas G. Pratt, his teacher, to whose painstaking care he owes his rapid advancement.

Miss E. R. Chapman, the new rising start in concert work, sang a soprano solo entitled "The Slave Song," by Teresa del Riego, in a thoroughly delightful manner, and with Miss Martha Wettengel, a vocal duet, "Echoes," by Frank Mains. Miss Wettengel also contributed "A Gypsy Maiden I," by Parker.

Mr. Pratt, with the assistance of several pupils, gave a performance of the "Tannhäuser" overture, with two pianos and organ, and the first movement of Schumann's Symphony in D minor, which elicted much enthusiasm.

The entire affair was declared a great success, and promises much for the future of this talented boy.

Miss Lulu Eggleston, who has been given a free scholarship under Mr. Pratt, by J. C. Havemeyer, Jr., took part in the symphony, and is soon to give concerts of her own in Brooklyn and Manhattan.

THEODORE BJORKSTEN.—Theodore Bjorksten will leave here for Europe this week, where he goes chiefly on account of his health, but also to accompany some of his pupils to the other side. He will spend the winter in Paris, and his pupils will probably continue to study with him there. His women pupils here he has turned over to Madame Bjorksten, and his male pupils he has entrusted to the care of that popular and excellent teacher, Signor Carboni.

BOSTON, Mass., October 13, 1901.

IN the sixties, probably in the fifties, an illustrated gift book was the central ornament of many parlor tables in New England. It was entitled "Women of the Bible." I do not remember the name of the author or the illustrator; but there was a witch of Endor, who, although she might not have excited the imagination of perverse maturity, haunted the dreams of boyhood and gibbered and mowed at the foot of the bed. She was a brunette, distinctly a brunette. There were ladies of Oriental face and figure who might have graced the Arabian Nights. Then there were two severe faces, unpleasant in determination, savage in revengeful purpose—the faces of Jael and Judith.

The performance of George W. Chadwick's "Judith" at Worcester brought this all back to me. Is there a book "Bible Women in Music"?

As I wrote to you, Judith has been a favorite of composers from the early days of opera and oratorio. (This was the partition that divided the two forms of musical composition in those days.) Even now I read that Klughardt's new oratorio, "Judith," will be performed in at least seven cities of Germany this season.

The list of these Bible women in music is an entertaining one. It includes Eve, the dear petite femme of Massenet, the decorous Haus-Frau of Haydn; Deborah, Susanna, Jezebel, Jael, Delilah, Mary Magdalene, the Woman of Samaria, the Sulamite, Rahab Herodias, the Holy Virgin. This list is by no means complete. But how shabbily have these women, with the exception of the Virgin, been treated!

Music has no Eve to oppose to the heroic figure of Michael Angelo, or even to the graceful creation of Milton. Susanna and the Elders would make an entertaining opera of the Verismo class. The Woman of Samaria might join in a sextet with her five husbands. There is no truly sensuous setting of the Song of Solomon. What a superb creature for operatic purposes is Mary Magdalene, a favorite apparition in the mysteries of the Middle Ages! This Mary, as this Delilah, recalls the sentence of Flaubert: "O maker of elegies, not on ruins should you lean your elbow, but on the breasts of these joyous women."

The only Delilah we now know is Saint-Saëns'. Her famous song, adjusted for the use of mezzo-soprano or contralto, is so familiar that even Uncle Amos is hardly moved by it. Yet, such is the power of association that a Delilah without the song would be looked upon with suspicion, branded as a rank outsider, an impostor; so that we are curious to learn the fate of Arnold Mendelssohn's new work, entitled "Samson."

And Delilah, unlike Jael and Judith, is a woman for whom you can honorably entertain respect. Samson was never a man of rigid principles. Like many athletes he indulged in vicious amusements as soon as he was out of training. Delilah was frank, without affectation, a Daughter of Persuasion, a Player of the Game. Samson brought his fate upon him. Heed not Milton, who makes Samson refer to the woman as a "specious monster," his "accomplished snare," with "blandished parleys, feminine assaults, tongue batteries." Milton wrote against women rather than a woman, and even he makes the chorus sing to Delilah's brave entrance:

> What thing of sea or land?
> Female of sex it seems,
> That, so bedeck'd, ornate and gay,
> Comes this way, sailing
> Like a stately ship
> Of Tarsus, bound for the isles
> Of Javan or Gadire,
> With all her bravery on, and tackle trim,
> Sails fill'd, and streamers waving,
> Courted by all the winds that hold them play
> An amber scent of odorous perfume
> Her harbinger, a damsel train behind.

And how noble her burst of self-appreciation:

> But in my country, where I most desire,
> In Ecron, Gaza, Ashdod, and in Gath,
> I shall be named among the famousest
> Of women, sung at solemn festivals.

She remembers Jael, "who, with inhospitable guile, smote Sisera sleeping through the temples nail'd."

Delilah is a much finer woman than Jael, the wife, or Judith, the widow, and yet painters and musicians have preferred Judith. Go into any picture gallery of Europe and you will find two or three Judiths, beetle-browed women with a sword and the suggestion of a mustache. Judith is to be preferred to Jael, whose behavior was so contemptibly mean that Rabbins blushed for her and invented the story of Sisera offering violence to her, in his rude, soldier-like way. Yet Jael inspired the loftiest poetry. Nothing in praise of Judith, nothing in denunciation of Delilah approaches the song of Deborah and Barak with the stars in their courses fighting against Sisera, whose mother looked out of the window and wondered why his chariot was so long in coming: "Why tarry the wheels of his chariot?" and insolently she asks "Have they not sped; have they not divided the spoil; to every man a damsel or two?" But how was it with her son, the guest of Jael? "At her feet he bowed, he fell he lay down; at her feet he bowed, he fell; where he bowed, there he fell down dead."

And who has written immortal music for such words?

Mr. Chadwick's lyric drama suggests several interesting questions. And first of all is one concerning the use of local color. I ask the permission of J. Weber, who denies that there is any such thing. Suppose a composer should attempt deliberately and painfully to characterize the warring Hebrews and Assyrians by the use of instruments peculiar to each people. The Assyrians had a wonderful philosophy of music; planetary influence and authority entered into the scheme. Their music was essentially martial. They loved drums, trumpets, cymbals. They had a passion for high notes, as has the modern audience at a "grand operatic concert." Mr. Rowbotham calls attention to the fact that in bas-relief Assyrian women are always pinching their throats with their hands as they sing, to force top notes, and he refers the reader to Porphyry on the contraction of muscles of the throat—a work that should be in the hands of every German singer. We know something about the music of the ancient Hebrews—there are surely books enough; but is it true that there was no drum from Dan to Beersheba? Now if a composer saturated with antiquarian feeling should strive to portray realistically the contending forces would the music be tolerable and to be endured? I do not admit for a moment that any such attempt would be faithful even in spirit. A military march would serve, as long as it were military. Nor is it necessary for Holophernes to scream and roar on E flat and F to prove that he is an Assyrian as well as a baritone. Whether Holophernes should sing a sentimental song to Judith is another matter; it is a matter of character, not nationality. The Rev. Thomas Beard, the schoolmaster of Oliver Cromwell, took a low view of the unfortunate soldier in his "Theatre of God's Judgments": "Whilst Holofernes besotted his senses with excesse of wine and good cheare, Judith found meanes to cut off his head."

It is not surprising that Mr. Chadwick succeeded better in pages that call for choruses in traditional oratorio form than in pages that demand imperatively scenic instinct and passionate musical thought. His contrapuntal knowledge is admitted by all; in a chorus of breadth and length he feels himself at ease; but a musician must have more elemental gifts when he writes for the stage. It is the fashion to sneer at the Verdi of "Il Trovatore"; but all of our young composers could learn much by faithful study of that score. Verdi himself never surpassed in dramatic truth and intensity, for the use of melody to accentuate the text and characterize the situation, the fourth act of this opera, which is still given in crowded theatres of the world. No experiment in orchestration is a substitute for an authoritative melody; no sought and ingenious harmonic progression is an apology for weakness in melodic thought or for the absence of irresistible measures that may be simple or even brutal. When a Judith is tempting a Holophernes, the audience should know that a tragedy is acting on the stage, should know it from the music, not solely from the libretto.

I spoke of the many oratorios and operas in which Judth is the heroine. There are so many that Karl Weisflog wrote a pamphlet, "Der wütend Holofernes."

Composers seem at their wits' end, running about distracted in search of a subject. One proposes to write music for "Ingomar." (Parthenia, as played by Mary Anderson, was almost a Biblical character.) No doubt "I go—to cleanse the cups" will be a grand aria, or if the composer believes only in leitmotive, we shall have "the Cup motiv." Another Von Hagen will arise to write an exhaustive disquisition on the nature of the cups, the symbolism in the intention of washing them, &c. "Two souls with but a single thought," &c., should be in duet form, with a unison and stentori in finale.

Who knows? Fifty years from now Miss Stone may be the heroine of a Bulgarian opera. Prince Ferdinand may prance across the stage to rescue her. Think of the contrasting choruses of brigands with folksongs and missionaries with hymns—imagine the scene of the delivery!

There is a heroine who, like certain women in the Bible, has never received fair treatment at the hands of composers. This is Joan of Arc, who has been maligned, as by Shakespeare and Voltaire; examined curiously, as by Dr. Icard, or patronized by scores of mediocrities. The "Bibliographie Musicale" of Joan of Arc covers ninety-one octavo pages. The names of composers go from Adam to Widor. The best known of these composers are Adam, Bemberg, Balfe, Bruch, Bruneau, Carafa, Dubois, Duprez, Godard, Gounod, Gouvy, Lacombe (L), Lenepveu, Liszt, Moszkowski, Pacini, Rossini, Serpette, Tschaikowsky, Vaccaj, Verdi, Vidal, Widor.

The two songs of Joan of Arc most familiar to concert-goers are those by Bemberg and Tschaikowsky. The first is taken from a "Scène historique," which has five numbers: March to the funeral pyre, prelude, arioso, quartet, finale. The first singer was Mrs. Saly-Stern, sister of the composer, at a matinée given by "Dames du Monde," April 28, 1886. Krauss sang it afterward at a Colonne concert, and the piece is dedicated to her.

Rossini's cantata has apparently been lost. Hippolyte Lucas heard Alboni sing it at the composer's house.

And here is a statement that I do not wholly understand. Gounod wrote music for a drama, "Jeanne d'Arc," which was first played at the Gaîté in 1873. When it was revived in 1890 at the Porte-Saint-Martin, Sarah Bernhardt was the heroine, and the composer added measures to accompany her declamation. Now Emile Huet says that the ballet originally had three numbers; "the second has been popularized in concerts, under the classic title, 'Funeral March of a Marionnette'"; but in speaking of this same march as a separate piece he adds: "This strikingly original piece has gone through many editions, before as after its incorporation with Barbier's drama."

Gounod's "Vision de Jeanne d'Arc," which Marteau played here, was written as the offertory of the mass "A la Mémoire de Jeanne d'Arc" (1887). Marteau played it at the first performance.

But what opera with the Maid as heroine interests an audience of to-day? Is it always the fault of the librettist? In Verdi's opera Joan loves the King and is beloved by him. Her father is a traitor to his daughter and France. Joan is wounded at Compiègne and dies in the arms of the King. This is as bad as the scenario of a pantomime, "La Pucelle d'Orleans" (1803). The final scene is the stake at Rouen; the stake disappears and in its place is an altar, and beyond there is a transparent triumphal arch, under which is a statue of Joan. "The crowd kneels around the statue to the sound of clarions and trumpets."

Let me note the fact that a "Jeanne d'Arc" polka, by L. Brunet, was played May 8, 1858, at the foot of the statue at Orleans by the band of the Third Grenadiers of the Imperial Guard.

Raoul Pugno wrote a piece, "Jeanne d'Arc," when he was ten years old. It was for solo voice and chorus, without accompaniment, and it was dedicated to the town of Orleans.

The name of Gustave Strube, who wrote an overture, "The Maid of Orleans," is not in Huet's list; but his book was published in 1894.

There are other women who should be illustrious in opera; Lady Macbeth, Cleopatra, Viola, Margaret of Burgundy—make a list for yourself. There are operatic Lady Macbeths, but no one of them now counsels murder or wanders in her sleep. What an opportunity for a composer! The witches should tempt the curious in instrumentation; Macbeth should be a baritone; I see Plançon as King Duncan welcoming his guests; Banquo is certainly a tenor, self-conscious and even when dead insisting on Macbeth's undivided attention at a state banquet. And the Lady Macbeth! No, she is not a strident virago, a cross between Fricka and Ortrud; she is a luscious soprano with a caressing voice, with a purr in her voice; a woman of voluptous, madding form who could lead any man to murderous thought and deed.

There are suggested stories in ballads, there is the thought of romantic opera in mere lines. Who was "La Belle Dame sans Merci"? What was the name of the celebrated King of Thule, who was his wife, how did he win her?

A composer died the other day—let us be exact, September 11—Eugène Emile Diaz de la Peña, better known as Eugène Diaz, the son of the painter. He wrote three operas and some songs. But he supported himself by painting, and toward the end of his life he said to Pougin, an old classmate in the Paris Conservatory: "No, I have had enough of the theatre; I prefer to make pictures, which give me a living. I make them for America, and they bring me in more than any performances of operas." Do you say that Diaz was unsuccessful as a composer for the stage and therefore unworthy of notice? Remember the lines of Walt Whitman:

With music strong I come, with my cornets and my drums.
I play not marches for accepted victors only, I play marches for conquer'd and slain persons.

Have you heard that it was good to gain the day?
I also say it is good to fall, battles are lost in the same spirit in which they are won.

I beat and pound for the dead,
I blow through my embouchures my loudest and gayest for them.

But Diaz wrote an opera entitled "La Coupe du roi de Thulé," and it was performed at the Opéra, Paris, January 10, 1873, with Madame Gueymard and Faure in the cast. The fascinating title! The story they say is weak and silly, although it took the prize offered by the Fine Arts in 1867. The cup is enchanted and the owner is thereby powerful. The old King of Thule bequeaths it to Paddock, his clown, with the command to give it to the most worthy. Paddock seizes the opportunity to give the courtiers a fine lesson and tosses the cup into the ocean. A woman named Myrrha, a woman of great personal charm, offers her love to him that will bring the cup to her. And this Myrrha was so beautiful that the old King died because he could not triumph over her indifference.

Yorick, a fisherman, loves her—alas, poor Yorick! He dives into the depths, and meets there Claribel, the Queen of the Waves, who has loved him for many days. By some devilish art she shows Yorick his Myrrha singing love songs with a certain Angus. The fisherman, beside himself, begs that he may return to earth. Claribel gives him the cup and says that if Myrrha does not love him he must drink from it and thrice invoke her name. Yorick gives the cup to Myrrha; she thanks him, promises a reward, and gives the magic cup to Angus. Whereupon Yorick drinks out of it and invokes Claribel. The palace crumbles and the fisherman becomes a subject of his watery sweetheart. This story is fantastic enough, but the one romantic person in the song—the old King of Thule—is nothing but a shadowy figure, a thing of shreds and patches.

In like manner, if you turn over the pages of any dictionary of operas, you find promising titles, and the librettos that bear these titles are described as weak or frivolous or dull. Just as you would expect from E. T. A. Hoffmann strange and fantastic music, such as might accentuate some of his wild tales; but his music that has come down to us might have been written by any kapellmeister whom he satirized, it is so conventional, stiff and dull.

A first-class opera libretto, some claim, is as great a work of art as a great score. But how many great librettos are there? Is that of "Don Giovanni," or that of "Fidelio" really great? When you see an admirable performance of "Alceste," or either "Iphegenia" of Gluck, the ensemble moves you mightily; but I doubt whether the libretto itself would give pleasure. It serves chiefly to remind you of the immortal figures in the Greek mythology. Without the scenery, the action, the music, it would fall far below any one of the ingenious fabrications of Scribe.

The program of the first Symphony concert, October 19, will be as follows: Brahms' Academic Overture; Lalo's 'Cello Concerto (Jean Gérardy); Liszt's "Festlänge"; Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. The program of the second concert will be: Volkmann's overture, "Richard III."; Liszt's Concerto Pathétique (arranged and played by Richard Burmeister); Georg Schumann's "Symphonic Variations on a Chorale (first time here), and Symphony in F, by Goetz.

RICHARD SCHLIEWEN, violinist, has resumed his duties at the College of Music, after an eventful tour of the Continent. He visited his old home at Erfurt, Germany, Luther's historic town. He met his mother after a lapse of twelve years; also some of his nearest relatives, whom he had not seen for sixteen years, and several of his old schoolmates with whom he had not shaken hands for twenty-five years. Mr. Schliewen gave four concerts at Erfurt, Weimar and Cassel, which were much appreciated. He was frequently invited to private musicales. Two weeks he spent in the beautiful Thuringia Forest. The Germans, he says, are great walkers. Twelve hours a day is a feat which they accomplish with ease.

Mr. Schliewen, however, was content with eight hours per day. The roads are excellent everywhere, and there is almost no possibility of mistaking or missing the way, since the "Verschoenerungs Verein" has put into position plates giving full directions at every crossing. In the Thuringia mountains the art of Jodeln is still alive among the mountaineers, and it proved a special delight to Mr. Schliewen to listen to the fresh voices of the peasant girls, as they warble their beautiful folk songs of quaint harmonies, repeated as they are by manifold echoes. There would be a fortune in some of these voices if they were trained artistically. In Eisenach he plucked a leaf from a tree close to the monument of Johann Sebastian Bach, and visited the Warthung. He was in Ruhla, a little mountain village, which next to Vienna has the greatest meerschaum industry in the world.

Being a devotee to the fragrant weed, it goes without saying that he bought a number of fine pipes and cigar holders at prices so low that he cannot understand how the people of Ruhla can name it an industry at all. After his return from the mountains he visited Wiesbaden, there taking the curative waters for about six days and listening to the celebrated Kaim's Orchestra, of Munich. Next he went to Würzburg, where he visited the house in which Wagner composed the "Feen." After visiting Munich, where he witnessed a performance of the "Marriage of Figaro," he made a tour of the High Alps ofBavaria. A party of newly acquired friends made the trip to the Fugspitze very delightful. Returning they encountered a cloud burst, and had a narrow escape from being buried alive in a mountain slide which assumed quite formidable proportions. They found three of the bridges which they had to pass washed away, and were obliged to make their way back over the mountain streams the best they knew how by wading up to their chests in the water, and in imminent danger of losing their foothold and being swallowed up by the furious waters. At the Cologne Cathedral, Mr. Schliewen had the pleasure of listening to a magnificent organ concert and a capella chorus. Thence he went to Kiel, where he had a good view of the great men o' war of the Kaiser class, notably William II., whose first officer he knew, and who took great pains to explain to him the superior advantages of the German marine over that of other nations, and allowed him to turn one of those terrific 26-ton towers with his little finger, and lower one of the Krupp guns by means of a little screw not larger than that of a modern microscope. It was all very wonderful and impressive.

It proved rather a difficult task for Mr. Schliewen to enter upon his duties upon his return to the College of Music, for from the start he was in medias res, beginning with thirty-five lessons against thirty the same time last year.

While abroad, Mr. Schliewen had the pleasure of greeting some of his former pupils. Among these Elsa Fritsch, who continued her studies under Arno Hilf, and who is said to have made wonderful progress. She will return to America and re-enter Mr. Schliewen's class.

Louis Siegel, a former five years' pupil, had added the gold medal of the Liege Conservatoire to the first prize he won last season. He will soon be heard from as a full-fledged artist.

During his trip, and from the very start, Mr. Schliewen was pursued by the superstition of thirteen, but as he is not a believer in it he had the best of luck all the way through. Thus he left on the 13th of June—his son celebrated his thirteenth birthday. It took him thirteen days both ways to cross the waters. Engine No. 13 carried him away from Cincinnati and Engine No. 130 was hitched on at Baltimore. He had room No. 13 on the Bulgaria on the return voyage, and occupied No. 13 rooms in hotels three different times. Two cars on important trips were numbered 13, and one 463. He visited thirteen cities altogether.

Mary Ross, pianist, a pupil of Georg Krueger, of the Conservatory of Music, played with emphatic success at a concert last week by Adolf Hahn, violinist, and herself at Chillicothe, Ohio.

Frank van der Stucken, director of the Symphony Orchestra, is announced to return from Europe on Monday. The following soloists have been engaged for the concerts: Harold Bauer, pianist; Madame Schumann-Heink, Jean Gérardy, Eduard Zeldenrust, Mrs. Wagner Hissem De Moss, soprano, and Hugo Kupfenschmid, violinist. The afternoon dates will be November 29, December 13 and 27, January 10 and 24, February 7 and 21, March 7 and 21, and April 24. Evening dates are November 30, December 14 and 28, January 11 and 25; February 8 and 22, March 8 and 22 and April 5. Auction sale of seats will be November 23.

Several outside engagements have been secured for the orchestra under the management of Frank E. Edwards.

Georg Krueger, of the piano faculty of the Conservatory of Music, will give a recital in the Conservatory Hall, Thursday, October 29, presenting the following program:

Magic Fire Scene	Wagner-Brassin
Hark, Hark, the Lark!	Schubert-Liszt
Etude de Concert	Rubinstein
Sonata, op. 53, C major	Beethoven
Thème Varié, A major	Paderewski
Etude Chromatique	Chopin
Ballade, op. 47, No. 2	Chopin
Jeu des Ondes	Leschetizky
Hungarian Dance	Brahms
Faust Valse	Gounod-Liszt

In accordance with the approval of the Archbishop of the Diocese of Cincinnati, and the Bishop of Covington, and for the proper cultivation of the Gregorian Chant the College of Music has decided to open a department for the same, which will be under the direction of Dr. Nicholas J. Elsenheimer. The organizing of a department like this should certainly attract widespread attention and prove fruitful. Splendid results may be derived from instruction in this art, for organists as well as singers and musicians. Dr. Elsenheimer, who has made a study of it under Professor Jakobsthal, of the Imperial University of Strassburg, Alsace-Lorraine, is not only entirely familiar with the system of the Gregorian Chant but also of the Latin text. Besides being a thorough and in every respect a first-class musician Dr. Elsenheimer is very well educated, having been a student of the Latin languages for several years. He will be remembered as the composer of the prize cantata "Consecration of the Arts," written for the Saengerfest held in this city in 1899. His composition was selected from among twenty-seven competitors from the United States, Canada, England, Germany, France, Switzerland and Russia.

The first faculty concert will be given on Friday evening, November 8, by Ernest Wilbur Hale, pianist, and Edmund A. Jahn, baritone.

Miss Gertrude Ione Zimmer, soprano, pupil of Signor Lino Mattioli, has been very successful in opera. She is now singing one of the leading roles with the "Bostonians."

Miss Clara M. Zumstein will give a series of lectures on Americanized Delsarte culture in the Odeon. The first will be on Saturday, October 19, at 4 p. m. Admission will be by invitation, which may be obtained at the office of the college.

The elementary classes will be organized on Monday, October 14; Tuesday, October 15, and Wednesday, October 16.

The popular music class will be organized on Monday evening, October 14, and the College Evening Chorus on Tuesday evening, October 15, under the direction of A. J. Gantvoort.

W. C. Smith, tenor, pupil of W. S. Sterling, is singing with the Mendelssohn Male Quartet in Canada.

On Sunday, October 27, a concert will be given at the Italian Church of the Sacred Heart, on Broadway. It will be the dedication of the new organ, and Signor Albino Gorno has arranged a most elaborate program for the occasion. This fact itself assures it to be artistic as well as very entertaining. The entire proceeds will toward the defraying of the expenses of the new organ. The program is replete with interesting numbers, among which are duets for piano and organ and violin solos with piano and organ accompaniment. The principals are Signor Romeo Gorno and Adolph Stadermann, assisted vocally by Miss Kathryn Gibbons, soprano, and some ensemble numbers by Miss Katherine Klarer, soprano; Miss Elsie Louise Bernard, contralto, and Carl Gantvoort, bass. Other interesting selections will be given by a chorus under the direction of Mr. Stadermann.

David Davis, tenor, recently sang at the Eisteddfod at the Pan-American and sustained his high reputation as a first-class artist. Mr. Davis has resumed teaching at the college building, and has a very large class of pupils. Miss Bessie Tudor, soprano, one of his pupils, will give a recital in the near future.

The sixth Soirée Musicale at the Cable Company's warerooms, Seventh and Elm streets (H. T. Hanmer, manager), presented the following program Tuesday evening, October 8:

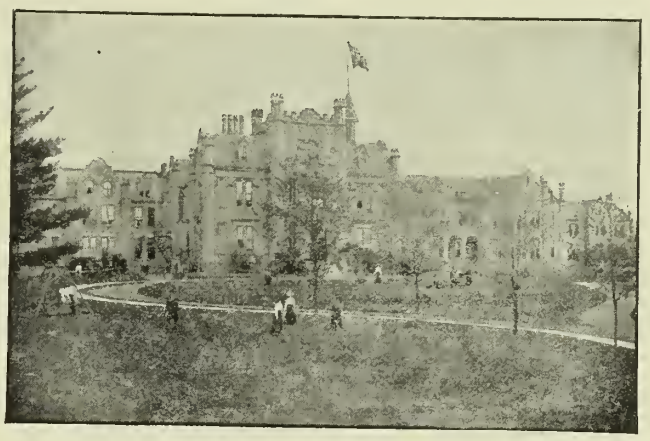
October 10, 1901.

THE Ontario Ladies' College, Whitby, Canada, is entering upon a season which promises to be very successful. Of the study of music in all its branches a specialty is made at this palatial and beautifully situated institution, whose graduates in the department of music are well qualified for the exacting requirements of professional life. Rev. Dr. J. J. Hare, principal, and J. W. F. Harrison, musical director, are to be congratulated upon the fact that the Ontario Ladies' College possesses an admirable pipe organ, upon which many of the talented students practice, take lessons and give public performances of merit.



ONTARIO LADIES' COLLEGE, WHITBY, CANADA.

On the evening of October 7 the new Russell Theatre was auspiciously opened in Ottawa.

J. D. A. Tripp, the pianist, will make an extensive Canadian tour this season.

Mrs. Brokovski Small, of California, will hereafter teach singing in Toronto.

The Ottawa Amateur Orchestral Society has elected these officers for 1901-1902: Honorary patron, Lord Minto; president, Charles A. E. Harriss; vice-president, Dr. L. Coyteux Prevost; executive committee, Mrs. Edwin E. La Beree, Mrs. F. H. Byshe, Miss Ethel Gerald, Miss Millie White, Miss Mina Stewart and F. A. Dixon, E. A. Parson, E. D. Ingall, S. L. Shannon, S. Short and Charles Stewart.

The Toronto Male Chorus Club has elected the following officers for the present season: W. H. Brouse, honorary president; J. Hayden Horsey, president; R. S. Gourlay, first vice-president; C. A. Ross, second vice-president; E. C. Tyrrell, librarian; C. O. Lucas, assistant librarian; M. S. Bogert and A. J. Hughes, auditors; committee—Thomas Bilton, T. H. Litster, Walter Gow, R. H. Greene, W. H. Bates, W. T. Blake, Herbert C. Cox, W. M. Douglas, J. Fraser Macdonald, W. Murray Alexander, C. Dimmock and W. R. Somerville.

J. D. A. Tripp continues to be the competent director of this popular organization.

Many Canadian pupils of H. M. Field, now of Leipsic, Germany, hope that he will shortly return to America, in order that they may continue to study under this able and inspiring instructor. Mr. Field's talented sister, Miss Ida Field, piano instructor, is having a very busy season in Toronto.

A successful concert was given by Mabel S. Hicks, G. Chrystal Brown, Lois Winlow and J. Alex Davies, in St. George's Hall, Toronto, on October 1. The audience was appreciative and enthusiastic.

F. H. Torrington recently visited Peterboro and Trenton for the purpose of rehearsing sections of the Royal Chorus which has been organized in honor of this week's visit of the Duke and Duchess of York to Toronto.

A good effort is being made to establish a series of annual musical festivals in St. John, N. B. Ladies interested in this movement are: Mesdames C. F. Harrison,

WHITNEY TEW

In America
November,
December
And January.

The London Press says of Mr. Tew's singing:

The Stage—"Mr. Whitney Tew proved himself a singer of excellent capabilities. His voice, which is a bass of great compass, is delightfully sympathetic—now full of tenderness, now instinct with passion and joy. He could not have been surpassed in his rendering of Schumann's 'Der Knabe mit dem Wunderhorn' and Liza Lehmann's curiously weird 'Myself when Young.' "—July 4, 1901

London Musical Courier—"Mr. Whitney Tew's singing was marked by a high order of intelligence. He is one of the few singers now before the public who possesses the many qualifications that mean success. Besides a voice powerful and sympathetic he has a remarkable memory, and he never fails to display an intuitive knowledge of the poetic and dramatic significance of the text. In four songs by Bach, Brahms, Schubert and Schumann he exhibited great powers of vocalization and expression, and a style in singing German so thoroughly Teutonic that it was hard at times to realize his American origin . . . Three songs in English were equally impressive."—July 5, 1901.

Ladies' Field—"That fine bass singer, Mr. Whitney Tew, gave the first of his recitals in Steinway Hall. Madame Lehmann's 'In Memoriam' was a great test of Mr. Tew's manner and inflection, and he sustained the interest of his audience well throughout it; and it is a supremely hard work for a single voice—fragmentary, passionate, moody, with its pedal note of acute sorrow . . . Mr. Tew is fortunate in possessing a powerful voice of fine quality, and he has both the voice and brains for success."—May 25, 1901.

Daily Telegraph—"Mr. Tew is an artist who commands attention and deserves praise. Especially has he the gift of feeling and the power of conveying it to others, while in point of intelligence he leaves but little to desire. Mr. Tew essaye last evening songs of widely contrasting kinds and of various centres, but the manner and spirit proper to each were easily revealed, and the result was a conspicuous success."—May 23 1901.

J. S. Ford, I. J. D. Landry, Jack, Markham, Coster, Walker, Stetson; Misses Travers, Jarvis, Payne, McCafferty, Titus, Lynch, Skinner and Gunn. The object has been outlined as follows: "We, whose names are herewith annexed, do form ourselves into an association to be called the New Brunswick Musical Festival Association, the object of which is to encourage and stimulate musical education in our midst and to create a chorus of singers of the city and outlying towns which will be a leading feature of the annual festival, and to furnish for this region just such festivals as have been permanently established in Maine, New Hampshire and Vermont."

George Gelley, of Winnipeg, has arranged to visit Chicago this season, for the purpose of studying operatic roles.

This season a course of interesting lectures on church music will be given in the hall of the Toronto Conservatory of Music by A. T. Cringan, Mus. Bac.; Waldo Selden Pratt, Mus. Doc.; Rev. Alex McMillan, J. Humphrey Anger, Mus. Bac., Oxon; J. W. F. Harrison, Rev. Frederick G. Plummer, T. Arthur Blakely, Albert Ham, Mus. Doc.; Miss Masson, A. S. Vogt and Dr. Edward Fisher.

Charles E. Clarke, basso, has been appointed soloist at Central Presbyterian Church, Hamilton.

A. S. Vogt, of Toronto, recently gave an artistic organ recital in Peterboro, Ont.

Harold Bauer, the eminent pianist, has been engaged by the Toronto Mendelssohn Choir for a notable concert on January 30.

Sir John Alexander Boyd, K. C. M. G., has succeeded the late Hon. George Allan as president of the Toronto Conservatory of Music.

The St. Andrew's Society, Ottawa, announces a concert for December 2.

ANNA OTTEN AT THE MAINE FESTIVAL.—Miss Anna Otten, the violinist, won some of the honors at the Maine festival. Here are two criticisms about her playing:

Of Miss Otten's violin playing one ought to write in superlatives. She is much more than an accomplished violinist. Young as she is, she is nothing less than a virtuoso of assured brilliancy and power. Her technic is unexceptional, and her tone broad and powerful enough, but especially smooth, elegant, astonishing in flexibility and musical color. Miss Otten played the Andante from the Mendelssohn Concerto with exquisite feeling and perfection of tone. Her rendering of the Allegro movement was something to wonder at and delight in, and her playing of the Saint-Saëns "Rondo Capriccioso" a triumph of technic and tone. Miss Otten is a violinist to be remembered.—The Daily Eastern Argus, Portland, October 10, 1901.

The playing of the violin by a master hand always appeals to music lovers, and in Miss Otten Portland people found an artist who, although little more than a girl, plays with a skill and mastery which would do credit to one of long years of experience. For her the career which she has chosen holds the promise of a brilliant future. She played Mendelssohn's E minor concerto with a delicacy of touch, sympathy of expression and a command of technic which was in every way adequate, and in the "Rondo Capriccioso" of Saint-Saëns she enhanced the impression made by her first number.—Portland Daily Press, October 10, 1901.

MARIE SEYMOUR BISSELL.—Miss Bissell has taken a new uptown studio, and her time is already entirely filled; no teacher of the metropolis is busier, and her pupils, such as Grace Preston, Sarah King Peck, George Ensworth and others, are in constant demand in concert.

THE BERTHOLDT,
128 MARYLAND AVENUE S. W.,
WASHINGTON, October 12, 1901.

"OUR POINT OF VIEW."

AFTER a newcomer in Washington has inspected the Congressional Library and the Capitol, has taken a ride to the top of the Washington Monument, has examined the objects of interest in the Patent Office, and has taken a look at the White House, it is time for him to begin to accustom himself to the Washington point of view.

The mental attitude of the Washington man is hard to account for at first, and even after a short acquaintance it is by no means easy to follow his mental processes or to explain the origin and evolution of his ideas.

It would seem as if the typical Washingtonian stood at the door of the Pennsylvania station as the train came in bringing the new dignitaries of the National Government from the various States of the Union.

(Removing his hat as the Chief Executive descends to the platform)—"Welcome to Washington, Mr. President. I will be as loyal to you as I was to your predecessors."

(Advancing with outstretched hand to each of the members of the Cabinet in turn)—"Very glad to meet you, Mr. Secretary. Pray make yourself at home."

(Bowing stiffly to the Senators)—"Gentlemen, my experience with Senators covers a period of years, and I hope you will perform your duties as well as your predecessors. If I can spare the time I may run in some day and hear you debate."

(Glancing coldly at the members of the House of Representatives as they file past)—"It will be your first duty, gentlemen, to understand that you are unimportant people in Washington. No doubt you are of great importance in your own States, but you can hardly expect a Washingtonian who can see the Cabinet officers and members of the Diplomatic Corps every day—you can hardly expect a citizen of the District of Columbia to notice you."

Thus the self-made Congressman, flattered by his townsmen in Ohio and inflated by that feeling of largeness, is snubbed by the clerk who holds a position at $1,500 a year, and is not to be removed at the will of the people like a mere Representative.

But the Washingtonian is not superior to all people and things, and he is never rude. The disdain he feels for all except the highest officers of the National Government is not shown by rudeness. I suppose if the Washingtonian were to hasten the departure of a book agent down his front stoop he would apply his boot in a manner polite enough to command the admiration of a Chesterfield: "Allow me, my dear sir, to assist you down the steps. Be careful to avoid a jar as you reach the pavement."

Aside from his attitude toward all things pertaining to the National Government, the Washingtonian is a typical townsman, interested in people and things intensely local, and with no outside interest.

The local musician can easily obtain a splendid patronage, and if he is willing to live on glory, and does not need any of that commonplace and vulgar article known as money, then Washington is an ideal place for him. If he is any kind of a player or singer at all, he can gain a foothold and establish an enviable reputation here. His name may easily become a household word to be lisped by the infant in its cradle—I mean crib. Cradles have gone out of style. But you can understand what I mean. His name can be whispered by the blushing maiden around the hearth fire or the gas grate, and he can also be flattered and idolized by the very man at $1,500 a year who despises the Member of Congress.

Sol Minster, director of the Columbia Theatre Orchestra, should earn the gratitude of his men by the fine way in which he speaks of them. He says: "The flutist is considered one of the best here, has much execution and is a remarkable reader; served twenty years in United States Band of Marines here as soloist; retired on pension. The clarinetist I think one of the best to be found anywhere. Has been with Gilmore and in Peabody Institute, Baltimore, and has without doubt the most beautiful and mellow tone; plays most artistically, with much technic. The cornetist is a graduate from one of the German conservatories. Has quite a reputation as composer and arranger. The basso, formerly with the German Band at the World's Fair, traveled all over Europe with Philip Fahrbach and his orchestra. The rest are all very good."

Besides Mr. Minster the orchestra includes: A. Jaeger, second violin; G. Seimbach, viola; C. Neuman, basso; H. Jaeger, flute; A. Coda, clarinet; E. Bergenholtz, cornet; H. Schult, trombone, and S. Johnson, tympani.

Miss Marie McFarland, a former pupil of Mrs. Esputa Daly, has received many flattering press notices in the papers of Denver, where she gave a successful concert in the latter part of September.

The announcement of Saengerbund concerts for this season is of much interest. There will be a public concert on December 8 and one on March 9 at the National Theatre, and eight musical entertainments at the club rooms, for which Henry Xander, the musical director, is now preparing the programs.

Oscar Comstock, who is spending the winter in Washington, gave a recital at his studio on F street last night. He played an exacting program, which was mostly composed of studio favorites, such as the Chopin Etude in C minor and C sharp minor, the A flat Ballade and Waltz in E minor. The alternate numbers were songs in German and English, which were sung by him to his own accompaniment. A good proof of the fine quality of his voice is found in the fact that he won the St. Cecilia honors at Rome. His studio is filled with photos and relics of his life abroad, among which are pictures of Nikisch, Reinecke and Richter.

MUSIC IN ITALY.

A Milan Memorial Service for the Late President of the United States.

CORSO VENEZIA 65, MILAN, ITALY,
September 23, 1901.

IN memory of the Hon. William McKinley, late President of the United States, a service was held yesterday afternoon at half-past 3 o'clock, at the Church of All Saints, the English as well as English-American church of Milan, in Via Solferino 15.

The service was simple and unofficial, but solemn and beautiful.

Following is the program:

Organ, Blest Are the Departed.....Spohr
Hymn (266), Lead, Kindly Light..... ——
Lessons: 1 Cor., xv., 20.
Anthem, God So Loved the World (from The Crucifixion)...Stainer
Address by the Rev. John Eagles Harston.
Hymn (277), Nearer, My God, to Thee..... —— Prayers.
Vocal solo, O Rest in the Lord (from Elijah).....Mendelssohn
Nunc dimittis (St. Luke, ii., 29)..... ——
Organ, Dead March in Saul.....Händel

The music at All Saints' Church is usually supplied by a quartet consisting of Mrs. B. Hanson, soprano; Mrs. H. P. Smith, contralto; B. Hanson, tenor; Charles Northey, basso, and H. P. Smith, organist and director.

For the present occasion this quartet had been augmented by several American singers now studying in Milan, and further enhanced by a solo contribution from Mme. Eleanore Broadfoot-de Cisneros, the contralto, of New York.

The opening number for organ, Spohr's "Blest Are the Departed," is beautifully orchestrated, and was very well played by Mr. Smith.

Praise is also due the singers for excellent work done in the hymns and the unaccompanied selection from Dr. Stainer's "Crucifixion." They really sang remarkably well.

In the selection from "Elijah," "O Rest in the Lord," Madame de Cisneros displayed a full, rich contralto voice of much beauty, and sang the music with considerable feeling and distinct enunciation of the words. Mrs. Broadfoot-de Cisneros, by the way, is in Milan for the purpose of studying opera and preparing herself for a possible début at the Teatro Lirico Internazionale as Dalila in the opera "Samson et Dalila." Signor Sonzogno, I am told, has already promised to give the lady a hearing very shortly.

François de Cisneros, the husband of the contralto, is also a singer, the happy possessor of a high tenor voice.

After the minister's address the President's favorite hymn, "Nearer, My God, to Thee," was sung, but to a different melody from the one known in America—and, I may add, to a better one musically. The program closed with the playing of the Dead March in "Saul."

H. P. Smith, the organist, is also the Vice-Consul of the United States at Milan, in charge of the consulate during the absence of William Jarvis, the Consul, who at the present time is on a visit to the United States. In his official capacity of American Vice-Consul in charge and of music director at the English church, Mr. Smith found himself obliged to assume the responsibility and the arrangements for the service almost single handed, for the complete success of which he assuredly deserves credit and appreciative acknowledgment.

The Rev. Mr. Harston, pastor of the Church of All Saints, in his address briefly sketched the life and work of Mr. McKinley, bringing out in a clear and intelligent manner the chief points of interest in the career of our lamented President; the great and important acts of his administration; his private character and nature and the purity of his home life. Reference was made to England's close relationship in our deep sorrow, and the feeling of profound sympathy for Mrs. McKinley and the whole American nation. The allusion to Mrs. McKinley, in her lonely, grief stricken condition, brought handkerchiefs to the moist and tearful eyes of a number of persons in the church. The speaker finished with the President's last words: "Good-by all, good-by! It is God's way. His will be done."

All Saints' Church was appropriately decorated on this occasion with large American and English flags, looped and bound up in mourning crêpe. In the centre was "Old Glory," a very large, handsome flag, gathered through the middle into deep folds of drooping mournfulness on either side, tastefully grasped and held with black crêpe. On the organ side of the church there was an intertwining of the English and the American flags—the Union Jack with the Stars and Stripes.

All day there was a downpour of rain; the dark, gloomy weather without being a fit accompaniment to the sad performances within the church.

Flags are at half-mast at the United States Consulate and upon various buildings in Milan.

That this horrible crime of murdering President McKinley, a man so universally respected and beloved, should have occurred in the Temple of Music at the Pan-American Exposition really makes it seem all the more horrible to musicians, and brings to mind the words of Shakespeare: "A man without music in his soul is fit for treason," &c. Most assuredly any person attacking the life of the President of the United States can have no music in his soul, and stands guilty of high treason, and for such crime the punishment by law, if made "immediate death," might cause such would-be fools to think again before acting.

In the present instance the anarchist has struck a blow even more cruel than he purposed. Only a little imagination is needed, and some understanding of the anarchist mind, to perceive that this victory will compensate such a criminal for any penalty he may have to undergo—for this fellow has the double satisfaction of achieving his object and of seeing the world suffer the chagrin of disappointed, of cheated hopes for the President's restoration to health and activity.

England's manifestation of friendship and good will on this mournful occasion is a proof of admiration and respect for the character of an illustrious statesman and of sympathy with his brave wife in her unspeakable affliction—Mrs. McKinley having shown all that was loveliest and bravest in Christian, or rather in pure and noble womanhood.

Italy's widowed Queen Margharita sent Mrs. McKinley a message of sympathy, ending with the touching words: "We are sisters now in sorrow." The King has ordered that official mourning in Italy shall be for a period of fourteen days. At the United States Consulate many cards and messages of sympathy and condolence have been received from the British Consul, Italian officials, Englishmen, Americans and others.

In an English journal I noticed attention being directed by a subscriber to a poem of Wordsworth. Apropos of the murder of President McKinley, some of your readers may appreciate being reminded of the poem at this particular time. The Woodsworth sonnet referred to runs thus:

Who ponders national events shall find
An awful balancing of loss and gain,
Joy based on sorrow, good will ill combined,
And proud deliverance issuing out of pain
And direful throes; as if the all-ruling Mind,
With Whose perfection it consists to ordain
Volcanic crust, earthquake and hurricane,
Dealt in like sort with feeble human kind
By laws immutable. But woe for him
Who thus deceived shall lend an eager hand
To social havoc. Is not conscience ours;
And truth, whose eye guilt only can make dim;
And will, whose office by divine command
Is to control and check disordered Powers?

DELMA VON DER HEIDE.

ROLLIE BORDEN LOW.—Mrs. Rollie Borden Low, the soprano, who went abroad to study, has returned, and in addition to her concert and recital singing this season will teach at her home, 205 West Fifty-sixth street. Mrs. Low has sung in Canada, and the critics there greatly admired her sweet voice. Appended are several criticisms:

Mrs. Rollie Borden Low, soprano, gave an enjoyable recital at Karn Hall on Wednesday evening. The program was excellently selected and well calculated to display the artistic merits of the performer.

Mrs. Low's vocal numbers were keenly appreciated. Her voice is of a sweet quality and perfectly under control.—Montreal Daily Star.

Mrs. Rollie Borden Low sings easily and with much expression, and has a voice of good tone and flexibility. Perhaps her higher notes are more pleasing, but her voice is sweet and true and she rendered her numbers with spirit and dramatic feeling.—The Gazette, Montreal.

Mrs. Low charmingly sang an aria from "La Gioconda" and Sullivan's "Orpheus and His Lute."—New York Commercial Advertiser.

Mrs. Rollie Borden Low is a new soprano, with a voice of lovely quality and a most refined style. She has made astonishing improvement all through her first season's work, and her warm, honest singing is of the kind that grows in public favor.—New York Journal.

GLENN HALL.—Glenn Hall, the Chicago tenor, is in constant demand this season, his beautiful voice and artistic interpretations combining to make him a great favorite. The ensuing list of Mr. Hall's engagements illustrates that his talents are recognized by a prominent Eastern organization, the Handel and Haydn Society of Boston: October 25, concert with Apollo Club, of Denver, Col.; November 5, St. Vincent's Church, Chicago; November 11, "Elijah," with Handel and Haydn Society, of Boston, Mass., November 14, recital at Des Moines, Ia.; November 15, recital at Cedar Falls, Ia.; November 28, recital at Kansas City, Mo.; December 7 and 8, Ashland, Wis.; Philharmonic Club, December 9, Minneapolis; December 10, St. Paul, Minn.; December 25, "Messiah," with Handel and Haydn, of Boston, Mass.

THE MYER STUDIO.—Edmund J. Myer has returned from his vacation, and has reopened his studio for the season. His summer school on Chautauqua Lake was a great success. It is to be in the future a regularly organized summer school for singing and teachers. During the past season Mr. Myer has been writing another work upon the art of singing called "The Renaissance of the Vocal Art." This is his sixth work on the singing voice; it is a practical and logically formulated study of his system.

MUSIC IN BROOKLYN.

THOSE who have followed Dr. Henry G. Hanchett in his annual lecture-recitals have been impressed with the striking titles for the discourses—discourses which have instructed thousands and advanced the education of many earnest students of music. This year Dr. Hanchett has chosen for his subject "Musical Contrasts," and the first of a series of four lectures was given last Monday afternoon in the Assembly Hall of Adelphi College, corner of Clifton and St. James places. Dr. Hanchett is the director of the Adelphi School of Musical Art, and the lectures are given again under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute in co-operation with Adelphi College.

The dates of the other three lectures are October 21, October 28 and November 7. Dr. Hanchett will give the third and fourth, and the second will be given by Dr. John Cornelius Griggs, professor of Musical History in the Adelphi School of Musical Art and at the American Institute of Applied Music in Manhattan, and also vocal instructor at Vassar College.

Sub-topics are announced for the four lectures, and both lecturers will give some of the illustrations themselves, and in addition will be assisted by these artists: Mrs. Lucie Boice Wood, soprano; Mrs. Stuart Close, pianist; Miss Susan S. Boice, soprano; Miss Susan L. Eastman, contralto; E. Ellsworth Giles, tenor; Albert E. Andrews, bass, and Miss Susan S. Boice, accompanist.

Following are the sub-topics of the lectures, with numbers:

The Maxwell Orchestra.

All of the lectures in October are given Monday afternoons at 4 o'clock. The evening lecture on November 7 will mark the beginning of a series of night discourses, with the orchestra from Maxwell House, as well as the soloists, to assist. The orchestra, which now numbers about twenty performers, has in the past been drilled by Dr. Hanchett, and a report of the playing was published in THE MUSICAL COURIER last spring. Dr. Hanchett is an optimist, and he has infused some of these young musicians with his own enthusiasm and hopefulness.

To-morrow (Thursday) evening Madame Schumann-Heink will make her first bow before the Brooklyn Institute this year, with a recital at the Academy of Music, in which Emil Fischer, the veteran operatic basso, will appear with her. Both artists are announced to sing some of the arias and songs in their repertory. Here is the program:

Aria from Acis and Galatea.....Händel
Emil Fischer.

Mme. Schumann-Heink and Emil Fischer.

Mrs. Mary Hissem de Moss, soprano; Miss Helen Niebuhr, contralto, and Arthur Whiting, pianist, are to be the soloists for the Kneisel concerts in Brooklyn on the evenings of October 30, November 20 and December 4.

The Venth-Kronold String Quartet, recently organized, will give a series of chamber music concerts at Wissner Hall on November 11, December 9, January 6 and February 10.

November 18 is the date of the concert at the Academy of Music for the benefit of the German Hospital of Brooklyn. The United Singers of Brooklyn, assisted by an orchestra and Leopold Winkler, pianist, are to participate in an elaborate program. Arthur Claassen will be the conductor. The leading Germans of the borough are taking an interest and the results promise to be correspondingly substantial.

That the Tonkünstler Society should open the season in Brooklyn instead of Manhattan is partly due to the fact that a large proportion of the members reside in the borough. The program published last Wednesday was given last Tuesday evening (October 8) before one of the largest assemblies in the history of the society. Leo Schulz, the president, who looks happier and healthier after his European trip, extended a cordial welcome to all members and their guests.

The Martucci Sonata in F sharp minor for 'cello and piano proved a work unsymmetrical in form, but with plenty of flourishes. It was, however, sanely and beautifully played by Emil Schenck, 'cellist of the Dannreuther Quartet, and George Falkenstein, an artist pupil of Richard Burmeister. Charles A. Kaiser sang songs by Brahms and Jensen tastefully and intelligently, and the singer rejoiced because he had for his accompanist the true lover of Brahms, Josef Weiss.

After the songs Mr. Weiss again took took his seat at the piano and played that huge and interminably long work "Variations and Fugue on a Theme by Händel," by Brahms. No audience but a Tonkünstler Society would or could patiently sit through such an ordeal. Weiss did, however, succeed in making every bar and change interesting, and was asked when the long composition was over to play again, and their pianist obliged with a characteristic waltz by himself.

The Brooklyn meetings of the Tonkünkstler Society are held at the Argyle the second and fourth Tuesdays in each month, the fourth being a meeting for members only. The Manhattan meetings of the society will be held this year at the Aschenbroedel Club House, on the third Tuesday of the month.

THIS violin and orchestral school in Carnegie Hall has grown so that it becomes necessary to have another assistant, Miss Nell Houston Morgan, who has been engaged for some time past in a well-known Southern school, coming on for the purpose. She is one of the Joachim (Berlin) pupils, having for seven years had instruction there.

Miss Geraldine Morgan recently returned from a summer's trip to Berlin, consulting with Joachim, arranging with him for several former pupils to go to him, and making larger plans for this season. She was also the guest of the well-known Mendelssohn family, old friends, and had altogether a delightful experience.

Morgan String Quartet.

The two orchestral classes will continue, under the direction of Paul Morgan, there being a beginners' and an adults' class. It will be recalled that these classes were an exceptionally successful feature of last year's work, playing with great credit to all concerned. There will also be quartet classes, with pupils, thus giving them the opportunity of ensemble practice.

An additional new harmony class is to be organized, this department having extended beyond past proportions.

As usual, the violoncello department will be an important feature of the school, under the charge of Paul Morgan, who last season had some very promising pupils.

A special department is that for teachers who in limited time wish to learn as much as possible of the Joachim method, and who take daily lessons; there are quite a few from other cities, and these are given special facilities to perfect themselves in the great method. In many ways this violin school, with its 'cello department, quartet classes, orchestra classes and harmony classes, offers a unique opportunity for the player of stringed instruments.

The Morgan String Quartet will be heard in some important chamber music concerts, due notice of which will later be given. The series last year at private houses, as well as at Mendelssohn Hall, proved highly successful.

National Conservatory.

THE examinations are over at the National Conservatory, and pupils will be admitted any day. Masters are at the head of all departments. Leo Schulz, who recently returned from Europe, is at the 'cello department, and will again be the conductor of the conservatory orchestra. In both of these departments Mr. Schulz is doing a noble work for music education. Skillful both as a performer and teacher he is the right man in the right place, popular with the officers, the faculty and the pupils of the conservatory. Mr. Schulz's aim will be to build up the 'cello department. Pupils have every advantage to study solfeggio, theory, harmony, the history of music, and, in addition to this, can receive orchestral training all in connection with study of the 'cello.

BLANCHE DUFFIELD.—The charming young coloratura soprano, whose record of 250 concerts with Sousa on his tour was phenomenal, inasmuch as she did not miss a single concert and was always in voice, will be heard this season in important concerts.

MAUD KENNEDY, A CAPPIANI PUPIL.—This singer recently sang for a critical audience the "Shadow Dance," from Meyerbeer's "Dinorah." The ease of her singing of this difficult coloratura composition, her trill, staccato, impeccable retention of pitch throughout the various complicated cadenzi, and the evident brains she puts into her singing, combined with her youth and good looks, all make her singing highly enjoyable.

MUSICAL COURIER OFFICES—FINE ARTS BUILDING.

CHICAGO, October 12, 1901.

THE MUSICAL COURIER stated last week that Sembrich, Suzanne Adams and Esther Feé would in all probability appear at the Victor Herbert orchestral concerts, under Charles R. Baker's management, in the Auditorium. This news has now been definitely confirmed, the dates being December 9 and 10.

W. C. E. Seeboeck, who is recognized as one of the cleverest musicians in this city, and Ray Clarke Rose, of the Chicago Record-Herald, are engaged in writing a comic opera, "At the Sign of the Ginger Jar." May success attend this new venture.

Devotees of orchestral music will be interested in learning that on Thursday Theodore Thomas returned to Chicago, having spent an invigorating summer at his home in the White Mountains.

Earl R. Drake, of Handel Hall, favors THE MUSICAL COURIER with the following interesting information:

"The Drake Musical Club, with its orchestra of sixty players and chorus of seventy voices, will give during the coming season a series of five subscription concerts in the New Bush Temple of Music.

"This club, composed as it is of talented young players, who have the assistance of professional musicians from the Thomas Orchestra, will give several works new to Chicago, and the home composers will be well represented, as the following list of works indicates: Symphony in D minor, Weidig (new); Mass in D, Kolling; cantata, "Praise of Harmony," Frederic Grant Gleason; overture, "Paula and Francesca," Oldberg (new); cantata, "Wreck of the Hesperus," (new), Arthur E. Fisher; "Sketches," (new), Sansone, and suite, "The Brownies" (new), E. R. Drake. Engagements with several well-known artists are pending. Helen M. Buckley and Agnes Struble Baldwin, sopranos; Mary Wood Chase, pianist, and John W. Linee, basso, have been definitely engaged.

It is learned here that Mme. Emma Navada, who sails for America on October 25, will go direct to St. Louis.

Allen Spencer, the well-known pianist, will give historical lecture recitals at Milwaukee, on October 23 and November 26, the events being arranged by the College Endowment Association. Mr. Spencer will fill a number of important engagements during the season, and, as usual, his class of pupils is large.

Esther Feé, the violinist, formerly of Chicago, will be heard in a brilliant concert at the Grand Palais du Trocadero, Paris, on Thursday, October 17, just two days prior to her sailing for America.

Mr. and Mrs. Clarence Eddy, who are in Paris, will attend the concert at which Miss Feé makes her appearance in New York on November 18, with the Paur Symphony Orchestra, and Jessie Shay, pianist.

Ellen Beach Yaw, who likewise is in Paris, gave a musicale on Saturday evening, September 28, at which Esther Feé played.

The Hamlin Company announces that the ninth season of the Spiering Quartet will be under its direction. Mr. Spiering has arranged three unusually fine programs, which cannot fail to prove interesting.

At an imposing marriage ceremony soon to take place in this city, Lucille Stevenson Tewksbury, soprano; Sue Harrington Furbeck, contralto; Holmes Cowper, tenor, and Sydney Biden, baritone, will sing the Lohengrin "Wedding March," and Leon Marx, violinist, will play a solo, accompanied by Walfried Singer, harpist.

George Hamlin, the eminent tenor, has gone East for a short trip. On October 22 he will sing the tenor role in "Hora Novissima," at New Haven, for the bicentennial anniversary celebration of Yale College. Mr. Hamlin was engaged for this event by the composer, Horatio W. Parker.

The reorganized Drake Quartet—Earl R. Drake, first violin; Albert E. Heun, second violin; Arthur E. Fisher, viola, and Ernest Woollett, 'cello—will be heard in a chamber music concert at the residence of Fred D. Stevers, in Sheridan Park, on Wednesday evening, October 16. The quartet will give a series of concerts in this city during the present season.

Charles R. Baker makes the ensuing announcement: "William H. Sherwood has been engaged for a recital at Dallas, Tex., on November 22, under the auspices of the St. Cecilia Society, the event being the 'St. Cecilia Day' concert of the club. On his way to the Lone Star State he will stop at Enid, Okla. Ter., for a public performance. This occurs on Friday, November 15. Mr. Sherwood will give concerts in South Bend after the holidays."

The American Conservatory of Music is fortunate in numbering among its vocal instructors one who is a scholar, a musician and a writer of exceptional attainments. Reference here is made to Karleton Hackett whose pupils forcibly illustrate the creditable and essentially artistic work of their teacher.

Electra Gifford, the soprano, who has been singing at twelve Western musical events, returns to this city tomorrow. Miss Gifford will leave shortly for important engagements in Eastern States.

William A. Willett will give a recital at the Auditorium Conservatory of Music on November 7, and at the Kenwood Hotel on November 14. In the former event Miss Fay Hill will participate.

Madame Boetti is engaged in teaching a large and flourishing class at her studio in the Auditorium Building. One of her prominent pupils is Miss Agnes Rapa vocalist, who doubtless will be heard in public frequently throughout the present season.

Allen Spencer, assisted by Miss De Sellem and Mr. Karleton Hackett, will present a very attractive program in Kimball Hall on Thursday evening, October 17. The event is under the auspices of the American Conservatory.

Evening classes are being formed by Mary Benn Manning, dramatic instructor in the Sherwood Music School. The work will be largely oratorical, embracing public speaking and debating. Mrs. Manning's long experience while associated with the State University of Nebraska has fitted her admirably for this course of instruction. She has just been honored by being appointed chairman of the committee on extension of the National Elocutionists' Association.

This afternoon at Kimball Recital Hall, Howard Wells, Jan Van Oordt and Miss Mabel Goodwin will be heard in a representative program.

An interesting feature of the present season in Chicago will be the series of four ballad concerts announced by the Clayton F. Summy Company, to be held in the Music Hall, Fine Arts Building, on the afternoons of November 14, December 12, January 23 and March 6. As heretofore, these concerts will be devoted to bringing before the public the best music of recent composition, both vocal and instrumental.

Among talented pupils of William A. Willett, vocal instructor at the Chicago Auditorium Conservatory, is Miss Rose Neusbaum, soprano soloist at Jefferson Park Presbyterian Church. Mr. Willett is one of the most popular teachers of singing in this city.

Miss Anna Shaw Faulkner, who conducts the Chicago Orchestra program study classes, has issued invitations for an introductory recital on October 18, at 2:30 p.m. Among those who patronize Miss Faulkner's classes are Mesdames Theodore Thomas, Franklin MacVeagh, George E. Adams, J. J. Glessner, Hugh T. Birch, Cyrus H. McCormick, Burton Hanson, Charles L. Hutchinson, Martin A. Ryerson, H. M. Wilmarth, Otto Matz, A. W. H. Ellis, Charles D. Hamill, George P. Upton, Fre

An artistic recital was given on October 5 at the American Violin School. Joseph Vilim, director, and Cyril Graham played a Raff sonata, and the other talented performers were W. H. Bond, Miss Winifred Townsend and Mrs. Viola Frost Mixer.

Mr. Sherwood has just been engaged for an afternoon lecture recital and an evening public concert at the Southwestern University, Georgetown, Tex., on November 21.

Much sympathy is expressed owing to the death of Charles W. Green, pianist, organist and teacher, which took place during the past week at his home in Newark, Ohio. The possessor of a magnetic personality, he was an able teacher and a composer of promise. He played the organ at the Oak Park M. E. Church, and since 1899 acted as piano teacher in Miss Mary M. Shedd's School of Singing.

Joseph Jefferson, the distinguished actor, visited the Fine Arts Building to-day.

Frederick Warren's studio recital, given at the Auditorium Conservatory on Tuesday, October 8, in honor of Miss Gertrude Huling and her bridesmaids, was socially and artistically a success.

Miss Erie Backus, pupil of Maurice Aronson, is conducting the latter's preparatory classes in piano playing at Freeport, Ill., where Mr. Aronson's following is large and influential.

Critics aver, and not without reason, that the new play, "Petticoats and Bayonets," presented this week by the new star, Arthur Byron, and his company, at the Studebaker Hall, Fine Arts Building, is not a dramatic success. Nor does the piece appear to possess much literary value.

The Apollo Club has engaged George Hamlin to sing the tenor role in its previously announced performance of "The Damnation of Faust." This society has selected the following part songs for its concert on February 17, 1902: "Judge Me, O God," Mendelssohn; Cantata, Clarence Lucas (written for this occasion); "Ring Out, Wild Bells," Root (written for the Apollo Club); "A Shadow," Gollmick; "The Chase," Edward German, and "The Lord Is My Right," H. W. Parker.

At the opening of the Clio Association's new club rooms in this city, on Thursday of last week, an admirable piano recital was given by Maurice Aronson, who is a finished pianist, notwithstanding his large teaching clientèle. Mr. Aronson's numbers consisted of compositions by Brassin, Tschaikowsky, Sgambati, MacDowell, Balakireff and Chopin. The Klio Club chorus assisted.

Helen Buckley has just returned from Davenport, Ia., where she gave a recital and sang the soprano solos in Max Bruch's "Fair Ellen." That Miss Buckley won success is amply illustrated by the following press comments:

Every seat in the body of the house was taken last evening. The concert was eminently pleasing, the singing of Miss Helen Buckley, soprano, being remarkably fine. Miss Buckley has a great range of voice, but is especially strong and clear on the high notes. She was enthusiastically received and applauded, a rapturous encore being given her when she sang the "Nightingale's Song," by Nevin. —The Davenport Times, Tuesday, October 8, 1901.

The program was opened by Miss Buckley, who sang an aria, "Allesandro," by Händel. She has a voice of sweetness and power, and in the rendering of the difficult selections sang with an ease and grace that was eminently pleasing. Miss Buckley is an artist of great ability, and the applause that followed her singing of various selections was well deserved. She received a rapturous encore when she sang the "Nightingale's Song," by Nevin.—The Davenport Daily Leader, Tuesday, October 8, 1901.

The program was opened by Miss Buckley. The selection was an aria, "Allesandro," by Händel. In the four old melodies of the nations there was ample opportunity for Miss Buckley to show her ability as a musician, for in each of them, in the music itself, as well as in the words, were brought out the characteristics of the peoples represented. The sturdiness of the Scotch was felt in "Loch Lomond," the volatility of the Irish was put into "The Gap in the Hedge," the sentimentality of the Italian was in the "Giormi Sou che Nini," and there was a decidedly English color to "Good Morrow, Gossip Joan," aside from the words. Miss Buckley sang two other groups which pleased all. The French group opened with "Vous Dansez Marquise," by Lemaire, and was followed by such selections as "Absence," by Berlioz; "Bonjour Suzon," by Pessard, and "Villanelle," by Chaminade. While it was apparent that Miss Buckley makes no pretense to being a high soprano, it was equally clear that her artistic interpretation is all that she needs to recommend her to any audience. Her French was beautiful. But when she took up the first of the group of songs from the American composers, "Ah, 'Tis a Dream," that simple ballad by Hawley, it was such a contrast that when the group had finished with "Allah," by Chadwick, and "The Nightingale's Song," by Nevin, the audience would have more of her singing, and that, too, at once. As an encore number, Miss Buckley sang "When Love Is King," one of the old English folksongs which is pleasing at any time. Miss Buckley's versatility is her characteristic. She is a soloist in demand in Chicago with the Theodore Thomas Orchestra and the Apollo Club in oratorios, and her rendition of the delicate touch and the sweet perfumes of the ballade makes one to say she is truly an artist.—Davenport Republican, Tuesday, October 7, 1901.

Miss Buckley has been engaged to sing in Delaware, Ohio, on October 16.

A competent but modest piano teacher in this city is Miss Eleanor P. Sherwood, of the Sherwood Music School.

Fannie Church Parsons, who ably conducts a musical kindergarten, and has several competcnt assistants, including Miss Getty, has recently taken a studio in the Fine Arts Building.

Edmond Rostand, author of "Cyrano de Bergerac," will visit Chicago in December or January, and lecture under the auspices of the Alliance Française.

While in Paris during the past summer Dr. Ziegfeld, of the Chicago Musical College, was very favorably impressed by the singing of Madame Monteith, a brilliant pupil of Léon Escalais. Dr. Ziegfeld also enjoyed delightful interviews with Massenet and Sbriglia.

Howard Wells, pianist, of the American Conservatory of Music, is meeting with excellent results as a teacher.

The faculty concert of the Chicago Musical College will be an important and imposing event on the evening of October 15. THE MUSICAL COURIER has received an illustrated program, which is exceptionally artistic, while the numbers to be interpreted by eminent artists will doubtless arouse tremendous enthusiasm.

Miss Jessie Lynde-Hopkins, a gifted contralto, who has studied with Mrs. Hess-Burr, will be heard in a recital program at Madison, Wis., on October 18, before the Federation of Woman's Clubs.

Concerts.

The inaugural concert at the new Music Hall, Fine Arts Building, was given on Tuesday evening, October 8, by the distinguished American pianist, William H. Sherwood. Many musicians were present, and the event was of unusual interest. As an opening number, Mozart's noble C minor Fantasia was played. Next came Bach's difficult Bourrée in A minor, which was executed with marvelous finish and precision. "Chorus of Dancing Dervishes," Beethoven-Saint-Saëns, came as a brilliant and effective contrast, and was followed by that which in itself constitutes a formidable program, Schumann's "Carnival,"—a triumph in memory and in interpretative art.

Later Mr. Sherwood played "Meine Freude," Chopin-Liszt, and Chopin's "Revolutionary" and "Wintry Wind" études, Berceuse and Grande Polonaise. Liszt's Twelfth Hungarian Rhapsodie served as a ponderous finale, and it aroused genuine enthusiasm. Intervening selections were Grieg's Allegretto, from "Humoresken"; Templeton Strong's picturesque and fanciful "A Midsummer Night's Dream"; Tschaikowsky's "Dialogue," op. 72; March in D, Raff, and "Lohengrin's Verweis an Elsa," Wagner-Liszt. If any adverse comment is to be made upon the program it may be said that perhaps it was too long—not too long to listen to, tranquilly, as you loiter in luxurious contentment in subdued summer twilight, and seem to feel the breezes vibrate with exquisite music; but too long for conventional requirements in even so ideal a place as this beautiful new music hall, where the acoustics are admirable.

Mr. Sherwood's playing is so familiar to the American concert-going public, and hence to readers of this paper, that detailed descriptions seem superfluous here. Facility and brilliancy of execution, harmonious varieties of tone and touch, power and discrimination in exacting octave passages, rhythmic accuracy—these were among the noticeable features. Seriousness of purpose and high artistic ideals permeate all Mr. Sherwood's concert performances. One looks in vain for flippancy.

The soloist of the occasion was Miss Mabelle Crawford, whose fine contralto voice was heard to advantage in varied songs by Tosti, Needham, Maude V. White, Nevin and Massenet. Miss Crawford gave also a beautiful interpretation of the old Welsh selection, "All Through the Night."

It is unfortunate that the piano recital given by Emil Liebling and Allen Spencer fell upon the same night as the Sherwood concert, for musicians could not well attend both events. Neither could music critics. The consensus of opinion regarding this other recital, which took place in Kimball Hall, is that the two well-known pianists interpreted compositions in a manner which proved to be of true worth artistically and educationally, though in several places, owing doubtless to lack of rehearsals, the ensemble is said to have been imperfect. They played "Hommage à Händel," Moscheles; Impromptu, "Manfred," Reinecke; Andante and Variations, op. 46, Schumann, and Variations on a Theme by Beethoven-Saint-Saëns. Glenn Hall's beautiful tenor voice gave additional interest to the occasion. Mr. Hall sang: "Serenade," Brahms; "Du bist wie eine Blume" and "The Hidalgo," Schumann; "Stornello," A. Vannini; "Irish Love Song," Margaret Lang; "Fortunio," A. L., and "Thy Beaming Eyes," MacDowell. The capable accompanist was Miss Julia Caldwell.

The Chicago Auditorium Conservatory's faculty concert was held in the Music Hall, Fine Arts Building, on Thursday evening, October 10. Upon the unquestionable success of this event Frederic Grant Gleason, director, and Roy Arthur Hunt, manager, are to be congratulated. A trio, consisting of Robert W. Stevens, Errico Sansone and Julius Herner, opened the program with Schumann's Trio in D minor, "Adagio con Sentimento—con fuoco" being played with particular charm and unanimity. Henry Dickson, of the dramatic department, followed with a pathetic and able reading of Watson's "Wounded," after which Julius Herner, a stalwart 'cellist, with a good tone and convincing execution, played the first movement of Davidoff's Concerto. Mrs. Ooliata Zimmerman sang three selections with much artistic finish, and Robert W. Stevens interpreted "Invitation to the Dance" and Chopin's "Barcarolle."

Evidently Mr. Stevens is a pianist of exceptional attainments. Certainly he is worthy of better things than the somewhat long drawn out theme and variations known as "Invitation to the Dance." The remainder of the program brought out Walter Keller, organist, who played in good style and with appropriate registration, "Introduction and Priests' March" ("Montezuma," Act 1), Gleason, a work full of noble harmonics; William A. Willett, who won an ovation by singing "Love's Rapture" (dedicated to Mme. Evans Von Klenner), Kortheuer, and other songs; Fay Hill, pianist, Mr. Gleason's gifted pupil, whose performance, though abounding in many commendable features, was lacking in depth of expression; Mabel Lewis, whose recitations were listened to with appreciative attention, and Errico Sansone, violinist, who possesses a magnificent execution but a tone which is somewhat devoid of those subtle qualities which inevitably fill the hearer with an indescribable satisfaction. The audience was large, representative and enthusiastic.

MADAME MACONDA'S singing in "The Redemption" at the Maine Festival, reported elsewhere, was one of the artistic successes of the festival. She was warmly encored and captured critics and audiences alike. The Maine people will long remember her glorious voice. Her artistic achievements and her winning personality are described in these additional criticisms:

Madame Maconda has her own place in favor with Maine and Portland audiences and repeated visits emphasize the fact that here is a singer who must be considered one of the most satisfactory ever heard in our concert halls. Her warm, sympathetic tones awake response in the educated and uneducated alike, while her splendid vocalism leaves the critics little to decry. An all round singer is Maconda, and her few solo parts last evening were gems rarely appreciated.

Madame Maconda was given an ovation upon her entrance. Her appearance was exceptionally attractive in a dazzling gown of white, completely covered with silver sequins, which glinted and shimmered with every movement. With this she wore a string of beautiful pearls. Her first solo, "From Thy Love as a Father," was encored.—Portland Evening Express, October 9, 1901.

Madame Maconda was welcomed heartily on her appearance upon the stage, and sang so beautifully as to inspire general regret that she could not be heard in other concerts of this season's festival. Her voice has grown steadily in power and quality since she began singing for Maine people, and her charming personality has endeared her to us more, perhaps, than any other singer.—Portland Daily Advertiser, October 9, 1901.

Charlotte Maconda in oratorio was new to a Portland audience. She was in admirable voice and won an enthusiastic encore by her rendition of "From Thy Love as a Father."

Maconda's first number was "The Lord, He Is Risen Again." Her flutey, flexible voice was heard to advantage, and in her supreme opportunity of the evening, "From Thy Love as a Father," she sang brilliantly. In the concluding phrase, "Shall Rise to Heights Supernal," she rang clearly above the thousand of the chorus. The house clapped loudly.

* * * Maconda sang "Ye Mountains," a very difficult number, with brilliant ease.—Portland Daily News, October 9.

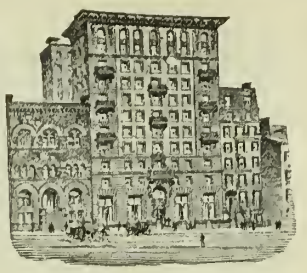
MRS. HADDEN-ALEXANDER BUSY.—Mrs. Alexander's residence studio at Carnegie Hall this season is already the scene of much activity. On October 9 she gave a recital, the subject "Interpretation," before the Peebles & Thompson School, her principal pieces being Schumann and Chopin. This was the opening of the series of noon lectures and recitals.

With Mr. Alexander, baritone, she will give several lecture-recitals for the Board of Education, the subject being "Music as a Language." She has engaged to play for the Madison, N. J., Thursday Morning Club, and these concert appearances, along with her many private pupils, certainly open her season most auspiciously.

The German language department at the Powers-Alexander studios is to be an important feature, Clemence Schroeder having the conversation classes Tuesday and Friday evenings, Carl Gralow having charge of German diction.

THREE OUT OF SIX.—Of the six solo pianists who play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Boston this season three will use the Mason & Hamlin piano, namely, Harold Bauer, Ernest Hutcheson (one of the leading Baltimorean pianists, and instructor at the Peabody Institute of that city), and Carlo Buonamici. This is a signal honor for the Mason & Hamlin Company, and a tribute to the Mason & Hamlin piano.

Boston Music Notes.



HOTEL BELLEVUE,
17 BEACON STREET,
BOSTON, October 12, 1901.

During the season Etta Edwards will give four morning concerts at Steinert Hall, where many of her pupils will appear.

Mrs. Edwards will also "receive" at her apartment in the Westminster when the season gets fully started.

Boston seems to be following the fashion of New York in respect to the time of the season, which opens each year later and later, until now it is about the 1st of November before classes are arranged and the large number of students return to the city.

Miss Edith E. Torrey, soprano, has resumed lessons at her residence-studio, 164 Huntington avenue, after a restful summer at Wellesley and Hingham. Miss Torrey will give a recital in the city early in the season, which cannot fail to appeal to music lovers.

Edwin H. Lemare, organist of St. Margaret's, Westminster, London, was in the city on Tuesday, and tested the organ at Symphony Hall, where he is to give a recital on the 29th. On Wednesday evening Mr. Lemare went to Taunton at the invitation of Mr. Clemson, organist of St. Thomas Chuch in that city. A number of prominent organists from this ctiy were invited to be present, about fifty guests attending. Among those from Boston were B. J. Lang, Wallace Goodrich, H. M. Dunham, H. J. Stewart, Mr. Locke and Mr. Spaulding. Mr. Lemare expects to arrange another American tour in the spring.

Two of Madame Franklin-Salisbury's pupils will give recitals in the near future, Mrs. Hunt and Miss Heindl. Other pupils of Madame Salisbury are singing in "Evangeline," the prima donna of that company, Miss Burkhart, being a former pupil. Miss Blanche Morrison has made a great success in the small part at first assigned to her, and has been rapidly promoted to a leading position.

Carl Faelten, director of the Faelten Pianoforte School, gave his first recital of the present season in Steinert Hall, Tuesday evening. The program was announced as the thrteenth in the series of standard piano works which Mr. Faelten began two years ago, and was preceded by a few historical remarks by Mrs. Reinhold Faelten. It was as follows:

Air and Variations, E major (Harmonious Blacksmith).....Händel
Rondeau Brillante, B minor, op. 109.....Hummel
Sonata Quasi una Fantaisie, E flat major, op. 27, No. 1....Beethoven
Etude, B flat minor, op. 104, No. 1.....Mendelssohn
Song Without Words, D major, No. 11.....Mendelssohn
Capriccio, F sharp minor, op. 5.....Mendelssohn
Norwegian Folklife, op. 19.....Grieg

The slow movement of the sonata was, perhaps, the most enjoyable from a musician's standpoint, for in this the player had the greatest opportunity to display that dignity and breadth of style for which he is so distinguished. The entire performance was a rare musical treat, and was listened to with rapt attention by a large audience.

This evening Mr. Minkowsky will be at Steinert Hall to examine the voices of the young women competing for the Madame Nordica musical scholarship, which gives the fortunate winner a course of vocal study at a musical school in New York.

The final and public rehearsal of the Fadettes took place in Arcade Hall this morning at 10 o'clock. This organization, under the direction of Mrs. Caroline B. Nichols, has booked their entire season, beginning next week.

Ernest Lachmund has been spending a few weeks in Boston since his return from Germany. Yesterday he left for Duluth, where he has a large class already formed. Mr. Lachmund devotes a large part of his time to composition, some of his recent publications being several piano solos and songs, two of the latter being "O, Moonlight Deep and Tender" and "Heigho! Daisies and Buttercups."

Miss Caroline Belcher and her sister have taken a studio at Huntington Chambers.

Mr. Sobeski will be "at home" in his studio on Saturday afternoon next, when there will be some good music heard.

Miss Edna Floyd, prima donna soubrette of the "Princess Chic" company, is a pupil of Miss Clara Munger. Miss Floyd has made a great success on the stage.

The Boston Singing Club, H. G. Tucker conductor, announces two concerts to be given on the evenings of January 22 and April 2, 1902, in Chickering Hall. The program of the first concert will consist largely of unaccompanied works by Palestrina, Hammerschmidt, Gallus, Mendelssohn, Tschaikowsky, Josiah Bradlee, J. C. D. Parker, Horatio W. Parker and H. J. Stewart. The production of works by the three organists and musical directors of Trinity Church, Boston, during practically the last forty years, as well as the first public performance of manuscript works by Mr. Bradlee, and a work written for the club by Mr. Stewart, will make the first concert of notable interest. At the second concert the Mozart Requiem and Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Night" will be given with full orchestral accompaniment and competent soloists.

The program of the first concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, October 18 and 19, is as follows: Brahms, Academic Overture; Lalo, Concerto for Violoncello; Liszt, Symphonic Poem No. 7, "Festive Sounds"; Beethoven, Symphony No. 7. Soloist, Jean Gérardy.

KATHARINE FISK.—Mme. Katharine Fisk's opening song recital of the season was given at Norwalk, Conn., last Wednesday evening, before a large, brilliant and critical audience. Among other delightful numbers was a group of children's songs presented for the first time by Mrs. Fisk which made so pronounced a hit that she has decided to include them permanently in her repertory.

Here are some press notices which speak for themselves and tell of the rare art and attractive personality of Mrs. Fisk, whose season, thus auspiciously begun, promises to be a long and active one:

In the concert which Mrs. Katharine Fisk gave in Lockwood Hall last night music lovers of the Norwalks enjoyed one of the rarest treats imaginable. The audience was large, fashionable and thoroughly appreciative. Mrs. Fisk is invariably in good voice, but last night it appeared that her work was never more artistically done. She was generously encored. The program was varied and of a classical order, the selections all being by the most celebrated of composers.—Evening Sentinel, October 10.

Mrs. Fisk was in her best voice, which, in addition to her handsome face and commanding presence, captivated a critical audience. A series of children's songs made the hit of the concert. Mrs. Fisk is one of those rare contraltos who have the power to put in their notes the tenderness that appeals to even the uncultured person, and in her rendition of the songs of babyhood truly it might be said that "music hath charms to soothe the savage breast."—The Hour, October 10.

J. LEWIS BROWNE.

He Plays in the Royal Academy of Santa Cecilia, Rome, Italy.

ONE of the foremost of organists and composers in the South is J. Louis Browne, of Atlanta, Ga. Mr. Browne's reputation, however, is not confined to the United States; he is known in Europe and holds the esteem of many of the most distinguished transatlantic musicians. Mr. Browne enjoys the distinction of being the second American organist who thus far has been invited to play in the Royal Academy of Santa Cecilia, Rome, Italy.

Below are some of the comments made on Mr. Browne's recital, June 30, 1901:

REGIA ACCADEMIA DI SANTA CECILIA.
ROMA, il 2 Juglio, 1901.

La Presidenza di questa Regia Accademia sente il gradito dovere di porgere a Lei, Egregio Maestro, i sensi di vivo compiacimento e di riconoscenza per l'artistico concerto d'Organo da Lei offerto il di 30 Giugno scorso.

L'esito di quella udizione lascio grata impressione in tutti gli intervenuti e questa Regia Accademia desidera esternargliene la sua soddisfazione. Interprete di questi sentimenti io La prego accoglierli insieme ai mici particolari atti di grato anima e di debita stima.

Il Presidente, E. DI SAN MARTINO.

Egregio Signor J. Lewis Browne, Pensione dell' Unione, Piazzi Montecitorio, Roma.

The directors of the Royal Academy feel it a pleasing duty to tender you, illustrious maestro, the expression of their warmest thanks and most sincere congratulation on the occasion of your artistic organ recital of June 30 ult. All who were present were deeply impressed and interested, and this Royal Academy desires to express to you its entire satisfaction. While confirming these sentiments, I beg you to rest assured of my personal gratitude and highest esteem. E. DI SAN MARTINO, President.

The Count di San Martino, president of the Royal Academy of St. Cecilia, Rome, Italy, to J. Lewis Browne.

CONCERTO BROWNE.

La fama di artista valoroso dell' organista J. Lewis Browne fece il miracolo di richiamare, nell'elegante sala dei concerti di Santa Cecilia, un pubblico elletto e numeroso, tale da continuare la tradizione dei concerti invernali. Come esecutore impeccabile e colorito, come compositore geneiale e forte, il Browne fu applauditissimo. La sua improvvisazione gli valse l'ammirazione, oltreche dei buongustai e dei dilettanti di musica, di moltissimi artisti. Il Browne ha forti studi, e ispirazione facile. L'organo toccato dalle sue mani esercita completo il faseino della suggestione. Alla fine del concerto il pubblico, che aveva applaudito ad ogni pezzo, fece al valoroso maestro una calda ovazione.—Il Nuovo Fanfulla di Roma, July 2, 1901.

The fame of the distinguished artist and organist J. Lewis Browne filled the elegant concert hall of St. Cecilia with Rome's most cultured and most music loving citizens in appropriate continuance of the traditions of concerts as given there. For faultless technic, brilliant coloring and strong and soulful composition, Browne touched the hearts and gained the applause of his audience. His improvisation won for him the admiration not only of his musical friends and critics, but also of all true lovers of the beautiful and difficult in music. Browne is a deep student with the happiest of inspirations. In his skilled hands the organ throbs and vibrates and reflects every shade of artistic inspiration. At the end of the concert, which was frequently interrupted by bursts of applause, the talented artist received a regular ovation from the people.

A SANTA CECILIA.

Oggi il Signor J. Lewis Browne ha dato a Santa Cecilia un'audizione di musica per organo, innanzi ad un numeroso ed elegante uditorio.

Il valoroso esecutore e compositore fu assai applaudito.—La Tribuna, Rome, June 30, 1901.

To-day Signor J. Lewis Browne gave at Santa Cecilia a delightful organ recital in presence of a numerous and distinguished audience. The talented composer and artist was loudly applauded.

J. Lewis Browne, organist and pianist, of Atlanta, gave a most interesting organ concert on Sunday. I send the program:

Sonata No. 4, in la min., op. 98.....Rheinberger
Lied .....Dethier
Preludio, op. 78.....Chaminade
Benedizione nuziale.....Sgambati
Fuga in do magg.....Buxtehude
Andante, Andante molto, op. 5.....Brahms
Scherzo .....Browne
Venezia (trascrizione), op. 25.....Nevin
Improvvisazione su tema dato estemporaneamente.

Santa Cecilia's pretty concert hall was well filled, and would have been crowded had it not been so far advanced in the season. Mr. Browne took the audience by storm. His playing was brilliant, powerful, full of sentiment, and he displayed a versatility given but to few. One of his best numbers was certainly the opening number, the Rheinberger Sonata, the intermezzo of which was given with a delicacy of touch and expression seldom to be heard from an organist. Mr. Browne's own Scherzo is a sympathetic composition on the impromptu de Chopin style, and was a test of virtuosity. All the numbers were beautifully executed, but where he made a decided sensation was in the improvisation on a theme that Marchetti gave him; really this was a "tour de force," and after the feat all artists present went to congratulate Mr. Browne on his profound knowledge, not alone of the instrument, but of his profound musicianship. It is to be hoped that Mr. Browne will come back to Santa Cecilia. —Rome correspondent of THE MUSICAL COURIER, July 24, 1901.

J. Lewis Browne, the organist, gave a concert at the Santa Cecilia Academy a few days ago, and notwithstanding the suffocating weather the room was full. Besides rendering a long and difficult program, Mr. Browne delighted and surprised the audience by his improvisations. The artists present complimented him in all sincerity. Inspiration seems quite natural to him, and he improvises as under suggestion. He had an ovation at the end of the concert, and, what is more, deserved it.—S. P. Q. R., Rome correspondent of the New York Dramatic Mirror.

Clavier Piano School.

ARRANGEMENTS have been made to have Mrs. Raymond Brown give her talk on Wagner's "Parsifal" on Tuesday evening, October 22, in Clavier Hall. Much interest was manifested in a series of talks on "The Ring of the Nibelung" last season, and it is probable that the course will be repeated this year.

The regular recital of the school will be given on Friday evenings this year instead of Thursdays, as heretofore, and the first one will be on October 18.

The harmony class, under F. H. Shepard, began Monday, October 14, and much interest has been felt in the department of harmony and ear training, and it promises to become one of the important features of the school.

JEANNETTE DURNO.—Miss Jeannette Durno's manager at Steinway Hall, Chicago, announces that the pianist's concert engagements for the fall season include recitals at Beloit College, Beloit, Wis., on November 11; at Monroe, Wis., on November 13, and at Oshkosh, Wis., on November 14. She will also give recitals at Minneapolis, Minn., on November 22, and at Adrian, Mich., on December 9. During December Miss Durno will tour in Kansas, playing at Topeka and the other large cities, and after January 1 she will appear at events in the East, giving recitals in New York and Boston. This gifted musician is also engaged for recitals in Peoria, Ill., on February 18, and Waterloo, Ia., on February 22.

All of which illustrates that Miss Jeannette Durno is entering upon a brilliant concert season.

ANDERSON-BAERNSTEIN IN JOINT RECITALS.—Sara Anderson and Joseph Baernstein will give a series of joint recitals this season. Two dates are announced for this month, at the Lyceum, at Englewood, N. J., on the 29th, and at Memorial Hall, Brooklyn, on the 31st. Both artists are engaged for concerts. Verdi's "Requiem," in Boston, Mass.; recitals in Binghamton, N. Y.; New York city; Toledo, Ohio; Saginaw, Mich.; Chicago, Ill., and "The Messiah" in St. Paul and Minneapolis, Minn., and Galesburg, Ill.

My Dear Mr. Stewart—We take this opportunity of complimenting you on the splendid practical results accomplished by your School of Opera during the first year of its existence and gladly bear testimony to its advantages as a training school for those desirous of following a professional career in opera.

We are more than pleased with the graduates of your institution who have become members of the Bostonians and will gladly avail ourselves in the future of the opportunity for engaging singers who have pursued a course of study under your direction. With best wishes always,

Yours very sincerely

"BOSTONIANS."

The Maine Festival.

THE western section of the Maine Music Festival, which had its eastern concerts in Bangor on the three week days previous, was performed in the Portland Auditorium on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday, October 7, 8 and 9, with a result which in very nearly every way was highly gratifying. As ever, there were five concerts, three at night and two in the afternoon, and the attendance at all of them was so large as to remove far beyond ordinary distance the fear which has sometimes haunted Maine music patrons—that the festival future was not to be filled with material comfort.

While there was a rather less logical arrangement of the programs this season, the concerts lost nothing and may have gained a bit. The first concert had a miscellaneous program, led by Signor Campanari as the principal singer; the second was a matinee, including compositions of some native musicians; the third was given over to the performance of "The Redemption"; the fourth was another matinee of miscellany, and the final concert was devoted to the ovation extended to Madame Schumann-Heink.

Whoever are brought here for principal singers, the primary features of the Maine Festival must always be the chorus and orchestra, the one wholly native and the other more and more closely approaching that state under the scheme of development originally adopted by the festival founders. The chorus numbered, for the Portland section, 800 voices, and may fairly be said to have constituted the most confident and completely trained body of singers ever brought together in the State. Always the stronger chorus of the two, with particular reference to the male voices and a nearly definable purity of action which has not elsewhere been equaled, the Portland chorus this year gave an amazingly good exhibition of what can be done with raw material in competent hands.

To be sure, a chorus which has sung "The Messiah," "Elijah" and "The Redemption," the most striking selections from practically all the great operas, and the vast number of miscellaneous works familiar to all students of the Maine Festival programs, cannot be considered as belonging in the awkward squad, yet it is not so long since the beginning of the State's musical renascence that it cannot be said with truth that the work of these 800 singers was a marvel of precision, confidence and intelligence of a lofty order. The chorus was heard first, of course, in the "Hallelujah Chorus," which invariably follows the overture of Maine festivals, and then, in the first concert, sang Jakobowski's "Carnival Festival," Tarantelle; the kermesse chorus in "Faust," and the hymn in "Cavalleria Rusticana," in which latter number Madame Suzanne Adams sang the part of Santuzza. Then in succeeding concerts followed Mendelssohn's "All Men, All Things"; Jakobowski's "May Luck Attend You"; Lassen's charming and familiar "Only Thou," and "Evening," repeated from other years; the "Ye Nations Offer to the Lord" and Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," together with the entire oratorio mentioned above. Some of the leading numbers were sung at more than one concert, but all were sung well and no excuses are due for that.

Aside from the exhibition of sustained powers exemplified through the oratorio, the first work was done in the "Faust" chorus. It is always the case in Maine festivals that the chorus does best with purely dramatic works, and this is a somewhat peculiar circumstance considering the naturally phlegmatic character of the New England type. Yet the rule is seldom broken. Last year it was the "Here They Come," from the final act of "Carmen"; this season the bull ring gave place to the kermesse, but there was the spirited phrasing for Gounod which the chorus gave to Bizet before, and throughout the festival this was the most sought after number from that quarter. It would be useless to seek after faults in the chorus singing. Possibly there will never be a perfect choral outside the gates of Paradise; but the observer of the work in Maine must bear many things in mind and doing so can scarcely find room for criticism in the face of such a multitude of virtues.

It is a part of the festival scheme, thanks to the warm nature directing it, to devote more attention to general effect than to mere nicety of technic; here, we may be sure, is one of the reasons for the growing confidence in the superiority of the Maine concerts to some other and older ones. These concerts were no exception. It was always, as it is to be hoped it always will be, how the chorus was singing, not what. This gave infinitely greater opportunity to the ingenuity of the director, and far larger pleasure to the audiences, who were often moved to admiration of the highly colored effects derived from the chorus presentation of some not much thought of work. Finally, the Portland festival demonstrated with emphasis, renewed in a startling and positive degree, that there is developing "a Maine voice"—the voice with which the chorus sings—the composite utterance in which is expressed the future of the festivals. I am bound to renew my protest against so frequent applause on the part of the chorus, even with the knowledge that the suggestion is offensive, but in the hope that it may be accepted with the excuses due true sincerity.

As to the Maine Symphony Orchestra, here was another triumph—if we are willing to concede triumph to the chorus. The orchestra included nearly seventy men, together with Miss Harriet Shaw, the harpist, and of that number more than ever before were natives and residents in the State. It was not five years ago by any means that there was much ill-concealed laughter about the country when it was said that there was on foot a proposition to organize a Maine symphony orchestra, made up of musicians native to that State. The first festival was rather wide of the mark, it may be; but the second was closer, and the third and fourth were nearer than that. Here again this year, for the fifth time, the orchestra came together after the Bangor concerts in finer preparation than ever, and with so large a number of Maine players on its roster that it brought well into the range of vision the time when the whole organization will be as distinctively of and in the State as is the chorus, and when it will be thought as needless to import mercenary players as it is and ever has been to bring in hired singers for the banks on the stage.

The orchestra's best work was done in its most important selection, the "1812" overture, by Tschaikowsky, a composer whose works have already been thought much of in Maine Festival seasons. The overture was exceedingly well done—so well that some carping visitors were honestly carried off their wits in admiration for the reading of it. The fullest rein was given to the descriptive quality of the work, with the result that it took on the nature of a definite musical spectacle of proportions quite in advance of anything before seen here. Besides, there were the "Ruy Blas" and "Egmont" overtures; the "Anitra's Dance" in the "Peer Gynt" Suite; the ballet music in "Faust," in seven movements; Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsodie No. 2; Meyerbeer's Fackeltanz No. 2; the "Procession of the Gods," in Wagner's "Das Rheingold"; a brace of brief Tschaikowsky numbers, "Danse de la Fée Dragée," and another, and the Wagner "Träume," with excellent violin obligato by Dr. Wasgatt, the concertmaster of the orchestra, and Delibes' "Coppelia" Waltz No. 2—the two last named in a brace.

Besides these, of course, there was the usual work of accompanying and the oratorio, so that the orchestra had a-plenty of labor throughout the five concerts of the season. Besides these already named there was a most fascinating little incident in the playing of Harry McLellan's new "Perplexity," dedicated to a charming member of the soprano chorus, and which proved to be one of the best of the lighter incidental numbers selected for any of the festivals. It was played on every possible occasion and never failed to elicit the enthusiastic attention of the audiences. Also, James Wright, a member of the male chorus and interested particularly in the festival affairs, was invited to lead the orchestra through his "Twentieth Century Festival March," dedicated to the wife of the director of the concerts; while R. B. Hall, of Waterville, whose name will be familiar to band readers of THE COURIER as the composer of some of our liveliest military two-steps, conducted his "Maine Festival March," and was enthusiastically received by his friends in the audience and on the stage.

The orchestra has not before done work of the quality which characterized every portion of its endeavors at the Portland Festival this year. There has been danger of over-brassing it—in other years, but that has evidently passed away. The string section was noteworthily strong and intelligent, very much, it may be suggested, being due to the splendid assistance of the concertmaster; while for the general conduct of this part of the festival there need be no hesitation in saying that the readings were sufficient, agreeably bold, entirely unfettered and altogether expressive of the refreshing quality of the genius which inspires these concerts and which has made them continuously possible.

The principals of the programs were very satisfactory as a whole, while for various individuals there is ready more than the usual measure of appreciation and enthusiasm. It seems unfortunate but I earnestly hope not ungracious to have to say ever so kindly that Mme. Suzanne Adams did not create the amount of interest which had been expected, most probably for the good but entirely unsatisfying reason that the audiences had expected too much; or it may be that Maine folks are growing critical with the advance of their musical education. Possibly a further acquaintance with the festival, or with the houses in which she sang or something else as material as either of these, might have moved in Madame Adams' favor.

Or perhaps the interest in her was mild only as compared with what Maine people have accorded to Madame Maconda and Madame Blauvelt, not to say Nordica and Sembrich and Schumann-Heink—amounting nearly to affection. [Something more of Maconda will be found elsewhere.—Ed.] Or, again, she may have slightly underestimated the local requirements. But, all these excuses aside, though she did receive the generous welcome so generally given by Maine audiences, she in no way gave us the best of her powers until almost the very last of her, when, for an encore, she sang "Home, Sweet Home," so very beautifully, with such a flavor of ineffable sweetness, and so altogether charming a grace and sentiment, as to sweep away all our doubts. Her main numbers were the shadow song in "Dinorah," a duet with Signor Campanari, one of those notable duos from "Ernani"; the Santuzza part in the hymn from "Cavalleria Rusticana," and several songs by Leo Stern, her husband, who came to Portland with her, and played some piano accompaniments for her encores.

Madame Bouton was a favorite in a considerable degree for her beautiful mezzo voice. Mr. Miles, an old friend of Maine people, sang himself still deeper into favor both in single numbers and in his duet from "I Puritani" with Signor Campanari; and for his immensely effective singing in "The Redemption," of which more below. Madame Maconda was heard in "The Redemption," and far too briefly for her thousands of Maine admirers. Signor Campanari was the prominent figure of the first concert and received a big reception. Mrs. Jennie King Morrison, formerly of Maine, appeared twice with distinct success, and Willis E. Bacheller, another Maine product, gave a most interesting performance with his vibrant tenor and quite surprised his audiences by singing better in concert than in the oratorio, in which he had a difficult and not greatly compensating part. Besides these were Miss Otten, the clever young violinist, and Miss Hirschman, pianist, both of whom went away in high local favor. Then there was Madame Schumann-Heink, who for two years has been the main voice of the festival here; her appearance this season was no exception to the rule, and the audience of Wednesday night fairly outdid itself and all others in giving to her a welcome. She sang liberally Penelope's aria in "Odyssus," the prison song in the fourth act of "Le Prophète," "The Lord Is Mindful of His Own," in "St. Paul"; the Arditi Bolero, which was so much of a favorite last year, and the comical drinking song in "Lucrezia Borgia" (Orsini's famous "Il segreto per esser felici"). Her voice was remarkable in the power with which it penetrated the rather giant distances of the auditorium, and commanding in the rare sweetness of its undertones as well as in the tremendous note which closes the prison song of "Le Prophète."

Mr. Miles, whose constant development is a source of pride and joy to his friends and his audiences, and his audiences are his friends, sang best in the oratorio, and particularly in the moving passages descriptive of "The Passion," where his "And I have attained unto salvation eternal" was something to be remembered, for the eminently reverent tone of his reading and the evident sincerity of his mental attitude. Mr. Bacheller was a surprise, for after making a rather indifferent impression through his work in "The Redemption," though in no way uncomplimentary, he reappeared the next night with the "O Paradise" in "L'Africaine," and displayed unsuspected powers of such breadth and splendor that there was no doubt in placing him near the head of the tenors of festival history. On Wednesday night his voice was handled with a distinct virility, sometimes lacking in the sensuous quality which we are accustomed to expect in tenors, but carrying with it an impressive power and an essential spotlessness of timbre such as not only satisfied in the most positive degree but gave promise of developments yet unreached. In his encore Mr. Bachellor might have expressed himself with a finer touch, which seems to be about his only deficiency, and that by no means serious. It is to be suspected that had he given freer rein to his sentiments in the oratorio we might not have waited for another night before agreeing that he is to be known as one of the best of tenors and one of the most pleasing of singers. There will be genuine regret if Mr. Bacheller does not sing in the festival of 1902.

Signor Campanari was recalled again and again by his audience nn the opening night, and finally agreed to sing both of those songs which have made him so much beloved in the East, the song of the toreador in "Carmen," and the rollicking song of "Figaro." For a second encore he sang a charming serenade written for him by a friend, and sang off-stage while the strings imitated guitars.

Miss Hirschman played so well with her Liszt concerto that her audience by no means heard enough of her, though she had some slight opportunity in her encores. She was programmed for a concert later in the festival, but did not appear because a change in the local arrangements gave a place to other events. She deserves praise in a full degree, for technic of a nearly faultless sort, to which were joined a fine "style" and a most engaging personality, which attached her to the audience from the very first. Miss Otten, the violinist, exceeded all expectations with her strong, boldly conceived bowing and the warmth of sentiment and action which she infused into her performance.

Thus it will be seen that the Maine Festival of 1901 had plenitude of attractions for its patrons, while it rather more than held up to the desire of its friends to keep it moving steadily toward the high place for which it was designed among the first of American institutions. High purpose, faithful adherence to first principles and promises, persistent endeavor toward the attainment of the ideal and personal sacrifice that these interests may be maintained—this year as before, but in even greater degree, these were the underlying inspirations of the festival's success, never obtrusively seen but perfectly apparent to every thoughtful observer. It is good to be able to say that the Portland concerts paid a handsome money earning over and above all the costs, and that to a greater degree than ever before the public and the participants in the festival indicated in all practical ways their confidence in and their gratitude to Mr. Chapman.

We are not an easy people. There is some tincture in the northern air, some quality in our low tempered blood, which makes us resent the idea that we are even ordinarily compliant or readily enlisted in new enterprises. It is not a small achievement to enter a State like this and ignore the personal element until the differences and the unwillingnesses and the resentments and the doubts and the fears and the scoffing are smoothed away so that at last there may be breathed into the rocky fastnesses of the heart of us the lovely melodies of the world of harmony.

STELLA PRINCE-STOCKER.

MRS. STELLA PRINCE-STOCKER holds a unique place among the women musicians of America. She has successfully cultivated a field which none of her sisters in art has entered, and she has accomplished a work of which any musician, man or woman, might well be proud. And, pleasing to relate, she is a native American, and the greater part of her education was had in this country.

Miss Stella Prince was born in Jacksonville, Ill., and passed her girlhood there. When very young she showed a decided talent for music, and was never so happy as when singing or playing the piano. She was instructed, taught by the best teachers in the place and made rapid and sure progress. Later she went to Europe and continued her studies. In addition to the voice and the piano, she studied the theory of music, taking a course of lessons with distinguished specialists in harmony, composition, thorough bass, counterpoint and orchestration. Returning to America she taught for three years in the Jacksonville Conservatory of Music. Afterward she moved to Duluth and became the leading teacher there. She was elected director of the Duluth Choral Society and gave a series of successful concerts. About this time Miss Prince was married to Mr. Stocker, a prominent citizen of Duluth. She began composing in a variety of forms and produced some works which attracted much attention and which were praised by the leading musicians of the country.

Mrs. Stocker was ambitious to exercise her talents and musical activities in a larger field, so, five years ago, she moved to New York, which will, she expects, be her permanent home. Since coming to New York she has been incessantly busy, teaching, composing, lecturing and directing orchestras and choral societies. Her illustrated lectures on "American Music," "The Prose and Poetry of Song," "Music and Childhood," "The Path to Music Land," "A Musical Picture Gallery," "Art Coteries," &c., have been repeated before large audiences in New York and neighboring cities. All the time Mrs. Stocker has been a prolific composer, as the subjoined list of her works shows:

WARNEMUNDE, September 10, 1901.

HOCHVEREHRTE FRAU STOCKER—Der letzte Tag unsrer Bekanntschaft wird mir unvergesslich sein. Ich bewundere noch immer Ihre eben so schöne, wie interessante Ouverture "Raoul"; und das breite, ernste Motiv, was sich durch dieselbe hindurchzieht, kling mir immer wieder in den Ohren, ebenso die mir für eine Dame ganz neue Thatsache, dass Sie Ihr Werk selbst instrumentirt haben, so treffend und glücklich! Auch Musik Direktor Schulz sagte mir kürzlich, dass er ein ausser gewöhnliches, musikalisches Talent in Ihnen verehre. Ich wünsche Ihnen von ganzen Herzen den herrlichsten Zohn fur Ihre Künstlerischen Bestrebungen; den Beifall eines Verständigen Publikums. * * * Liebe Frau Stocker, noch einmal, ich werde Sie und Ihre Kunst nie vergessen. In Verehrung, WARNEMUNDE, September 10, 1901.

HIGHLY ESTEEMED MRS. STOCKER—The last day of our acquaintance will never be forgotten. I continue to admire your beautiful and interesting overture, "Raoul"; and the broad, serious motive which is interwoven in it still continually sounds in my ears, as does also the dainty, sweet dance strain which produces such a happy contrast.

Your composition has my entire admiration; also the fact that you have yourself orchestrated the work—so skillfully and effectively—to me something quite new for a lady.

I wish for you most heartily, the most splendid reward for your artistic efforts, the appreciation of an intelligent public. * * * Dear Mrs. Stocker, once more, I shall never forget you and your art. With esteem. Yours, JOHANNA SKOLLIN, (Pianist and Teacher of Music).

The following press notices will serve to show in what esteem Mrs. Stocker's compositions are held:

The benefit for the Willard Memorial Fund was well attended and quite a sum realized for that worthy purpose. * * * Then came the play proper, "Queen of Hearts," opening with a fairy scene, which was very pretty. * * * Mrs. Stocker, who directed the entertainment, is a woman of rare ability in this line.—The News, Chicago.

humor. Also in a musical way it must have fulfilled the keenest expectations of the large audience.—Volksfreund (translated).

That Mrs. Stocker is a skilled director of music may be inferred from the following testimonials:

It gives me great pleasure to repeat to you how I admired your work with your chorus. You seem to have the personal magnetism which is so necessary for a conductor, and you carry the people who work under your baton away with you. You and your chorus both deserve all the praise that can be bestowed upon you.

Yours cordially, HEINRICH MEYN,
New York.

I should be so glad to see you all again and to hear your charming and delightful Choral Society. It was all so refined and beautiful.

Very sincerely, DAVID FRANGCON DAVIES,
London, Eng.

You are doing a splendid work.—George L. Tyler.

The chorus work was simply delightful and evinced the thoroughness with which the drilling had been conducted by Mrs. Stocker.—Illinois Courier.

Mrs. Stocker has given her illustrated lectures throughout this country and in Europe. Numerous press notices of the most enthusiastic character have been reproduced in THE MUSICAL COURIER. Only three will be added here:

Nothing quite so charming and inspiring has been given in Springfield lately as was granted to the Woman's Club this afternoon in the lecture-recital with Mrs. Stella Prince Stocker.—Springfield News.

The distinctness of your lecture in the, to you, foreign language won the admiration of all who sat near us.—Mary Gläss, Bergedorf, Hamburg, Germany (translated).

Mrs. Stella Prince Stocker, from New York, gave to-day, before a very large audience, a highly interesting lecture on "Indian Myths and Melodies." She was able to hold the attention of her listeners extraordinarily by the novel information regarding the remote part of the world.—M. Wade, Warnemünde, Germany (translated).

These favorable notices might be multiplied ad infinitum, but those given above will show Mrs. Stocker's status in the musical world. She makes engagements and receives pupils at her studio, No. 17 West 103d street, New York.

GÉRARDY OPENS HIS TOUR.

IN Indianapolis last Wednesday evening Gérardy, the celebrated 'cellist, made his reappearance in this country in a 'cello recital before an audience that completely filled the hall. Reports say that it was the largest and most enthusiastic audience ever assembled in Indianapolis to listen to the playing of any instrumentalist outside of one of the great pianists. The following extracts are from the Indianapolis papers:

The 'cello recital given by Jean Gérardy last night at the Propylæum was remarkable. With a warm and sensuously beautiful tone he combines those intellectual qualities that are ordinarily in the possession only of older artists. Thus he appeals at once to the two great classes of music lovers, to those who revel in tonal beauty for its own sake, and to the educated musician whose perceptions are directed toward the actual analysis and interpretation of the composition played.

Technically, Mr. Gérardy at all times was master of himself and of his instrument. Once or twice he did some amazing things, as in the Bach-Gounod "Meditation," when he obtained a most peculiar effect by adapting the famous Joachim violin stroke to a technical problem otherwise almost unsurmountable. Then his down bow staccato was a marvel of accuracy, lightness and speed. But he is not merely a 'cellist; he is a musician. He is already great and he promises to become greater, his devotion to his art is so unmistakably high and sincere.

Out of a thoughtfully arranged program may be instanced especially the songful adagio in the Haydn Concerto, the Bach aria, his greatest triumph, and Schubert's "La Jeune Mère," at the end of which he demonstrated his command over the entire gamut of his instrument by an ornamental close in tones usually considered impossibly high for the 'cello, but which under his bow had a sweet, ethereal quality and plenty of character.—The Indianapolis News, October 10.

Mr. Gérardy is a young man, but he has been devoted to the 'cello since childhood, and he made known his thorough education before he had progressed far into the first composition that he played, Haydn's D major Concerto. He gave two movements of this, the adagio and the allegro moderato. He was free with his instrument, he accomplished the most difficult evolutions, and his tone was strong and pure, and for these things he had the admiration of his audience.

After playing a sonata by Boccherini he began a series of shorter and simpler pieces. At the close of a Bach aria and Popper's "Papillon" the audience was stirred to applaud for an encore, and Mr. Gérardy played Schumann's "Abendlied." It had in it the quality for which the audience seemed to be waiting. A group of three pieces, "The Swan," by Saint-Saëns; a Schubert cradle song and a difficult composition called "Am Springbrunnen," by Davidoff, played with some sprightliness and awakening spirit, brought a second request for an encore.

Now Mr. Gérardy and his 'cello took command of their friends in front of them. The piece was the familiar "Meditation," a Bach arrangement by Gounod. A new tone, quivering with life, came from the instrument. The voice pleaded and prayed. It swayed the hearer from its high notes to the depths of its sorrow. The player, it seemed, felt with the audience that he finally had come to his own, and instead of responding to the fervent applause by offering a different piece he played the prayer again. It was the high tide, and the music ended abruptly a few moments later, with a rollicking Popper Tarantelle.—The Indianapolis Journal, October 10.

Gérardy is to be the soloist at the Boston Symphony concert in Boston on the 18th and 19th, when he will play Lalo's D minor Concerto.

A NEW GRAND OPERA.

"Priscilla, the Maid of Plymouth," to Be Presented by the Rose Cecilia Shay Opera Company.

WHEN "Priscilla, the Maid of Plymouth," Fanciulli's grand opera, is produced for the first time on any stage, the night of November 1, in Norfolk, Va., there will be introduced to the American public a new prima donna of great beauty and exceptional talents—Miss Rose Cecilia Shay. This young lady is the star of the Rose Cecilia Shay Opera Company, which was organized nearly two months ago and which for weeks has been diligently rehearsing the new opera. At most of the rehearsals have been present Francesco Fanciulli, who composed the music of the opera; C. A. Eaton, who wrote the book; Colonel William Thompson, who negotiated for the purchase of the opera; and Colonel Shay, father of the prima donna.

"Priscilla, the Maid of Plymouth," is essentially a grand opera, being constructed on large lines, and devoid of the comedy element. It is founded upon Longfellow's poem, "The Courtship of Miles Standish," and illustrates one of the most interesting periods in American history. The opera is replete with songs and choruses of decided merit. Several of the arias, particularly those which are sung by Priscilla, whose voice is a mezzo-soprano, are really meritorious. These Miss Shay sings effectively. Her voice, which is of very superior quality, she keeps under perfect control. It has unusual carrying power and fills the largest halls. Miss Shay possesses rare histrionic talent, which, combined with her artistic singing, constitutes her a lyric artist of exceptional ability. Miss Shay is in love with her role and makes the most of it. Capable critics who have attended some of the rehearsals praise in unequivocal terms this prima donna's singing and acting, and predict for her a brilliant and sustained success. Her work is characterized by a finish which most opera singers take many years to acquire.

The star will be supported by a company of as capable singers as can be had, and no expense will stand in the way of as sumptuous a stage setting as can be arranged. The details of the production have been committed to the capable hands of McCollin, the veteran stage manager and opera singer. He and Fanciulli have had frequent conferences, and there have been much pruning and elaboration.

The staging of the production will be magnificent. In the second act of the opera will be used a set of furniture that was brought over in the Mayflower by one of Mr. Eaton's ancestors.

While Miss Shay's role is the most important one in the opera, there are several other striking characters. The duets, quartets and chorus are unusually good. The orchestration is florid, yet musicianly in a high degree.

The Rose Cecilia Shay Opera Company, after the initial presentation of "Priscilla" in Norfolk, Va., November 1, will go to Richmond for one night, and then proceed to Washington for a week's engagement. After playing one week at the national capital the company will start on a tour, which will include the leading cities, and it will play a week in Cincinnati. Efforts are making to bring the company to New York and Brooklyn.

The prima donna who is at the head of this company, and upon whom the success of the opera will in large measure depend, is the daughter of Colonel Shay, a prominent citizen of Cincinnati. Miss Shay enjoys a most enviable social position and is ardently admired by multitudes in the Queen City and elsewhere.

Concorde Concert Control (London) Bookings.

MME. ANNA STEINHAUER and Albert Mallinson will give an afternoon recital in Bechstein Hall, London, on Friday, November 22. The second part of the program will consist of compositions by Mr. Mallinson and will include his new song cycle, "My Garden."

The second Bedford (England) Festival has been fixed for Wednesday, October 30, and will be conducted by H. J. Tiltman, of Bedford. At the afternoon concert will be performed Elgar's "Caractacus" and a new work by Albert Mallinson, founded on Longfellow's "Tegners Drapa," for soprano solo chorus and orchestra. The solo part will be sung by Mme. Anna Steinhauer and the work will be conducted by the composer. At the evening concert Berlioz's "Faust" will be performed. Norman Concorde's orchestra has been engaged, and the singers engaged include Miss Ethel Wood, Miss Agnes Nicholls, John Coates, R. Radford and Ivor Foster.

Mme. Jütta Bell Ranske will give a vocal recital under the management of Norman Concorde in Bechstein Hall, London, on Tuesday evening, December 10, on which occasion Madame Ranske, who has so frequently lectured on the subject of voice production, will contribute the greater part of the program. The assisting artists will include her pupil, Miss May Warren, and her little daughter, Tullik Bell Ranske, will make her professional début.

The program will include traditional and folk-lore songs, vocal duets from Brahms and Dvorák, and songs from Wagner, Grieg, Delius and Emmanuel Moör. Fallas Shaw will be at the piano.

Zeldenrust.

THAT a man is judged by the company he keeps is as true of an artist as of anyone. That Eduard Zeldenrust appears in a joint recital in London with the violinist Joachim, or as the distinguished soloist with the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, but emphasizes and adds conviction to the impression made by advance reports; that in the visit of the eminent Dutch pianist America is to make the acquaintance this coming winter, through Manager Charlton, of another of the few real virtuosi of the world. At one of the renowned concerts at The Hague recently, in the presence of the Queen, Zeldenrust achieved a sensational success, and at his annual May concert in Paris he aroused a furore that resulted in ten recalls. Although a native of Amsterdam, Holland, Zeldenrust has lived for years in Paris. There, each spring, he gives one or more recitals. Last year hundreds of strangers were in the city for the Exposition, and had an opportunity of hearing Herr Zeldenrust for the first time. Here is what the Paris correspondent to the Neues Pester Journal had to say of the occasion:

The great Dutch pianist, Zeldenrust, charmed hundreds of the visitors to the Exposition and the leaders of Tout Paris at the Figaro's Five o'Clock. As in London, so in Paris, he has celebrated triumph after triumph with his art. The success of his concert here is almost unexampled. He plays Beethoven, Chopin, Mendelssohn and Liszt with equal mastery, and raises the audience to paroxysms of enthusiasm, which demanded encores that prolonged the concert for an hour. The Dutch are famous in the field of pianism, yet Zeldenrust will win the palm.

SAINT-SAËNS' REPLY.

THE following letter from the eminent French composer, Camille Saint-Saëns, to Fred. R. Comee, assistant manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be of interest to the musical world. An account of the interview between M. Saint-Saëns and Mr. Comee in Paris this summer was sent by the latter to THE MUSICAL COURIER, and finally reached Mr. Saint-Saëns, who replied as follows:

PARIS, October 1, 1901.

MY DEAR FRIEND AND CONFRERE.—It is with great pleasure that I have read the story of our interview in Paris, and that I see therein the proof of the friendship with which you have honored me. I hope that I shall have the pleasure of renewing our acquaintance, and that my compositions will continue to appear in the programs of your magnificent concerts, in which I so much regret that I cannot possibly take an active and personal part.

Allow me to give you herewith the assignment of parts for my new opera, "Les Barbares":

Floria.....Mlle. Hatto (soprano).
Livie.....Mme. Héglon (contralto).
Marcomir.....M. Vaguet (tenor).
Scaurus.....M. Delmas (bass).
Le Veilleur.....M. Rousselière (tenor).
Hildibrath.....M. Riddez (baritone).

The rehearsals are very well advanced, and the first performance will probably be before the end of the month.

Thanking you again, please accept my assurance of gratitude and friendship. Cordially yours,

C. SAINT-SAENS,
61 Faubourg St. Honoré.

LOUIS ELBEL'S CONCERT.—A promising young pianist, of South Bend, Ind., Louis Elbel, appeared in concert there recently, and presented a carefully prepared program of Chopin, Raff, Liszt and German works. Young Elbel is a pupil of Prof. Martin Krause, and has demonstrated his right to a place among the coming pianists. He is now on his way to Europe to continue his studies.

OSCAR SAENGER.—Oscar Saenger has returned from his summer vacation spent in touring the Great Lakes and Canada, and has resumed teaching at his studio, 51 East Sixty-fourth street, where he may be found every day from 9 until 6:30 o'clock.

IN TOWN.—Frank Van der Stucken arrived in town a few days ago.

The arrival is also announced of H. Whitney Tew, the English basso.

SAGINAW POLYHYMNIA.—The Saginaw Polyhymnia will present an interesting program at their first concert in December. Joseph Baernstein, basso, is engaged as soloist.

THE Tivoli work goes merrily on. Last week "Pagliacci" and "Cavalleria" alternated with "Carmen," the last week of the latter, which has had a great run, with Collamarini in the title role. This week Mr. Steindorff promises us "The Masked Ball," to alternate with "Nabucco," and in the near future "La Bohême." Apropos of the latter, Richard Lucchesi, who is to give a concert on Friday afternoon, tells me that twelve years ago he opened Steinway Hall, on Post street, with a Quintet in C major which he will present to open the program at this coming concert.

Herman Brandt was at that time on the same program. When "La Bohême" was presented in this city for the first time, what was Mr. Lucchesi's surprise to discover themes in the opera almost identical with the closing themes in his quintet. It is a matter of interest, as the composers, so Mr. Lucchesi declares, never met, and his quintet was composed years before "La Bohême" came out here. As the concert and the opera will occur within short space of each other, it will be interesting to compare the themes spoken of. Mr. Lucchesi is known to be a composer of no ordinary merit, and at the forthcoming concert will also be sung by Lia Poletini, the Tivoli contralto, an "Ave Maria" composed on a Bach prelude with organ and orchestral accompaniment. "Floradora" is in full swing at the Columbia, and seems to be making a hit.

Edward Xavier Rolker gives an "Hour of Song" on Tuesday next, admission to be strictly by invitation. It is the resuming of an established custom with Mr. Rolker and a delightful evening is anticipated.

Friday afternoon, at the California Conservatory of Music, Otto Bendix, the director, delivered an analytical discourse to a class of some thirty-five pupils on the Beethoven "Sonata Appassionata," and the Schumann "Papillons," using other composers also in comparison. Mr. Bendix is a delightful speaker, and as he is possessed of a deep and thoroughly grounded knowledge of musical theory and analysis, these lectures are intensely interesting. Mr. Bendix sits at the piano and illustrates the subject as he talks, giving an insight into musical form, counterpoint, etc., as occurring in well-known compositions, rarely obtained. This lecture was the first of a series to be delivered at the Conservatory. Friday evening was the inauguration of the choral class, under direction of Mr Weil, who is also the teacher of harmony at the Conservatory. As Mr. Weil was many years musical director of the "Bostonians," it goes without saying that the choral class will be a success and more than ordinarily desirable.

The first concert of the Minetti Quartet, which is composed of two violins, viola and 'cello, will be given next Sunday afternoon. These concerts were very popular last year.

Friday evening, the 4th inst., a Dickens reading was given at Sherman-Clay Hall by Miss Charlotte Mayer, who was assisted in her program by George Hoff, who gave two numbers on the violin. Miss Mayer gave a short talk on Dickens, after which she proceeded to a representation of familiar characters in well-known scenes, touching on "The Old Curiosity Shop" "Pickwick Papers," &c. Her best work was the "Child of Promise" case from the "Pickwick Papers." Miss Salthoff, who is a late importation, I believe, and who is teaching in the Von Meyerinck School of Music, has been heralded as something extraordinary. I found her a player of excellent technic, but with an indifferent ear and absolutely no magnetism. A violinist above all things must be magnetic, for it is an instrument that responds to temperament as keenly as a barometer to the change of weather. Nevertheless, the audience was pleased and encored heartily both his numbers, and he very kindly responded. The first number was an Andante from a Mendelssohn Concerto, and the second two Brahms-Joachim Hungarian Dances. Fred Maurer, in his impetuous style, accompanied both numbers. There was a large attendance and the hall was very prettily decorated.

To-day is a big day in the Episcopal pulpits, as the Episcopal Convention, now in session here, has brought to our city many eminent divines, who will occupy the pulpits of our resident clergymen.

To-morrow night is the graduating recital of Miss Helen Heath, and as the young lady is not only very talented, but has many friends, a large crowd is expected. Her program will embrace songs from old French and Italian as well as modern writers.

Mrs. A. Wedmore Jones.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

PATRONS of the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city during the coming season will be very much interested in the following list of novelties selected by Mr. Gericke during the past summer for performance at the Boston concerts. There will not, of course, be the opportunity to perform all of these new works in that city, but as many will have a place on the programs as is consistent with the number of concerts given.

Symphony No. 5, in B flat major	Bruckner
Symphony for Orchestra and Piano	D'Indy
Symphony in D minor	Rabel
Symphony No. 1, in C	Taneiew
Suite in F, No. 6	Bach
Suite, Raymonde	Glazounow

American School of Opera.

THE American School of Opera has inaugurated a chorus class, the purpose of which is to keep always on hand a number of good voices, thoroughly trained in the music and the stage business of the choruses of the standard operas. There are at present over thirty members in this class, and they are working on the choruses of the bill for the school's first public performance. This comprises the operetta, "The Marriage of Jeannette," a scene from "Aida," and the whole of "Cavalleria Rusticana." These performances will be given in one of the Broadway theatres, and we understand that the date for the first is set for some time in the latter part of this month.

Dudley Buck's Vacation.

DUDLEY BUCK, Sr., the esteemed organist, composer and conductor, is taking a two months' vacation. The eyesight of this venerable musician has been troubling him, but his physicians state that a complete rest for sixty days will restore him to health and again permit him to resume his duties at Holy Trinity Church, Brooklyn, and with the Brooklyn Apollo Club, of which he has been conductor for many years. The rehearsals of the club, in Dr. Buck's absence, will be directed by J. H. Brewer, the club accompanist.

WILLIAM C. CARL HOME.

WILLIAM C. CARL, the well-known organist, is back in New York after a well earned vacation and a sensational success at the Pan-American Exposition, where he gave three recitals. A criticism of his playing and reception there will be found in the Buffalo letter in this issue. Right after his recitals Mr. Carl was engaged to inaugurate the large new organ in the Church of St. Vincent de Paul, in Chicago, on November 5.

Mr. Carl looks well, and is full of energy for his many engagements this season and the direction of the very successful Guilmant Organ School, which reopens this week. The following from the New York Press of October 14 is interesting:

CARL BACK FROM BUFFALO.

Organist Will Be Heard Soon in a Chicago Church.

William C. Carl has returned from Buffalo, where he gave three recitals in the Temple of Music last week, playing to audiences of more than 3,000 persons at each concert, the crowds being enthusiastic in their praise of this talented organist.

Mr. Carl has been engaged to play on a large new organ in the Church of St. Vincent de Paul in Chicago on November 5.

The Bethlehem (Pa.) Times of October 8 had this to say after Mr. Carl's organ recital in that place:

"The concert last evening in Grace Lutheran Church was a musical event of the highest order. Those who were fortunate enough to be in attendance are congratulating themselves on the superb program which was given and which inaugurated the season in the Bethlehems. Many of the choicest productions of the foremost composers were interpreted with such skill and brilliancy as to evoke the most enthusiastic admiration. Bach, Rubinstein, Widor, Händel, Mendelssohn, Dvorák, Schubert, Guilmant and others of the immortal peers were represented in a truly classic arrangement.

"William C. Carl, the talented and eminent organist, is the director of the Guilmant Organ School and the organist and choirmaster of the 'Old First' Church, New York. He kindly acceded to the request to insert one of his own compositions on the program, and the favor was manifestly appreciated. One of the most difficult selections was the etude for the pedals alone, a new composition by Eugene de Bricqueville. The concluding organ number was a masterly interpretation of Dubois' 'March Heroique de Jeanne d'Arc,' portraying several leading incidents in the romantic career of that famous character.

"Nothing but superlative praise can be said of Mr. Carl's ability and mastery both in the art of interpreting and in that of composing. He ranks deservedly among the foremost musical artists of this country. His pedaling was marvelous. He treats the pedals as familiarly as he does the keyboard and makes them responsive to the sentiment of the music. It is certainly a delightful experience to listen to him.

"There was an exceptionally large gathering of organists, musicians and music-loving people from neighboring cities and towns. Harry S. Schweitzer, organist and choirmaster of Grace Church, under whose auspices his esteemed tutor, Mr. Carl, came to Bethlehem, was heartily congratulated for arranging such a musical treat."

ARTHUR HOCHMAN'S DEBUT.

ARTHUR HOCHMAN, a young pianist who was known here years ago as a prodigy, has returned after studies in Germany, and will make his début with Emil Paur and the Paur Symphony Orchestra in Pittsburg on October 19.

In Berlin young Hochman studied with D'Albert and Jedliczka. At his first appearance Saturday he will play with the orchestra the Liszt Concerto in E flat.

EUROPEAN NOTES.

Alfred Bruneau is busy on a new opera, "L'Enfant Roi," which will be produced this season.

Weis' two act opera, "The Polish Jew," has been as successful at Leipsic as it was in Prague and Dresden, chiefly owing to the libretto and the representation.

The immortal "Bells of Corneville" is to be given at the Royal Theatre, Dresden, with Scheidemantel as Gaspard and Frau Wedekind as Germaine.

The rebuilt city theatre at Aix-la-Chapelle was opened September 16 with a performance of Beethoven's "Weihe des Hanses" and a performance of "Tannhäuser."

The Royal Theatre of Copenhagen opened last month with a new mounting of the most popular Danish opera, "King and Marshal" ("Drot og Marsk"), by Heise. The essentially Danish theme, the action laid in Denmark, has prevented it from being produced abroad, as it deserves to be.

Sarasate and Berthe Marx Goldschmidt announce a concert tour through Holland in November, Italy in December, Germany in January, and Russia and Austria in February and March.

Bruno Walter, capellmeister of the Royal Opera, Berlin, has, after less than a year's service, been engaged for the Court Opera, Vienna. Vienna has now five capellmeisters; Berlin only two.

The citizens of a little Silesian town have had the pleasure of seeing a new revised "Carmen." The play bill calls it "Carmen, the Beautiful Gypsy; Romantic Drama in four acts by Meilhac and Halevy; Music by Bizet and Raida," and informs the public that "Carmen" given as a play with the operatic music is much more interesting than the opera itself. Who is Raida, the collaborator with Bizet?

The Abbé Perosi has enriched musical phraseology with a new work. His newest work, "Moses," is described as "a symphonic song-poem." It consists of three acts, with a prologue, and will be given next month at Milan.

A Gregorian academy will be opened at Freiburg, in Switzerland, by Prof. Peter Wagner, in which everything relating to plain song will be taught. The academy opens in November.

NEVADA CONCERT TOUR.

EMMA NEVADA and her concert company are now assured of a successful season in America. Nevada's name alone is sufficient to assure music lovers of an attraction which will not be overlooked by concert goers all over the country, and supporting her are three European artists, who came here with the indorsement of many foreign critics of repute. Pablo Casals, the 'cellist, has been heard from in the European journals, and so have Moreau, the pianist-composer, and Magnarre, the flutist. These will be the principals on Nevada's programs, and other artists of ability will be announced later.

The dates of the first appearance of the company will be found in the London Notes in this issue. The company is under the management of Edward A. Stevens and Albert Sutherland.

MRS. RATCLIFFE CAPERTON.—Mrs. Ratcliffe Caperton, the representative and assistant of Lamperti, has returned from Europe, and will resume her lessons in vocal music at Ogontz School and 408 South Eighteenth street, Philadelphia.

HANDEL AND HAYDN.—The first concert of the Handel and Haydn Society, Boston, will take place on November 10, when the Verdi Requiem will be sung. The soloists will be Kileski-Bradbury, Evan Williams and Joseph Baernstein.

MOZART IN MUNICH AND SALZBURG.

BY JAMES HUNEKER.

Copyrighted by The Musical Courier Company, 1901.

O leave Munich without enjoying one of its model Mozart performances would have been foolish. But then Herr von Possart had decided that no rival attraction must exist during the month of September, a month wholly given over to Wagner. I was in despair until an angel in disguise, some titled personage from Anhalt-Dessau, visited the city, and in his honor Mozart's comic opera—a divinely comic opera—"Cosi Fan Tutte" was revived on the boards of the Residenz-Theater. As soon as the welcome news reached me I went into strict training for the event—a novel one for me. With Salzburg only a few hours from Munich the task was an easy one. Determined that I would saturate myself in a Mozartian Ur-quell I left Munich Sunday afternoon, the 15th of September, reaching one of the most picturesque cities in Austria, in Europe, at dusk. It was Alexander von Humboldt who wrote that Salzburg, Naples and Constantinople are the three beautiful spots of the earth. With its stony, mountainous spine dividing the city, and the swift Salzach, this city of misty morning had an almost supernatural appearance. It rained intermittently during the twenty-four hours I was there, yet the place hallowed by memories of Mozart yielded no whit of its fascinations. I supposed that after Nuremberg the gamut of my enthusiasm had been traversed; but Salzburg was to be seen. And once seen, worshipped. Edmund Clarence Stedman speaks of its Italian beauty in its flat roofed houses, fountains and marble façades, and environs of far famed picturesqueness." Even in 1446 Pope Pius II.—Æneas Sylvius Piccolomini by name—wrote: "Nichts vermisst man in Salzburg, was das ansehen der glänzenden städte erhebt, man mag die öffentlichen Gebäude betrachten oder die Wohnungen der Einzeln Bürger." All of which proves that this Austrian city has been admired by some very distinguished personages.

If I had reached Salzburg in the morning I might have heard the little prodigy Raoul Kocalzsky, who gave a piano recital—for Sunday is not a wasted, dreary day as in England and America. It is usually given over to music making and innocent enjoyment after church hours. And that is the reason there is so little drunkenness on the Continent. Wherever the Puritan sabbath prevails there is the land of the drunkards. Missing the youthful pianist, I had to content myself with a foolish smoking concert at the Kurhaus, in which I was yodel-ed to death by a family of stout females and zither-playing lads. The sound slumber of the unjust rewarded my day's travail. Next morning I was in the Cathedral before 8, enjoying its Renaissance architecture—it was built by Solari 1614-1634—and seeing all that could be seen in nasty, wet weather. On the Mozartplatz stands the bronze statue of Mozart, modeled by Schwanthaler in 1842, excellent in workmanship. The Mirabellgarten and the Schloss Mirabell did not look very inviting in the rain, so after listening to the Glockenspiel, with its thirty-seven bells, at 11 o'clock I went to the top of the precipitous Kapuzinerberg, where stands the little summer house in which Mozart finished "The Magic Flute" in 1791, but near Vienna. This little cottage was given to the Mozarteum by Prince Camillo Starhemberg June 1, 1877. It is called the "Cradle of the Magic Flute"; you reach it by the ascension railway in about five minutes—a steep ride. In the cottage one may see the metal memorial table of the first international music festival in Salzburg. The inscription and the lyre, with the gold rayed pencils, is a donation of the Court Theatre in Vienna. There are also a number of garlands, laurel, ribbons, silk, embroidered with various dedications from Germany and Austria. The bust of Mozart in front of the cottage, by Hellmer of Vienna, was modeled after the most authentic portraits and cast in 1881. It is a gift of the Baron Schwarz family. The only portrait of Mozart, drawn by Doris Stock in 1787 at Dresden, is here. This was presented by Count Wittgenstein, of Salzburg. A painting, "Mozart at His Spinet," by Romako, of Rome, is of interest. The top step of the cottage is original. The furniture, a table and two easy chairs are close imitations of the originals. This cottage—which stood originally in a suburb of Vienna—was of itself worth the journey from Munich—better things followed.

The house in which Mozart resided is on the Mozartplatz and is so marked. A newspaper office partially occupies the floor; but in Mozart's birth house, No. 9 Getreidegasse, third floor, is the Mozart Museum, with all its treasures for the Mozart lover. After passing through a court you go up the very steps, worn and shiny, trod by the feet of the great composer. Above the entrance is the inscription, "W. A. Mozart's Birth Room," and a ring at the bell soon brings the keeper. Inside, above the door, is a quotation from Horace (Carm. II., 18.)

> In my house there sparkle
> Neither ivory nor gilt ceilings;
> But there is honesty and a vein of kindly spirit,
> And though I be poor, yet the rich come to see me.

How many millionaires would give up their holdings for a genius like Mozart's? Not many. The poor wealthy ones of this earth are mostly stricken with Fafner-like content: "Ich lieg und besitz" is their sleepy motto. A profusion of family pictures, busts, autographs of compositions, documents, old instruments, Mozartiana, even court-plaister brought from England by Mozart, are in this unique chamber. Here is the room, low ceilings and constricted in size, where Mozart was born. The spot where stood his cradle is shown by the apathetic guide. On the walls hang pictures of Mozart's mother and father; the Mozart family, well known for its depiction of the gifted brother and sister at the piano—the father in the background; Mary Anne Mozart at the age of eleven; Mozart's apotheosis; Mozart at his Virginals, a bust and his glorification. Mozart's sons in their infancy and adolescence are shown; also portraits of Mozart's cousin, Mary Anne Mozart. There are lithographs, engravings, photographs, oval portraits, a poem by Grillparzer; Mozart at the piano—a half length; aquarelle on ivory of Constance Mozart; Leopold Mozart, with both his children, in Paris; Constance Weber, Mozart's wife—rather shrewish looking; young Mozart at his clavichord; diplomas; an unfinished sonata à 2 Cembale two-four tact in B flat major. It is only fifteen measures long and it clearly reveals the neat, finished caligraphy of the composer. The playbill of the first performance of "The Magic Flute" at the Wieden Theatre, in Vienna, Friday, September 30, 1791, is on the wall. I secured a facsimile. Of course you have seen it reproduced. The curious thing about it is the fact that it reads: "'Die Zauberflöte,' ein Grosse oper in 2 ackten, von Emanuel Schickaneder," while Mozart's name follows after the cast in a sort of foot-note: "Die Musik ist von Herrn Wolfgang Amade Mozart, Kapellmeister." The music!—remark the patronizing tone—is by Mozart. Isn't that magnificent? Out of friendship for the author this little Mozart, elbowed out of existence by a troop of nobodies, conducted his own music! Who is Schickaneder? Why the very name is a joke—like his silly book. Time does not always square up accounts, as the poets sing; but when it does—we have a Mozart.

There is also a playbill of "Tito," and a photograph of the familiar Tischbein portrait, which looks not unlike an oil painting picked up in Paris last year by Henry Edward Krehbiel, of New York. Mozart's sister-in-law, Aloisa Weber-Lange, the singer, is represented by an oil painting, Mozart at the court of Empress Maria Theresa, 1762; his funeral monument; his concert piano and spinet—I had the temerity to press the sacred keys and hear with emotion the feeble, jangling music; Oh! Steinert, where wert thou?—medallion of Mozart in wax—very odd—the small clavichord of five octaves, at which "The Magic Flute," "Tito," the "Requiem" and the "Freemason" cantata were composed; and his grand, or so-called traveling piano, donated by Charles Mozart in 1856. This completes the birth room.

In the sitting room of the Mozart family are jewels, autographs, sketches of unfinished compositions; 160 original letters of W. A. Mozart and eighty of the family; three copies of the first printed compositions of Mozart; the celebrated Mozart Album, with its poems, compositions, dedications and portraits of sovereigns, authors, composers and musicians—you read all about this album in a recent issue of THE MUSICAL COURIER—and many interesting pictures, reproductions of the Vienna house wherein Mozart died, and drawings. In the showcase are exhibited family manuscripts, letters and musical fragments. There is a part of a grand mass in E, the Kyrie; an Antiphon, composed when Mozart was fifteen; an allegro for violin, viola and 'cello, with orchestral accompaniment; a song; another Kyrie in C; forty-one bound sheets of his practice in counterpoint; first sentence of the so-called French Symphony in D; sonatas for piano; Mozart's first printed compositions; a stitched book called "Pour le Clavecin," and belonging to Mozart's sister; an Andante in F, composed for a musical clock in May, 1791; original letters; an album containing poems, paintings and drawings—rich in autographs; portrait of the boy Mozart; silver medals, tobacco and snuff boxes, rings, crosses, watch, pearl buttons, prayer book, music paper with his canon "O du eselhafter Peierl!"; entrance ticket for a Mozart concert, cards, the court-plaister aforesaid; the famous watch given Mozart by the Empress Maria Theresa; his first violin and bow; an etching of the Munkaczy picture, "The Dying Mozart"; playbills, remembrance leaf, stranger books and a whole litter of objects over which months could be passed pleasurably. As a souvenir, among other things, I have retained the three receipts which I received after paying one mark admission. They are respectively labeled "Mozart-Museum, Nos. 751, 752, 753," with the year 1900. I suppose the 1901 will be used next year—but it's all the same up here in glorious old Salzburg.

The palace, the Government buildings, the Benedictine abbey, in the cellar of which Haydn drank wine; the fortress of Hohensalzburg, the Mönchsberg and the monastery Kapuzinerberg were all visited. I viewed, but without much emotion, the house of Paracelsus near the river, possibly because I still retain a lively recollection of reading Robert Browning's poem of that name—Paracelsus Bombastus ab Hohenheim! He died here only the other day—for Salzburg—in 1541.

Beguiled by a man with a team of what had once been horses, I went far into the country, believing that the rain—"O the brave, upright rain!"—would cease. But it did not. We reached the Schloss at Hellbrun in the middle of puddling torrents, soaked yet not downcast. Was there not the famous waterworks? My coachman had promised impossible things for 50 Kronen, so I put the money in a slot machine, secured a ticket and waited patiently for the appearance of the Fountain-Master, a very solemn and important dignitary, who calmly finished his meal and then slowly pranced about, explaining the various fountains. I received a cold douche, indeed. I saw a collection of the most absurd, comical, inartistic, withal interesting, water toys that could be conceived outside the pages of a child's fairy book. Fancy the taste of the last century! Here is Orpheus in miniature mechanically flaying Marsyas; you enter a stony grotto, instantly birds sing and fountains bar your exit—what pranks upon guests the kings must have played in those days! And then the mechanical theatre, with its 154 figures, its resounding organ playing a Lutheran chorale! The ingenuity that found time and patience to construct these little rock and metal peep-shows must have been amazing. At various stages the keeper turned on sprays of 500 jets or set twirling some rustic mill. The whole garden is covered with these silly little groups—a curious commentary on the mental makeup of royalty.

As I always try to see the picture exhibitions in every town I visit I stopped at the solidly built Künstlerhaus on the return from Hellbrun and viewed the XVII. Jahres-Austellung. But beyond the work of Cederstrom, Egger-Linz, Hengeler, Johann Herterich—of Munich—Wilhelm Kuhnert's large and sensational canvas, "Elephants Fleeing from a Steppe-fire"; Karl Marr's Madonna, Franz Ondrusek, Emil Thoma and the gouaches and aquarelles of Herterich and Fernand Knopff, I did not find much of interest. The Salzburg painters were naturally enough well represented and there were studio exhibitions under the same roof by Theodor Josef Ethofer, R. von Wittek, Michael Ruppe and others. I left Salzburg with genuine regret and hope never to forget my last glimpse of it from the car window. The sun was burning away huge hummocks of cloud and a single dazzling shaft smote the top of the fortress on Hohensalzburg. Miracles of color, that were almost tone, made a background for this striking picture; and the soft air steaming with mist almost veiled the great peaks of the Tyrolean Alps. Is it any wonder landscape painters are happy in this strange and delectable region?

I was bankrupt of emotion when I reached Munich on the following Tuesday and only the thought of Mozart's music to be heard that evening kept me from returning to the city of Mozart. Here is a reproduction of the program:

I have often wondered why Nietzsche in h search for a rival or superior to Wagner did not g back to Mozart. The unfortunate philosopher w so desperately beset by the desire to break his cl pet toy, Wagner, that he set up in his doll's hou another, newer toy by the name of Bizet. But w Bizet, a lovely combination of Wagner, Gounc finger tips all the knowledge of the musical wor at once a melodist, a dramatist, can still be hea after Wagner, heard and enjoyed.

The revival at this theatre of "Cosi Fan Tut was on June 25, 1897, with Ternina—a great fav ite in Munich—Gura, Walter Bertram and othe Richard Strauss conducted. It was one of an el orate series of Mozart revivals, the like of whi has never been seen in the musical world. Te enna. You can conceive of no better setting f this charming, cheerful composition than the Re denztheater, a jeweled rococo bandbox of a th

tre. The very circling cupids and flowers cluste about the proscenium speak of Mozart—the plot o whose opera has an artificial tinge that well cords with the place. But the music is brimful o merriment, brave, joyous music! Here is the t nectar of comedy, the comedy of sighs, tears, sm s and flitting intrigues; the pert play of powder and patches. Its story, an old one, would have delighted Dick Steele, and even made the proper Addison nod prim approval. Redolent of the eighteenth century, Mozart matched Da Ponte's story with his sparkling music. There are arias for all concerned, though the cream of the tunes is given to Fiordiligi—a part sung by Mozart's sister-in-law, Aloisa Weber, a lady who could ill brook any rival on the stage. You can almost see where she said, "Dear brother, just cut down Dorabella's part a bit; I need more room for myself." So she gets all the tragic music—you hear at times "Don Giovanni" and Leporello with his "In Spanien" aria—and the centre of the stage besides. The piece went with miraculous smoothness, though several flower pots were knocked over, much to the agony of Intendant Von Possart, who on this august occasion handled the stage. The concerted music most interested me, particularly a card playing duo that was absolutely enchanting. Ah, the magician Mozart! They all went to him, from Beethoven to Gounod and Offenbach. He set the pace for the latter, and without him there might have been no "Faust."

The Mozart Summer House on Kapuzinerberg, Salzburg.

Miss Breuer, who, like Maggie Cline, sings by main strength, was an athletic Fiordiligi. Miss Fremstad delighted me again with her versatility. It was easy to see that she had been trained in Mozart before Wagner, and she looked lovely. Walter was excellent, while my admiration for Herr Fuchs grew apace, for I had seen him as the Herald in "Lohengrin," Kothner in "Meistersinger," and now as a sparkish young officer, not to mention his artistic achievements as a stage manager at the Prinzregent's Opera House. After the first act there was a pause of fifteen minutes, for the celebrated revolving stage of Lautenschläger was put into operation. It was remarkable, scene following scene without a break. Whether it would be as satisfying in "Don Giovanni" I do not know—that work demands more stage space than the sectional stage can give. You can get a good idea of the way the opera was scenically worked in the sketch after Lautenschläger's design.

The orchestra of thirty was capitally conducted by Röhr, and one really enjoyed the exquisite bits of humor, the flashes of drollery in fagotte and oboe, the fine, large perspective of the score. This is music for accompaniment as well as instrumental commentary upon the various dramatic situations. I must not forget to record the artistic acting of Bosetti, a Despina full of pretty malice and with a way all her own; nor the grave, courtly humor of Herr Bauberger's Don Alfonso. And what a jolly supper party that is in the last scene! Music to lift the heavy vapors of Wagner, to make one think life is a thing worth enduring. I wonder greatly that Nietzsche could have forgotten Mozart.

I attended another performance of "Lohengrin," so as to hear Fremstad's Ortrud. It proved to be a most artistic, dignified and dramatic performance. Her singing of the "dark" duo, with Bauberger as Telramund, was strong, and her acting of a superior order. She looked regally handsome. Knote's Lohengrin I liked better than his Tannhäuser. Nordica was again the Elsa. I went once to the Hofbrauhaus, but found that much vaunted establishment a trifle too noisy and crowded. There beer is elevated to the dignity of a religious function.

For fear that I might miss a good picture I dropped in for a few minutes to the exhibition of the Phalanx, a secession of young artists from the Secession. The things I enjoyed most were remarkable tempera studies by Alexander Salzmann, of Munich, sketches chiefly of Russian life as vivid and poignant as some of Gorki's stories. The look of the lean, wretched Jew trembling under the suspicious eye of a brutal, stolid Russian official gave one pause. It is entitled "Auch Einer." A bust by Waldemar Hecker, "Zarathustra," is worthy of more detailed mention. At the Schack Gallery I saw a lot of early Arnold Böcklins of most unsatisfying color, though rich in invention. For example, his "Villa am Meer" is highly poetic, as is the canvas called "Neriad and Triton"; but in neither has this great artist attained his marvelous translucency in the tone of his waves—as, for instance, in the "Water Sport" at the New Pinakothek—nor the rich, sombre hues of his "Death Island." To my delight I found the gruesome "Wilde Felsengegend," with its Siegfried dragon in pursuit of fleeing travelers; and, to my surprise, the picture was labeled with a motto from Goethe:

> Kennst du den Berg und seinen Wolkensteg?
> Das Maulthier sucht in Nebel seinen Weg;
> In Höhlen wohnt der Drachen alte Brut.

And what a Fafner he is! But the coloring is chilly and the reproductions not half bad on that account. This collection of Count Schack contains a wilderness of bad pictures, crude in tint and symbolism. Anselm Feurbach—whose portrait of himself in the New Pinakothek is his most pleasing achievement; it looks like a dark Paderewski—is here and so are the works of the fantastic Moriz von Schwind. Of interest to the musical is an "Erl König," painted by Schnorr von Karolsfeld the elder. There are many copies by old masters, the best by Von Lenbach, especially of a head of Rembrandt. His own portrait—à la Rembrandt—quite fascinated me. But pictures must be dropped or else my pained eyeballs will protest. As the time drew near for my departure from Munich I prowled about the town. Best of all was a visit on a certain Saturday afternoon to the house of Franz Stuck, a privilege granted to few. There I found the sculptor Stuck in brilliant display—for he models as well as he paints. The death mask of Beethoven is the best portrait of the composer I have ever seen. It is in marble. The first painting of "Sin" is also there, and to the glories of the music room, with its dancing allegorical figures modeled in high relief, the panelling, the walls, I can never do justice. The entire mansion is a classic dream transposed from old Greece. Nearly all the decorations are by Stuck himself; one catches furtive glimpses in every corner of the violent, overwhelming nature of the man—a belated pagan who has strayed into the twentieth century and finds all modern life strange. There are portraits of Stuck and Mrs. Stuck by Von Lenbach; tapestries that make water the mouth; and in the dining room walls lined with Japanese tiles rare and curious of workmanship. I admire, with reservations, Stuck's portraiture. I think he is happier when no model chains his fancy, his brutal, fantastic, erotic, erratic imagination. He is young yet, handsome as a god. There is a big reserve fund of vital invention in this Bavarian Highlander with the crisp curls and olive complexion of a Greek athlete from some far away Ionian isle. Perhaps the mellowing influence of time, perhaps a little sorrow, will bring to a burgeoning his wonderful gifts.

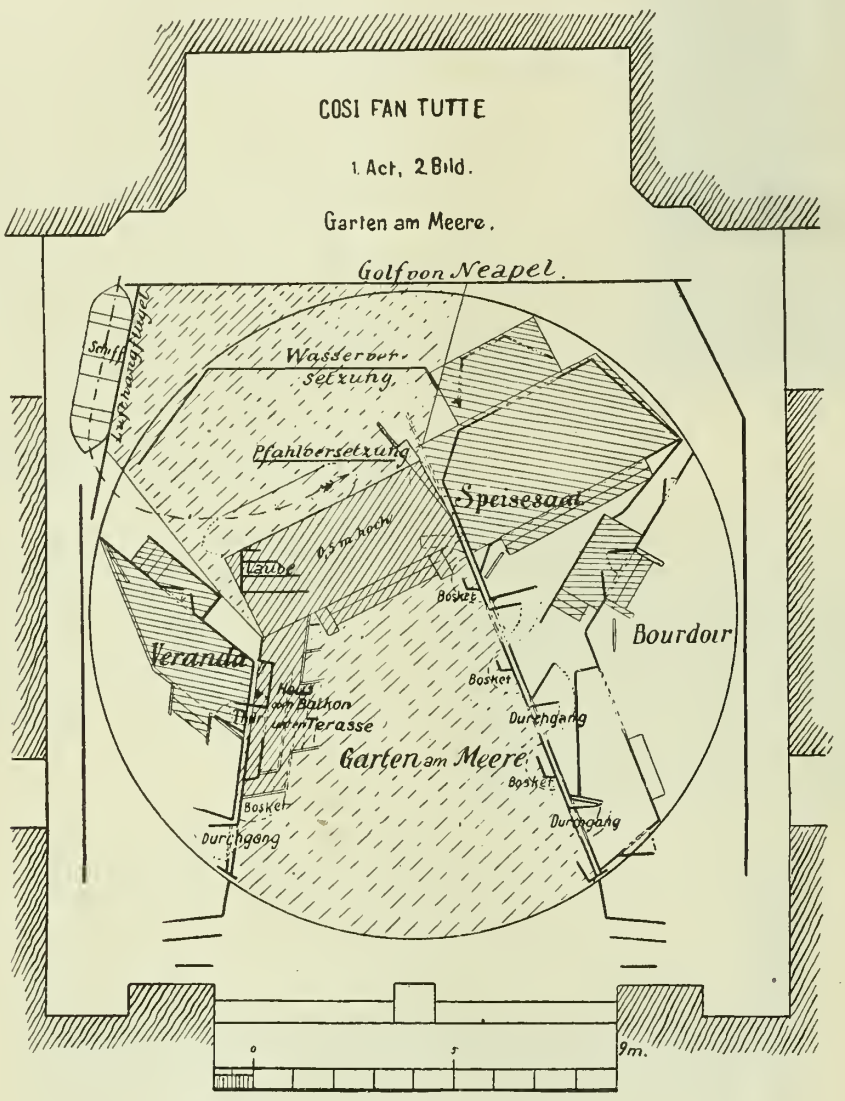
His "Daughters of Satan" is a panel in high relief, full of all the devilish seduction and baleful allure of the dance. Its grotesquerie excited the Russian composer Rébikoff into the production of a piece named after the design. I have told you about it and its hellish tonality.

The name of Anton Seidl stares one in the face all over Munich. Alas! it is the name of the principal cake baker of the town. Statues of Orlando di Lasso, Gluck and Schiller adorn the place. I saw the prayer books of Dürer at the Public Library, also the Codex Aureus, Alaric's breviary, and I longed to finger the oldest of all Nibelungenlied MSS., but was not allowed. Up in Nuremberg I was given more liberty with the old Meistersinger's manuscripts. At least I held them in my hand.

My last night in Munich was an Italian one. I went to the theatre on the Gartnerplatz and saw the great Italian character actor, Ermete Novelli, in Marco Praga's realistic and morbid play, "Alleluja." Novelli is an artist of rare distinction, above all a human actor. He attracts because of his strong emotional power, coupled with true Italian humor. I never witnessed such a swift technic—if I may use the expression; the emotional transitions are terrifying in their variety and speed. He played the part of a father—once called Alleluja because of his lusty, gay temperament—whose wife deceives him, whose daughter follows in the footsteps of her mother. The story is unpleasant, the situations are powerful; Praga is a "modern" who has imbibed his theories of heredity from Ibsen. Novelli made a strong impression on the audience, and his company from the Goldoni Theatre, Rome, did not belie its reputation. But after all the abiding recollection of the evening is Novelli, a many sided artist.

Auf Wiedersehen Munich! Like the father of Louise in Charpentier's opera I cry aloud, not vengefully but regretfully, "Munich!"



Lautenschläger'sche Drehbühne.

Jan Kubelik.

THE "Kubelik fever," as an English writer called the great enthusiasm over the young violinist during the last London season, seems to prevail also in Prague and Budapest, where he is giving a series of farewell concerts on his Continental tour before going to London, preparatory to his American tour. The students and music lovers went through the energetic demonstrations occasionally seen in those cities when artists arouse their audiences to such a pitch that the ordinary demonstrations seem too tame, and the idol of the day is drawn through the streets by them in his carriage, and serenaded at his hotel. These and other like scenes are reported to have taken place last week at the Kubelik concerts in the cities mentioned.

The story of his reception and decoration recently by the Pope has also caused comment in European papers, and American concert goers are already commencing to take great interest in his coming tour. For his American début concerts will be given Monday evening, December 2, at Carnegie Hall, assisted by Mr. Paur and his orchestra, and Miss Jessie Shay; also on Saturday afternoon, December 7, at the same place (his first recital). An orchestral concert will also be given at Symphony Hall, Boston, December 4, and a concert at Philadelphia, December 6. The entire month of December will be spent in the East, and early in January a few Western cities will be visited.

A Successful Pupil of E. Presson Miller.—Miss Laura Edwards, a pupil of E. Presson Miller, is now in Texas, and delighting the people of her native State with her fine singing. Her voice, a rich contralto of wide range, has been carefully trained, and her skillful use of it enables her to give full scope to her exceptional musical temperament. Miss Edwards expects to return to New York about November 1, after giving several more concerts. The following is from the Daily Statesman, Austin, Tex., October 4.

The benefit concert given by Mr. and Mrs. Bell last night was an artistic, social and financial success. Miss Laura Edwards, of New York, sang a duet with Miss Jackson, and also the contralto recitative and aria, "My Heart Is Weary," from Thomas' "Nadeschda." Mrs. Edwards is an artist and without doubt the most accomplished vocalist heard in Austin in several years. She is gifted with a superb voice.

Miss Mayme Jackson is also a Miller pupil and possesses a fine mezzo soprano voice.

Adeline Birdsall Strong.—This lady was for a number of years the representative of the Cappiani method on the Pacific Coast, active in San Francisco and at Oakland Seminary. She comes occasionally to her old teacher, and was heard the other day in some songs, which showed to good advantage her superior interpretation and grand voice. She has now a fine studio in Boston, and an elegant home studio in Newtonville, Mass. Her vocal recital for the Wednesday Club, of Harrisburg, was an event, and she had entire charge as director of the vesper service at the Central Congregational Church, at Newtonville, when an unusually elaborate service was given, with the "Staba Mater," violin, 'cello and organ assisting. The little operation on Madame Cappiani's right foot has healed, so the madame is again active.

MUSICIANS AS ADVERTISERS.

MANY of our teachers who have returned to town are now busy devising advertising plans to attract those who can help them in making this coming season a successful one. The musician is, of all classes of people, one of the least likely to possess a knowledge of the "technic of advertising," as it might properly be called; and some of the advertising plans of many of our Washington players and singers could be improved upon, as could also the reading of their newspaper advertisements.

The subject of advertising is such a large one, and it requires so much thought and perseverance to gain a mastery of it, that thousands of people are devoting their lives to its study and the subject is being rapidly reduced to a science. It has been developed by those who have been working at the business that the ordinary individual is not capable of doing his own advertising any more than he is of being his own doctor, lawyer or tailor. Just fancy how the men would look if they did their own tailoring! Now, the advertisement of a musician who writes his own advertisement looks just as baggy and skewy to the eye of the professional advertising man as would the garments of the gentleman who attempted to cut out and stitch his own clothes.

Everything which brings the name of a musician before the public is an advertisement. If it is an advance notice or a criticism, either favorable or adverse, is is really an advertisement for that musician.. This fact is recognized by many of the most important newspapers in New York and other cities, and it is consequently very difficult to obtain any space in their columns.

This fact is so well known that it has long been the custom for certain advance agents of theatrical people and musical people to invent "stories" involving the names of their clients. Thus if Miss Mary Smith is to appear in Washington, her advance agent might have her save someone from drowning; or stop a pair of runaway horses while wheeling. Another stock idea is to have her robbed of her jewels at her hotel. The enterprising press agent who can convince the managing editor to publish articles describing these events is a jewel himself.

The mistake made by many musicians in their advertising plans is, I believe, that they are not up to date. They use the old-fashioned ways of advertising to a large extent and are afraid to adopt the new ways which they might learn from the large mercantile houses of to-day.

One of the chief principles of advertising is that the advertisement must be made to tell something. Suppose for instance, that a newcomer in Washington desires piano lessons. He turns to the advertisement page of the daily newspaper. He sees there a number of such advertisements as the following:

> PROFESSOR POUNDHARDT,
> TEACHER OF PIANO,
> 9000 Steenth Street, N. W.

He is undoubtedly a good professor if he can teach the piano, but, notwithstanding this, there are at least nine other professors whose advertisements read in a similar manner. How can the prospective pupil tell which of these piano teachers he would like to engage? Nothing is told in the advertisement but a strange name and address. The newcomer would like to know many things. He would like to know what method this professor teaches, what his specialty or hobby is, and what his price is, and yet the advertisement tells none of these things. What is there about an uninteresting advertisement like this which would attract anyone?

Much better would it be if he were to advertise thus:

> A SOFT SINGING TONE
> is the most beautiful. Every piano player should acquire it. That is what I aim to teach.
> J. H. POUNDHARDT,
> 9000 Steenth Street, N. W.

It has always been my belief that business principles hold good in the musical profession as well as in the dry goods and grocery trades Advertising can be done on scientific principles, and the musician will not be vulgarized by a well worded ad. any more than is the tradesman. The subject of advertising is one which should be studied by itself and for its own sake by every singer, player and teacher until he arrives at the point where he can afford to hire someone to attend to this part of his business for him. It is a really fascinating though much neglected study among musicians. It is generally conceded by all progressive people that more than one-half of the success of musicians is due to skillful advertising, and it is a known fact that the very best musician cannot succeed without it.

Some interesting circulars and booklets have been received from teachers and concert performers, among which were those of Charles H. Rabold, baritone; Oscar Franklin Comstock, pianist and vocalist, and Mr. and Mrs. Otto Torney Simon. One of the most artistic of the fall booklets was planned by Mrs. Jasper Dean McFall. In this booklet every other page was left blank except for a musical quotation which was placed in the centre. H. H. Freeman's circular is interesting from an advertising standpoint. He gives a good idea of his method of teaching, and touches on an important point when he says: "Finished phrasing and real expressiveness are acquired only through perfect breath control and low breath pressure—especially in the head voice. These principles are particularly successful in securing for ladies expressive head notes." Mrs. J. Esputa Daly has issued some neat folders explaining her method of sight singing.

Ernest Lent explained his method of teaching the position of the fingers on the violin strings. Instead of teaching the first, second, third and fourth fingers on one string, he teaches the first finger on each of the four strings first, marking the pupil's violin so as to have the fingers perfectly located. Then he teaches the second finger on each string, and so on. In pursuance of this plan he composed several little pieces for beginners, which are prettily dedicated to some of his pupils. The first piece brings into play the open strings and first finger positions only. In succeeding pieces one finger is added at a time.

It is said that a name divided against itself cannot stand. This is true of the Euterpe Musical Club and the Euterpe Club (also musical), which were the same and are now different. These names cannot stand very long as they are. There will be too many complications. Some of the Euterpe Musical Club's audience will go by mistake to the Euterpe Club, and some of the musical writers will praise the Euterpe Club for the Euterpe Musical Club's concert. That is just the fix I am in now. I don't dare write anything about either of them for fear I will put down the right people and the wrong club or the right club and the wrong people. Now, if the two clubs should change club rooms with each other then the Euterpe Musical Club would be giving concerts in the Euterpe Club's rooms to a Euterpe Club audience and the Euterpe Club would—oh, well, this is getting too difficult.

Miss A. L. Lockhardt, a soprano from Galveston, Tex., is a newcomer who is attracting the attention of the musical fraternity, who are extending to her a cordial welcome. Miss Lockhardt was a sufferer through the Galveston flood, having lost her home and its entire contents. She was a Galveston favorite, and has had considerable experience in concert work before society audiences.

BERENICE THOMPSON.

Anderson-Baernstein.

FROM the office of William Fisher, the sole manager of Sara Anderson and Joseph Baernstein, comes the news that the inquiries for these two artists are very numerous indeed.

Although the season has not begun, the following cities seek their services: Joint song recital in Brooklyn, N. Y.; joint song recital in New York city; joint song recital in Englewood, N. J.; Verdi "Requiem" with the Handel and Haydn Society, of Boston, Mass.; song recital in Springfield, Mass.; song recital in Binghamton, N. Y.; "Messiah," with the Philharmonic Society, of Minneapolis, Minn.; "Messiah," with Choral Society, of St. Paul, Minn.; "Messiah," in Chicago, Ill.; "Messiah," in Galesburg, Ill.; two performances of "Messiah" in Oberlin, Ohio; song recital in Toledo, Ohio; song recital in Saginaw, Mich.; "Messiah" in Albany, N. Y.; concerts with the Apollo Club, of Pittsburg, Pa.; Gounod's "Faust" in Detroit, Mich.; Mendelssohn Club, of Chicago, Ill.; "Creation" with the Handel and Haydn Society, of Boston, Mass.; concert with Philharmonic Society, of Minneapolis, Minn.; concert with St. Paul Choral Society, of St. Paul, Minn. Joint song recital in Ann Arbor could not be accepted on account of conflicting dates, and no end of societies are still considering.

OTTO FLOERSHEIM.—Otto Floersheim, the gifted artist who represents THE MUSICAL COURIER, of New York, in Berlin, lately celebrated with congratulations from far and near his twenty-fifth artistic jubilee. We add ourselves to the number of those who congratulate him. Otto Floersheim has by his practical, pertinent and incisive criticisms attracted general attention in Germany and beyond the ocean.—Leipsic Die Musik Wocke.

VANDERVEER GREEN.—Miss Marie Vanderveer Green, the contralto, who has been in Australia, New Zealand and other antipodal countries, is expected in the United States in the month of November, and it is hoped that she will sing here, as her many friends and admirers would like to hear her again.

FROM PARIS.

PARIS, SEPTEMBER 26, 1901.

MANY signs are apparent that Paris is waking up. The theatres are rapidly opening their doors, and it is confidently expected that the ensuing season will be a busy and prosperous one.

Although very little is being done as yet in musical matters, that is at once accounted for by the fact that somehow in every capital the concert season seems, like the dinner hour, to grow later every year. Although none of the great symphonic concerts have as yet resumed activity, yet there are light orchestral concerts given every week which are quite enjoyable for the excellence of the performances and the taste and diversity of the programs. At the Jardin d'Acclimatisation, near to the Bois de Boulogne, an orchestral concert is given every Thursday and Sunday, generally with the addition of one or two vocalists, and a series of similar concerts, appealing to the same class of the public, at the Grand Palais, on Sunday. The hour for these concerts is at 3 p. m., and it is interesting to notice the numbers of respectably dressed, well mannered people listening to familiar numbers well performed by a competent orchestra. As novelties do not form a part of the plan of these concerts, one program will serve as a specimen: "Freischütz" overture, Weber; "Hymn to St. Cecilia," Gounod; "Procession" melody, C. Franck, sung by Paul Daraux; "Persian Dance," Guiraud; air from "Thaïs." Massenet, sung by Mlle. de Verine; "Carmen," orchestral suite, Bizet; "The Magic Flute." Mozart, duet sung by Mlle. de Verine and M. Daraux; Violin Solo, Introduction and Rondo, Saint-Saëns, performed by M. Quesnel, and Hungarian Dances, Brahms.

As I said before, these are popular concerts in every sense, public, program and price, and it is only necessary to observe the attention with which the music is listened to by large audiences to be convinced of the necessity for their existence.

One noticeable feature of Paris theatricals is the absence of theatres devoted as formerly to operette and opera bouffe. I do not think this is owing to the change of public taste for this kind of entertainment, but in my opinion to the lack of supply. France, which may be said to have created this form of musical play, seems to have exhausted itself, and at present furnishes neither librettists nor composers of sufficient originality to attract the public. By operette I mean the style of work of which Offenbach and Lecocq were the great originators. In the States it is called comic opera, and is always an inane absurdity in three acts, built around a low comedian, who generally makes his first entrance by being shot as from a catapult from the wings, sliding down a mountain or a roof, or some other idiotic mode of "coming on." But the type of which "The Grand Duchess" or "Madame Angot" were the bright exemplars seems to have departed. At the Gaité, long the home of this class of piece, they have been compelled to revive "Les Cloches de Corneville," a work which had more consecutive performances than any other piece. It has made fortunes for composer, publishers and managers. The present revival is padded out with several elaborate, well arranged ballets. At the Théâtre du Château d'Eau, which has been opened under a new management, operette is to form the staple of the entertainment. Here the revival has been Offenbach's "Tambour-Major," also with the addition of ballet and an elaborate stage setting. The scene of the entrance of the French into Milan is made the sensation of the piece, 400 people being present on the stage at once. This Théâtre du Château d'Eau has for some years had many vicissitudes. It has changed its name as often as its managers, ill luck being the one thing that seemed to stay with it. Last season it was renamed the Opéra Populaire, with the scheme of giving operas selected from the repertory of the two subventioned houses of Paris, the Opéra and Opéra Comique, at popular prices. The principal singers engaged were competent, orchestra of fifty capable, ballet and chorus sufficiently numerous, and all seemed to promise well. The opening work was Gounod's "Queen of Sheba," followed by "Zampa," "Paul and Virgina," "Traviata," &c., and works of the same class. As the prices were low—5 francs ($1) for the best seats—and the theatre is situated in a very populous part of Paris, it attracted a public of its own, to which familiar works fairly well performed were more acceptable than those of greater novelty. All went well until some spirit of ill-intent prompted the directors to produce an original work, "Charlotte Corday," by Alexandre Georges. That settled the affair. The theatre shortly afterward closed, and the directors went into bankruptcy. It has now resumed one of its former names, and as the prices of the seats are extremely low, 60 cents for the orchestra chairs, better luck is looked for.

The rehearsals of "Les Barbares," the new opera by Saint-Saëns, are being actively pushed forward at the Opéra. Sardou—that excellent and experienced stage manager, who, as the readers of THE MUSICAL COURIER are aware, is one of the co-authors of the libretto—is daily engaged trying to instill into the principal performers his ideas as to the different phases of the action. Mesdames Heglon (contralto) and Hatto (soprano), with Vaguet (tenor) and Delmas (bass), the latter not only one of the foremost artists at the Opéra, but one of the best singers as well as one of the best actors now before the public, are the principal interpreters. The scenery and costumes of "Les Barbares" are all ready, and it is expected that the work will be ready for production about the middle of October. Taffanel will conduct.

At the Opéra Comique, also, they are very busy, either with the débuts of new singers in old works or the preparation of new ones. At this theatre one is always sure to find a very careful performance of every work presented to the public, with invariably an exquisite stage setting, characterized by liberality and good taste. Those who have witnessed, say, "Orpheus." "Fidelio." "Joseph," &c., or "Cinderella." "Hänsel and Gretel," "Falstaff," &c., not to mention the stock works such as "Mignon," "Carmen," "Manon," will remember the careful manner in which the works at the Opéra Comique have been placed before the public during the three years that Albert Carré has been director. In that time he has mounted, or remounted, no less than forty works, without counting the shorter pieces in one act, or ballets, involving labor that would have sorely taxed anyone not gifted with the knowledge, enthusiasm and patience possessed by this energetic and able manager.

DE VALMOUR.

OLIVOTTI.—The violinist Olivotti—the new Paganini—who is making such sensational success in the vaudeville in Europe, is none other than Michael Banner. There is more money in the vaudeville than the regular concert engagement, but who can tell but that the vaudeville will become the regular if conditions do not change?

COOMBS.—Charles Whitney Coombs has returned from Maine, where he spent his summer holidays and resumed teaching at his studio, 49 West Twentieth street.

Esther Fee.

ACCORDING to a cable received by her manager, Esther Feé, the violinist, who has been secured to play at the first Paur symphony concert in Carnegie Hall, sailed from Havre on Saturday, October 19. Upon her arrival in New York she will rest a few days as the guest of Miss Electa Gifford, the soprano, and Miss Anna Millar, manager for Paur's Orchestra. She will then pay a visit to her home in the West, returning later for the New York concert.

According to reports from abroad Miss Feé has made a name for herself among the few distinguished women who play the violin. She has been appearing in public almost constantly since she went to Europe and has toured England, playing at the Belfast Philharmonic concerts, and at Glasgow, Cardiff and Newcastle. Much interest is manifested among American critics in the progress this young artist has made while abroad.

Her personality has thus been described: "Miss Feé is uncommonly tall and as fair as a daughter of the gods. She possesses that Trilby-like mouth and chin which proved to be an inspiration in Du Maurier's famous novel. She has not only the fingers, hands and arms of a violinist, but her whole being impresses one with her complete embodiment of the spirit of music."

At the Paur symphony concert on November 18, Miss Feé will play the Bruch G minor Concerto, with full orchestra, and "Souvenir de Haydn," with double string quartet accompaniment.

Ellison Van Hoose's Engagements.

THIS young tenor is beginning to be recognized as one of our very best. It is a matter of congratulation to this artist to know that Mr. Gericke has engaged him for six Boston Symphony concerts, and to sing in all of these with Madame Ternina as well as his own solo numbers. During the series of six concerts with the Boston orchestra Mr. Van Hoose will sing with Madame Ternina the duet from the first act of "Die Götterdämmerung" and the first act of "Tannhäuser" (Paris version). Alone he will sing the "Prize Song" ("Die Meistersinger") and "Siegfried's Death," from the last act of "Die Götterdämmerung." The dates of these concerts are as follows: Boston, November 1 and 2; Philadelphia, November 4 and 6; Baltimore, November 5, and New York, November 7. Mr. Van Hoose will also sing the Verdi "Requiem" in Providence, November 19; "Messiah," Philadelphia, December 30; Bach's "Christmas Oratorio," St. Louis, December 26, and "The Messiah" in Brooklyn on December 19.

CHAIRMAN PRESBY.—Frank H. Presby, of the Montclair Club, has engaged Miss Amy Murray, with Mrs. Nelson at the piano, for "An Evening of Scottish Song," for next Monday evening.. At the next entertainment, November 11, the Kaltenborn Orchestra will present a program, with solos by Messrs. Louis Heine, violin, and Albert Bode, trumpet. Mr. Presby last year engaged Miss Cumming, Hobart Smock, Platon Brounoff and other well-known artists, and presented a high class of entertainments.

"FAUST" IN CONCERT FORM.—Gounod's "Faust" will again be performed in concert form, and this time the up to date club giving the work is the Cecilia, of Detroit, Mich., with the energetic N. J. Corey at the head of the choral forces. The soloists engaged are Van Hoose, Faust; Rio, Marguerite, and Baernstein, Mephistopheles.

MUSIC IN BROOKLYN.

OVER in Brooklyn, where the birthdays of the women stop at thirty-three and the men at forty-two, a misinformed reporter on one of the "editions" stands charged with circulating the story of Dudley Buck's retirement. When dyed in the wool Brooklynites tell you they saw a piece of news in an "edition" they mean the Brooklyn Page of one of the Manhattan newspapers. The residents of Manhattan do not see this Page, and even if they did they would be no wiser. The truth of the matter is Mr. Buck was never in more vigorous health than he is this autumn, and furthermore he is not going to resign from anything. The vestry of the Church of the Holy Trinity, where Mr. Buck has been the organist and choirmaster for over twenty years, has given him a leave of absence (with pay) until next May. It is this extended vacation which doubtless inspired the sensational story of Mr. Buck's illness and retirement.

When the Brooklyn Apollo Club was organized twenty-four years ago Mr. Buck was elected musical director, and he was re-elected at every election since that time. In a community like Brooklyn, where family and social life means so much, a club like the Apollo has been a real factor in society, although to-day the concerts do not have the same exclusiveness for which these musical events were noted ten or fifteen years ago. Nevertheless, the conductorship of the club is a position of sufficient importance to tempt ambitious musicians. In the appointment of a temporary leader the officers of the club have followed a precedent, for during Mr. Buck's vacation the rehearsals, and possibly the first concert, will be conducted by John Hyatt Brewer, the club accompanist, and for twenty years a member of the club.

Mr. Buck's vacation will not extend beyond the new year. His eyes need rest and that is all. He never used glasses, and always an omnivorous reader and hard student, it is presumed that the optic nerves have become strained, but otherwise the composer-organist is in the enjoyment of perfect health. The concerts of the Apollo Club will be given at the Academy of Music on December 10, February 11 and April 15.

Mrs. William E. Beardsley, the musical director of the Chiropean Club, presented an admirable program at the first social meeting of the club held at the Knapp Mansion on October 17. The musical numbers were given by Walter McIlroy, tenor; Miss Florence Mulford, contralto, and Miss Leonora A. Dally, pianist. The piano accompaniments for the singers were artistically played by Miss Penelope Parker. Mr. McIlroy sang "Wanderer's Nachtlied," by Schubert; "I'll Sing Thee Songs of Araby," Clay; "Haste Thee," Hawley, and "Drink to Me Only With Thine Eyes," old English. The young tenor was in particularly fine voice. Miss Mulford's rich contralto delighted everyone. First she sang "My Heart at Thy Sweet Voice," from "Samson and Delilah," and then two songs by Franz, "Es hat die Rose sich beklagt" and "Im Herbst." Miss Dally's musical playing was also thoroughly enjoyed.. Her numbers were a Barcarolle by Moszkowski and a concert piece by Guiraud. The literary features of the afternoon were contributed by Miss Nahar, Mrs. Edwin L. Patterson, Miss Chandler, Irving Bacheller and Alexander Black.

Claude Madden, a violinist and composer, formerly a resident of Brooklyn, has composed a new Berceuse and dedicated the same to Constance Beardsley, the gifted little pianist, the daughter of Dr. and Mrs. William E. Beardsley, of 101 Taylor street.

That Dr. Henry G. Hanchett is a musician who values time as he regards tempo is evident to all who have attended his lecture recitals. At the opening of the autumn series on "Musical Contrasts" at Adelphi Assembly Hall Monday afternoon, October 14, just one hour by the clock was occupied for the lecture and the illustrations. Dr. Hanchett talks in a conversational tone, and what he says is free from pedantry and dogmatic self-assertiveness, and he never seems to talk a moment too long. The program was most interesting. The lecturer made contrasts between the works of Gretry and Wagner; between Scarlatti and Guilmant; Scarlatti and Chaminade; Bach and Mrs. Beach; Händel, Rheinberger and Mason. He played all of the piano illustrations but one, "The Fire Fugue," by Händel, and this was performed by Mrs. Stuart Close, an advanced pupil of Dr. Hanchett. Mrs. Lucie Boice Wood, soprano, contrasted the vocal numbers, "My Heart Ever Faithful," by Bach, and "Ecstase," by Mrs. Beach. The third lecture in the course will be given next Monday afternoon at 4 o'clock.

The opening sale of course tickets for the concerts in Brooklyn by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was held last evening (Tuesday, October 22, Liszt's birthday by the way). The soloists for the five concerts in Brooklyn will be: November 8, Madame Ternina, soprano; December 13; January 17, Harold Bauer, piano; February 17, Fritz Kreisler, violin; March 21, Madame Nordica, soprano. The concerts will again be given under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute and the Brooklyn Philharmonic. The Ladies' Auxiliary organized last spring will assist in arousing the enthusiasm in the concerts during the season.

While singing at the Vermont Festival last week Mme. Schumann-Heink caught a severe cold, and owing to her illness the Brooklyn recital announced for last Thursday evening had to be postponed.

Carbone Song Recitals.

THE first of a series of song recitals by Miss Carmela Carbone and Miss Grazia Carbone was given at Sherry's on Wednesday, October 16. A fashionable and discriminating audience applauded the efforts of the two young singers, whose voices are far beyond the average. Gaston M. Dethier, organist of St. Francis Xavier Church, played the accompaniments in his usual masterly fashion and was at all times en accord with his artists. The program was as follows:

Duo, No. di voi non vo' fidarmi.....Händel
(Arranged by Brahms.)
Recitative and air, Il mio bel foco.....Marcello
Cavatina, Di piacer mi balza il cor (from La Gazza Ladra)..Rossini

BOSTON, October 20, 1901.

THE first concert of the twenty-first season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, was given last night in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Academic Overture.....Brahms
Concerto for 'cello.....Lalo
Jean Gérardy.
Symphonic Poem, Fest-Klänge.....Liszt
Symphony No. 7.....Beethoven

The woodwind was doubled throughout the concert, and I understand that this rule will prevail henceforth. Furthermore, the seating of the orchestra is now different. The woodwind is all to the left of the conductor and beyond the first violins. The horns, trumpets and trombones are to the right of the conductor. The kettledrum man is directly in front of the conductor and back of the 'cellos. The other pulsatile instruments are to the drummer's left. The double basses are stretched along at the back of the stage.

The program was respectable and not distinguished. While there was no novelty, Lalo's Concerto had been heard here only once—two years ago this month, when Miss Ruegger played it—and the Symphonic Poem of Liszt had not been played at these concerts since early in 1890, when Mr. Nikisch ruled.

Perhaps the Academic Overture—which is one of the least academic compositions of Brahms—was put on the program for repetition at the concert to be given at the Yale University of Physical Culture; surely it has been played here enough.

Heine gives in his "Reisebilder" a delightful account of Göttingen, the city celebrated for its sausages and its university. He could not remember, at the time he wrote, the names of all the students, "and there are many of the professors who have not even yet a name." And he studied diligently the feet of the women of Göttingen, and consulted and made extracts from the rarest books in the Library, and in a treatise of astonishing learning he spoke (1) Of Feet in General, (2) Of Feet Among the Ancients, (3) Of the Feet of Elephants, &c., and only because he could not find any sheet of paper large enough did he refrain from introducing copperplate facsimiles of the feet of the women of Göttingen.

And how Canning guyed the University of Göttingen in his burlesque, "The Rovers; or, the Double Arrangement"! Rogero sings in the subterranean vault in the Abbey of Quedlinburgh his song—to the air "Lanterna Magica" I quote the fifth verse merely for the sake of the refrain:

There first for thee my passion grew,
Sweet! sweet Matilda Pottingen!
Thou wast the daughter of my tutor, law professor at the University of Göttingen—
niversity of Göttingen.

Now to this same university went in the early fifties one Joseph Joachim. He had come to the belief that it was a good thing for a violinist to know about something besides the fiddle. Whether this belief was well founded is a debatable question. Perhaps Joachim had heard the old English saying in some German version: "To some men God gives brains; to others to play on the fiddle." At any rate, he went to Göttingen to study history and philosophy. (The latter served him well when his wife left him and Brahms espoused her cause.)

He had a visitor in the summer months. Johannes Brahms was with him, and it is said that here the latter found in the Kneipe that student gayety which permeates the Academic Overture, with its student's songs.

But where is the reckless gayety of student life in this overture? Much of the music is dry, on account of the orchestration. For even when you admit that Brahms was a master builder of musical structures, you are not thereby estopped from saying in clear, bell-like tones that he was also color deaf.

The Brahmsite turns triumphantly to the Fuchslied—"Was Kommt dort von der Höh," which is introduced by two bassoons, accompanied by 'cellos and violas pizzicati. "There! there!" he exclaims, "that is excruciatingly funny. Only a master, only Saint Johannes could make so easily a master stroke." If you cross-examine him you will find that the humor consists in the choice of instruments.

Somebody once said that the bassoon is the clown of the orchestra. Therefore the double bassoon should be twice as funny—perhaps even a Shakespearian clown. And simply because somebody gave the poor bassoon this name, it must be regarded as funny per se. "Funny"? The bassoon is lugubrious, ghostly, spectral, weird, unearthly, demoniacal. It smells of mortality. It suggests the glowworm and the grave. The wicked nuns in "Robert le Diable" heard it and obeyed the spell, for corruption called to corruption. It lends a flavor of the charnel house to Tschaikowsky's "Pathétique." It pictures the mood of Leonora without Di Luna's tower. It chatters and gibbers as the murderous artist in the "Symphonie Fantastique" goes his wretched way to the scaffold. It is the instrument dear to all that inhabit the night air, the cemetery, the diseased mind.

But these bassoons appear in Brahms' overture etwas plotzlich—a phrase I once heard used in a Berlin beer hall by a dapper and corseted and monocled officer, who was extremely thirsty and thus addressed the waiter. And I defy any sober minded person who has not the fear of Brahms before his eyes to find the introduction or the treatment of the song spontaneously gay or humorous. The song itself is a good Freshman hazing song, with its leathery Herr Papa, who reads in Cicero, and its Frau Mama, and "Mamzell Socur," and all that.

Some of the books say that the overture was written by Brahms in 1881. If this statement is correct, he must have written it on the train, or without food and clothes for a day and a night, for it was played at Breslau January 4, of that year. No, the year was 1880, the year of the "Tragic" Overture, which bears the later opus number but was written before the "Academic."

Some of the books—and books of authority—add that the "Academic" was written for performance at Breslau on the occasion of Brahms receiving the degree of Doctor of Philosophy. He did receive the degree, but it was on March 11, 1879, and if anyone doubts this I shall be happy to quote to him the degree in the original Latin—which I cannot construe, except as regards the date.

I like to think of Brahms as a Doctor of Philosophy. The degree goes so well with the man. It also explains some—not all—of his music. Some of it he wrote in anticipation of the honor, to show that he was worthy. When the righteous soul of Mr. Finck is vexed in concert hall by, say, Brahms' Fourth Symphony, he should not go out to breathe God's pure air, nor should he pull out a volume of Schopenhauer to solace his enforced attendance. Let him consider and weigh the music as the night work of a Doctor of Philosophy.

Is Liszt's symphonic poem, "Fest-Klänge," often played in New York? I heard it last night without prejudice, in deed with anticipation, for I read the other day in Ramann's long-winded biography of Liszt that the poem was composed as the wedding music for his public union with the Princess Sayn-Wittgenstein, the Princess to whom he wrote so many letters. How did this prodigious man find time to write innumerable letters to so many women to whom he had been, was, or was to be prodigal? And the letters are often so interesting! An amazing vitality expended in all directions! But this "Fest-Klänge" is not among his best works, although it is characteristic in one respect—in its streak of vulgarity. When Liszt is vulgar, he is vulgar beyond description. Only Wagner, among the great ones, surpasses him, viz., in the finale of the "Rienzi" overture. It used to be the fashion to speak contemptuously of the vulgarity of Verdi; but that great composer, at his worst, in his most brutal early stage, was never so vulgar as Liszt; there was the conviction of honesty; Verdi was always terribly in earnest, while Liszt in these moments is hopelessly insincere. His pomp is sawdust and tinsel. He wears a property crown. Then by the side of really beautiful passages, pages of grace and tenderness, pages that might charm and fill with pride the breast of any princess who inspired such music, there are passages of tawdry sentimentalism. Furthermore, there is in this symphonic poem the suspicion of personal appeal to the gaping world, the characteristic that prompted these bitter words of Isaac Moses Hirsch: "And so he became religious in his old age, as other gallants, and he even became an Abbé and wore a robe that he might preach the gospel to the negroes in Africa, provided white and distinguished ladies and gentlemen of the highest social position, with hands encased in white kid gloves, stood by to look on and listen." Liszt in this "wedding music" asks the world to stand by, not with a candle, but with torches; to stand by and applaud.

Mr. Gérardy as a sixteen-year old boy first played here in 1894. Last night he played here for the first time at a symphony concert, and to the best of my recollection for the first time in this city, with orchestra. The concerto that he chose is not one of Lalo's chief works. It is well enough so far as structure goes; there is no sacrifice of art to make a virtuoso holiday; there are interesting harmonic progressions, and the instrumentation is distinguished. "The Village Dance" in the second movement is delightful. But, as a whole, the mood is austere, and at times sour.

Hanslick objected to the pompous passages in the first movement, and considered them as out of place in a 'cello concerto. I confess I like orchestral pomp of introduction while the virtuoso is waiting for his cue. There is pomp in the introduction of the E flat Piano Concerto of Beethoven, after the opening flourishes of the pianist; the pomp of mighty expectation, the pointing to great deeds that will be accomplished. It all depends on that which follows the announcement. And here Lalo does not answer expectation.

Mr. Gérardy played as a most accomplished virtuoso musician. His tone was rich and beautiful, his bowing was free, his left hand sensitive and trained. And the temperament of the player often mellowed the dryness of the composer.

It may be said here once for all that no violinist, 'cellist or singer is heard to full advantage in Symphony Hall, although a pamphlet with statistics and diagrams has been published by a Harvard professor to prove that the acoustic properties of this hall should be wonderful and beyond all whooping.

The orchestral performance last night was by no means flawless. It would be unjust, however, to speak in detail concerning any shortcomings. The men have not played together under Mr. Gericke for several months; there are new members of the woodwind band; the new arrangement of seating was doubtless disconcerting. There were delightful moments of solo work last evening. Mr. Longy, oboe; Mr. Maquarre, flute, and Mr. Hackebarth, horn, especially distinguished themselves. Mr. Lebailly, the new first clarinet, displayed a warm, beautiful, poetic quality of tone.

I am much interested in Sar Peladan's "L'Art Idéaliste et Mystique." It is a book that should be in the pockets of all lecturers before young ladies' musical clubs—"And I, too, have been in Arcadia."

A few quotations are worth a dozen pages of description.

"Yes, Strauss"—David, not Richard, Johann, Joseph or Eduard—"has denied, but 'Parsifal' has affirmed; and the archangel of Franck has covered with his sublime voice the impious chatter of Renan."

"Humanity, O citizens, will always go to mass when the priest is Bach, Beethoven, Palestrina; the sublime organ cannot be atheized."

"Every Latin animal of either sex is called upon to cultivate that which the unclean bourgeoisie called one day the graces. Where is the young miss who does not pound her sonata, who does not whine her romance, who does not smear her water color?"

"That which makes the singer an inferior being is that he realizes the thought of another, not his own."

"Whoever has often spoken of love knows that whenever he applies himself to the task and modulates tender expressions he moves mightily. What woman at the Opéra has not longed to hear from the lips of her husband the exquisite inflection of love that comes from De Rézske? The peace of marriage, the future of the family and that of society itself depend on the manner in which the spouses speak of love."

Mozart is Ionian; Händel is Lesbian." I hasten to add that according to the Sar Lesbian expresses magnificence: "The court, the reign, the person of Louis XIV. and the whole Venetian School are in this mode."

"Sarah Bernhardt carves, paints, engraves—that is to say, she shows in three ways her contempt for art."

"Can a man in a dress coat recite the fury of Orestes and the discourses of Augustus? Can a woman in a corset set forth the harmonious complaint of Iphigenia or the touching entreaty of Esther? No. Very good! Every form that does not suit tragedy avows itself as incompatible with great Art which should remain tragic. I ask whether Rosalind, Desdemona, Titania, I ask whether Isolde and Sieglinde are possible in corsets, puffs, chignon, hoop skirt, drawn bonnet, waterproof, yachting costume?" Since you insist on an answer, O mighty Sar whom four trumpets summon to dinner, I should think that Isolde would look well in a yachting costume—but only in the first act. Of course, it depends largely on her figure. No Germans need apply.

Here is something that requires deep thought. It would be well for the reader to take firm hold of something; "La Joconde repeats for two centuries the thought of Leonardo to those who approach her; she always says the same things to beings of a like comprehension; her tonality may have been lowered to the minor, but her rhythm continues in spite of chemical alterations in the varnish."

"Music is the most material mode of realizing Beauty."

"Even those who repel with us the idiotic theory in accordance with which Rubens should be a great painter will endure in music wretched Hummeleries; they will salute imbecile variations made to show the worth of an instrument; they will listen patiently to concertos by Vieuxtemps."

And this paragraph deserves a separate position.

"When Alexander gave Campaspe to Apelles, it was not the munificent act of a royal libertine, but the deliberate act of a prince who loved beauty more than reality.

"When von Bülow abandoned his wife to Wagner, he imitated Alexander; he preferred to find her in the scores of the master rather than to preserve her materially, and therefore a lesser personage."

One more thought:

"The relation between music and love results in a singular identity between the nervous processes of woman and the formulas of harmony."

And therefore no prudent father will allow his daughter to take harmony lessons in a conservatory under the charge of trustees with white whiskers.

PHILIP HALE.

MRS. EVELYN A. FLETCHER-COPP.—Mrs. Evelyn A. Fletcher-Copp will leave for Europe early in November. She goes to Leipsic and Berlin to give lectures before classes that have been formed by teachers whom she instructed during her last visit to Europe. In London she will have a large class of teachers of her system, it being thoroughly established in England, and many people are desirous of taking lessons from Mrs. Fletcher-Copp personally.

She will return to this country in February and already plans are arranged for classes during the spring and summer.

LAURA CRAWFORD.—Mrs. Laura Crawford has reopened her studio in her residence, 9 West Ninety-first street.

VAN DER STUCKEN returned this week from his usual summer sojourn in Europe. He looks hearty and well and ready for a hard season's work. He will have charge of the College of Music chorus and orchestra classes as before, although he has been relieved of the active duties of dean, retaining the name of honorary dean of the faculty. Mr. Van der Stucken plunged in medias res upon his arrival and conducted the rehearsals of the college classes. The symphony orchestra will be substantially the same as it was last year, with a few exceptions. The following soloists have been engaged already: Eduard Zeldenrust, Harold Bauer, Jean Gerardy, Hugo Kupferschmid, Mrs. Hissem de Moss and Mme. Schumann-Heink. There will be ten afternoon and ten evening concerts, the first to take place Friday afternoon, November 29. There will be an auction sale for the choice of seats, for subscribers only, at College Hall, the mornings of Friday, November 22, and Saturday, November 23.

Among the symphonies to be performed this season will be: Beethoven No. 6; Tschaikowsky Pathetique; Mozart E flat; Haydn C minor; Brahms No. 4, E minor; Svendsen No. 1; Schubert, Unfinished; Berlioz Fantastique. The Symphony Orchestra has so far, under the management of Mr. Edwards, secured six outside engagements—two in Columbus, two in Detroit, one in Indianapolis and one in Greencastle, Ind.

Mr. Van der Stucken brought with him his daughter—a lovely girl of the genuine blonde type. She is gifted musically and will continue her vocal studies here.

Some interesting features will be brought out in the violin department this season at the College of Music. Mr. Marien is arranging a violin concerto for four violins, which will be played by Mrs. Gisela Weber, Miss Bertha Roth, Ralph Wetmore and Fred Gerrard.

Matthias R. Oliver, who is continuing his violin studies in London, stood a successful examination recently in the Royal Academy of Music, and is taking up his work seriously, under the training of Sauret. Mr. Oliver is a pupil of Mr. Tirindelli, and a graduate of the Conservatory of Music.

Henry C. Froehlich and Sidney C. Durst are preparing a series of violin and piano recitals for this season. The programs will embrace the classics, the romantic school, and modern compositions by Brahms, Rheinberger, Grieg, Goldmark and others, including American works for violin and piano, few of which have been heard in Cincinnati.

Miss Josephine Swickard, formerly of Columbus, Ohio, has been engaged as solo soprano at St. Paul's Pro-Cathedral. Miss Swickard is a pupil of Emma Thursby, and is quite an acquisition to the ranks of local sopranos.

THIS has been a lively week, musically, in 'Frisco. There has been "something doing" every night this week with the exception of Wednesday, and sometimes two or three good programs at different places on the same date. Beginning with Monday night: Miss Helen Colburn Heath made her first professional bow to the public at Sherman-Clay Hall on the event of her graduating recital. Miss Heath has been for four years a pupil of the Von Meyerinck School of Music and has just completed the course. During that time she has taken part in different musical events, always with success, and has made quite a hit with her intelligent performance of Gretel to Miss Mae Cullen's Hansel in "Hansel and Gretel," which they have done here several times and very cleverly. Miss Heath has a very charming personality and has the temperament of the true artist. She has been conscientious to a degree in her work, with very pleasing results. Her voice is a sweet, mellow mezzo-soprano, not over strong but making up in quality what it lacks in quantity, which to my way of thinking is far preferable. Her program was carefully compiled from ancient and modern Italian, French and German writers. The English composers had no part in the program, more's the pity, since English is the language of the future, and I believe with all my heart in a good grounding in English first of all. Her songs were selected from Caccini, Scarlatti, Jomelli, Bellini, Leoncavallo for the Italian. The French were "La Charmante Marguerite," a very pretty number, from the Old French, Gretry, Bizet and Massenet. Here she gave for encore "Twickenham Ferry," whose wholesome English tone greatly pleased the audience and was charmingly sung. The German songs were from Händel, Schubert, Liszt; "Die Loreley," one of her best numbers; Richard Strauss and Hugo Wolff's "Er Ist," which was decidedly the most finished of all her songs and displayed more feeling and power in her voice. Miss Heath was assisted by a quartet of strings, composed of Geo. Kalthoff, first violin; Mrs. J. R. Gwynn, second violin; Arthur Fickenscher, viola, and J. R. Gwynn, 'cello. Fred Maurer was the accompanist of the evening and as usual was very satisfactory.

Tuesday evening was the date set for the Rolker "Hour of Song" at Sherman-Clay Hall. Mr. Rolker's programs are always of a very high order, and this concert was no exception. The program was given by Mr. Rolker's pupils excepting the final number, which was given by Mr. Rolker himself. Carl Yoho opened the evening with the Recitative and Aria from "Tannhaüser," but it was easily seen that he was laboring under a difficulty, and his second number was omitted, Mr. Rolker explaining that the young man had a severe cold and would not be able to appear a second time. He has since developed a bad case of ulcerated throat. Four numbers were next given from Hildach, Valerie White, MacDowell and Liza Lehmann, the latter, "L'Oiseleur," being best suited to her voice, by Miss Freda Ohlandt, who, considering her nervousness, did very well indeed. Miss Hedwig Pohlmann has a voice, the inherent stweetness of which promises much under training. Her best songs were "Love's Solace," Willits, and "Songs My Mother Taught Me," Dvorák. The latter was given with good expression, and was followed by an encore, "Mavourneen," which was sweetly sung. Miss Lena Rehfisch has been studying with Mr. Rolker for some years, and is one of his most advanced pupils. She gave in a very low, heavy contralto the "Aria du Penelope," by Max Bruch, which received hearty applause. Mr. Rolker's numbers were all finely done, but the "To the Night," by Bohm, was his opportunity to display the fine shading and tenderness to which he can modulate his powerful tones. It was beautifully given. The concert was attended by the most fashionable audience of the season thus far.

Thursday, October 10, at Sherman-Clay Hall a musicale was given by the pupils of Herr Herman Genss. It was a long program, too long in fact, as it was 10:30 by the clock before the program was finished, and it began at 8:15. A Spanish Cycle of Songs, by Robert Schumann, from the Geibel version, with translation by Julia Goddard, was a program of sufficient weight and length in itself for a whole evening's entertainment. Herr Genss' best vocal pupil is evidently Miss Eudora Forde, who is possessed of a powerful yet sweet dramatic soprano. Her Recitative and Aria from Beethoven's "Fidelio" was well rendered. Miss Margarethe Bruntsch had really more than her share of the program to uphold. I counted no less than seven appearances, which anyone will allow is rather "considerable much" for one young woman. Her pièce de résistance was the aria from the "Barber of Seville." (Miss Bruntsch is a contralto.) She also sang in a duet with Frank Rodolph, in which the young man made a hit with the audience by his realistic rendering of his part. Miss Bruntsch's duet with Miss Forde in the cycle was very pretty, and in the duet, "First Meeting," with Miss Rother I was agreeably impressed with the sweet soprano of the latter. There were piano solos by Charles Dutton, whose "Octave Study," by Schytte, was very good; Master Allen Bier, who gave a Chopin valse and Karganoff's "Hungarian Dance" very tastefully and with good technic for a ten year old. Miss Teresa Ehrmann, who is a former pupil of Robert Tolmie, is a very graceful player, though lacking somewhat in strength as yet, gave Genss' Nocturne and the Leschetizky Tarantelle very gracefully. There were several choruses in which the following took part: Misses Forde, Lyon, Wood, Rother, Bruntsch, Shaw, Price and Messrs. Bier, Callinan, Green, Starr, Rodolph and Coakley. Mr. Genss accompanied on the piano.

Friday afternoon was the event of Signor Ricardo A. Lucchesi's concert at Sherman-Clay Hall. It was a fine program, arranged with good taste and discretion, and had the very unusual virtue of lasting just one hour. The opening number was a quintet in C major, composed by Signor Lucchesi, and was in four movements—Maestro e Expressivo, Scherzo, Cantabile Sostenuto, Rondo Finale. The composition shows much of real talent and originality, the scherzo particularly being very dainty and original in character. The quintet was performed by Signor Lucchesi at the piano and the Harry Samuels String Quartet, and in justice to the Signor be it said, the quintet could hardly receive a fair criticism owing to the last named gentlemen's lack of proper rehearsal. The ensemble was all saw teeth and rough edges, though even so, one could see much of real beauty in the composition, which I should like to hear again under proper conditions. A softer piano part would have improved the whole materially also. Three vocal numbers, also by Signor Lucchesi, "The Last Adieu," epilogue, with flute obligato, performed by August Rodemann, and "Ave Maria," composed on a Bach Prelude in C minor, were sung by Signorina Lia Poletini, contralto, of the Tivoli company, accompanied by Mme. Inez Carusi, harp; Harry Samuels, violin; Arthur Weiss, 'cello; Signor Lucchesi, organ. Of the three I liked the epilogue best, and the flute obligato, beautifully played by Mr. Rodemann, who also directed the ensemble, was a gem. For the rest Wagner's Liebestod, from "Tristan and Isolde," was given by the well-known soprano, Mme. Emilia Tojetti, and a Caprice Waltz, Saint-Saëns, was performed by Signor Lucchesi at the piano and a string orchestra, composed of Mme. Inez Carusi, H. Siering, Fräulein Hess, Fräulein Forde, W. Weigel, R. Laraja, W. G. Callinan, C. W. Fuhrer, H. Susman, A. Weiss, W. Wertsch, P. Demetrio and Harry Samuels. August Rodemann, director.

At the Y. M. C. A. Auditorium on Saturday afternoon the Minetti String Quartet gave their first concert of the season. The two concerted numbers were a Mozart string quartet in G major and one by Schumann, both compositions being rendered with perfect unanimity of phrasing and rhythm. Mr. Minetti played for the first time here a violin sonata by Francesco Veracini, 1685-1750, a quaint and beautiful composition, the minuetto of which was exquisitely lovely. Mr. Minetti is one of our first violinists and it goes without saying that the composition received full justice of interpretation at his hands. The Adagio Molto in the Schumann quartet was also beautiful. S. G. Fleishman accompanied Mr. Minetti's solo on the piano. The string quartet is composed of G. Minetti, first violin; Samuel Savannah, second violin; L. Kowalsky, viola, and Arthur Weiss, violoncello. These concerts are always popular and are anticipated with the greatest pleasure by our music lovers. Otto Bendix will assist at the next concert, which takes place on November 9.

At Hearst Hall, Berkeley, Thursday evening last, a concert was given by Richard Jose Ferrar, the violinist; Harry Barnhart, baritone, and Wm. King, pianist.

Mrs. Oscar Mansfeldt played a program for me at her studio the other evening to show how rapidly her hand

It is with deep regret one hears of the death of Irma itch-Wertheimer, one of our sweet singers, who, being tely married, devoted her talents entirely to her husand, retiring from public life altogether. Mrs. Wertimer was but twenty-seven, and had she pursued her ocation would undoubtedly have had a career. She was a asmore vocal pupil, and had appeared somewhat extenively in dramatic work, as well as having been heard in everal light operas. She was a native Sacramentan and ad many friends.

The second analytical lecture was given on Friday afteroon at the California Conservatory of Music to a large lass, Mr. Bendix, the director, illustrating his subjects as sual on the piano as he discoursed.

The regular "Conservatory Evening" was held on the me date, the program being furnished by Misses Lily ansen and Alice Toklas on two pianos.

The Fifth Mass, by Alois Lejeal, was sung yesterday at t. Dominic's Church, under the direction of James Hamton Howe, the organist and choirmaster. Also an "Ave aria" by the same composer, and "Asperges Me." The ass is full of merit, the "Agnus Dei," beginning with alto lo, was beautifully rendered by Miss Ella McCloskey. is the gem of the Mass, and very lovely. Mr. ejeal is a San Franciscan, and has composed a great al, doing much in the way of masses and sacred music. e is a man of fine attainments and musical intellectuality, ving filled an important part in the musical life of our wn. The Fifth Mass was first used while in manuscript Philadelphia some years ago.

Signor Abramoff, one of our most popular vocal teachs, has announced his intention to spend eight months of e year in New York, where he has had flattering offers enter the musical field. We are sorry to lose Signor bramoff, even though he return for a four months' visit ery year, since his absence will be severely felt in our sical circles.

Miss Moroney, of our town, is also going to New York, musician's Mecca, and gives a farewell concert at Sherin-Clay Hall next Saturday evening, assisted by Donald V. Graham and Camille d'Arville-Crellin, vocalists, d Lovell Langstroh, the talented 'cellist. She goes to w York to further pursue her musical studies.

MRS. A. WEDMORE JONES.

AMY MURRAY'S ENGAGEMENTS.—After filling engagents in Maine and up in the interior of New York State, ss Amy Murray returned to the city, and while here l give several of her interesting Scottish recitals. On tober 15 Miss Murray sang and played on her harp a concert in the McCaddin Memorial Hall, Brooklyn. e will appear again in Brooklyn on the 28th of this nth. On the 29th she opens the season in the musical l lecture course of the Montclair (N. J.) Club. BOSTON, October 19, 1901.

Miss Bertha Johnson, teacher of the Yersin Method of French, will return to the city on Monday and resume lessons. Miss Johnson holds a diploma from the Yersins and is the only person in Boston authorized to teach their method. During the season Miss Johnson is kept busy with pupils, among them being many singers, who go to her for French diction. The success of the Yersin Method in teaching French pronunciation is so well known that it is scarcely necessary to do more than mention the name. Everyone who has ever studied with Miss Johnson realizes her particular aptitude for teaching.

Students of the Faelten Pianoforte School gave an interesting exhibition at the studios of Miss Alice E. Paine, in the Day Building, Worcester, Mass., on Saturday, October 12, before a large and fashionable audience, who were very much interested in the playing and in the remarks which were made regarding the Faelten system. Those who took part were Gladys Glines, Mildred Page, Georgine McConnell, Robert Gibb and Alice Vogel.

Homer A. Norris has just completed a work for three solo voices—soprano, tenor and baritone—to text selected from Walt Whitman's "Leaves of Grass." The music is written in the most modern vein, Mr. Norris feeling that in order to properly express Whitman it was necessary to do away with the confines and partitions of keys and to consider the tone world a unit. Harmonic and melodic material is chosen which best expresses the import of the text. A public hearing of the work will be looked forward to with interest.

Mr. Norris' setting of John Burroughs' "Waiting," which is just issued by Schirmer, is being sung by prominent soloists in church services.

Miss Ellen M. Yerrinton, of Cambridge, has returned from her third season of study in Germany with Mme. Teresa Carreño, the celebrated pianist.

Miss Grey Hughes, a London concert singer, arrived in Boston on Friday.

At the second evening in the faculty course at the New England Conservatory of Music, Wednesday night, a piano recital will be given by Alfred de Voto. The program is made up of selections from Beethoven, Chopin, Dennée, Henselt, Brassin and Liszt.

Miss Josephine Sherwood will give eight lectures illustrating and explaining the music of the Cambridge Symphony concerts on the afternoons of the concerts, as follows: October 31, November 2, December 5, January 9, January 30, February 13, March 13, April 24.

At the recital of the Faelten Pianoforte School, in Huntington Chambers Hall, last Tuesday, the following students took part: Leon Smith, Leslie Flentje, Joseph Gordon Hegerty, Charles R. Calkins, William Daly, Frank Luker, Arthur E. Ament and Hu T. Huffmaster. The first movement of the Concerto No. 5, E flat major, op. 74, Beethoven, was played by Forrest J. Cressman, of the faculty, assisted by Carl Faelten.

There will be an organ recital in the Unitarian church at Medford by Mrs. Georgiana Frye-Cheney, assisted by Miss Charlotte Lynn, soprano, on Monday evening, October 21, at 8 o'clock.

In the Lowell Institute Course Carl Armbruster, the musician-lecturer from London, began his series of lectures on Thursday evening. The subject of this series is "The Great Composers of Classical Song," illustrated by Miss Pauline Cramer. The first lecture was on "The Predecessors of Schubert, Bach, Mozart, Beethoven."

Melville Horner, the baritone, who is this season one of the faculty at the Copley Square School of Music, will give a recital at the school October 30, when he will sing songs by Schubert, Schumann and Franz and the "Maud Cycle," by Somerville.

Mrs. Norwood has opened a conservatory of music at New Bedford and will be assisted by Mrs. Flora E. Barry, of this city.

Whitney Tew, of London, England, announces a song recital at Chickering Hall on Wednesday evening, November 6.

Madame Bloomfield-Zeisler will give two piano recitals at Chickering Hall on the evening of November 20 and the afternoon of November 23.

Mrs. Gertrude Franklin Salisbury's pupils, Mrs. Helen A. Hunt and Miss Elsa Heindl, are to give song recitals the last week in November. In both concerts novelties from Russia will be given.

The New England Conservatory of Music announces two opera scholarships, to be awarded by competition. Recommendations and applications must be received before October 20. The school of opera is open to all students, whether pupils of the conservatory or not. Admission to the different classes is by examination only.

An Aeolian and Pianola recital was given this afternoon in Steinert Hall, Arthur Beresford, the basso-baritone, being the soloist.

Miss Charlotte Lynn, who had planned to spend the winter abroad, has decided to postpone her visit until a later date and will continue her studies here with Mr. Slack. She has just accepted the soprano position in the choir of the Park Street Church.

Musical Clubs.

The New York Liederkranz will give its first concert of the season on Sunday evening, November 24.

The Woman's Musical Club, of Columbus, Ohio, opened its season on Wednesday, October 9. A miscellaneous program, with compositions by Schumann, Brahms, Chopin, Godard, Chaminade and Moszkowski, was given by the members.

Baltimore singing societies and the musicians generally of the Monumental City co-operated in every way to make the golden jubilee concerts of the Baltimore Arion a success musically, socially and we trust financially.

The Schubert Society, of Newark, N. J., will give its first concert at Krueger's Auditorium on December 4. The dates of the remaining concerts of the season are March 5 and May 7, 1902.

The new musical club organized at Nashville, Tenn., this autumn will hold its first meeting on October 30 at the home of the president, Mrs. M. S. Lubeck. Mrs. Max Bloomstein is the vice-president and Louis Aach, secretary and treasurer. The program committee is composed of Mrs. W. H. Jacobus, chairman; Miss Etta Goldberg, Miss Cora Loventhal and Miss Lillie Frankland.

Italian and Scandinavian composers will be considered during the winter by the members of the Ladies' Thursday Musicale, of Grand Forks, N. D. German composers will be the topic for the months of October and November.

A new musical club, formed at Attleboro, Mass., has elected the following officers: President, James L. Wiggmore; vice-president, Vernon O. White; secretary, Edward Fox; treasurer, Lester Moore. Meetings will be held Wednesday evenings at the home of the treasurer, Mr. Moore.

An interesting prospectus has been issued by the Chromatic Club, of Troy, and it seems only necessary to publish the names of the artists engaged for concerts to predict a brilliant season. Here is the list: November 14, Leonora Jackson, violin; Harry J. Fellows, tenor, and William Bauer, piano; December 19, Katherine Fisk, contralto, and Gregory Hast, tenor, in a song recital; February 12; Eduard Zeldenrust, the Dutch pianist, in a recital; April 3, Lillian Nordica, soprano, in a song recital.

CRITICISMS ON SCHLESINGER'S SONGS.

[Translation from the Berliner Musik Zeitung.]

"IN the race of artistic efforts in music among nations America has until now chiefly aspired to the education of the virtuoso. In this direction there is in fact a certain over-production, as is witnessed by the yearly increasing export of concert givers. Of American composers we hear comparatively little. But the more sparing in that direction are the productions on the other side of the occan, the stronger we consider it our duty to give our sympathy to those productions that are vouchsafed to us. The American Sebastian B. Schlesinger is a lyric composer for whom one may prognosticate a satisfactory future, and whose present efforts can only command respect. We have before us for review a Schlesinger album (Collection Litolff), and three single songs published by Arthur P. Schmidt, of Boston. Throughout these songs we notice an effort, crowned with success, to find the right feeling and expression, and to avoid everything that is commonplace. These songs, written within medium register, all move within easily singable intervals, which in their succession give place to thoroughly artistic and naturally flowing melodies. In the harmonies one perceives here and there amateur-like want of experience, but in several of the songs the piano part is not wanting in an independent charm.

"The choice of the text, which is mixed German and English, may be designated as having been made with greatest care. Only a small part of the same is taken from the German literature; the composer prefers the poems of his own language, and thus makes us acquainted with many a blossom of English-American poetry. The most of these are written in an 'elegischen'—sentimental—vein, toward which the muse of the composer is drawn most. We mention specially a song, 'Rio Verde,' which develops its lyrical feeling from a pastoral motive; also that delicately felt poem, 'The Midnight Wind,' which Sebastian Schlesinger has clad with an aristocratic and musical dress. But the American composer has on his palette also lighter colors, and in the more rare cases i which the text is of a more cheerful nature, he understanc very well to change the (to him) naturally sad diction int a more rounded, piquant form.

"The translations (made chiefly by Helen Tretbar sound, almost without exception, like originals in Germa They have no hesitating doubt of language, and are we and conscientiously moulded after the melodies.

"Mezzo soprano voices, who are anxious to parac with the glamour of their execution, and who also wish t make effect with their ultimate rendering, will be able t sing some of the Schlesinger songs with success in tl concert room. The chief value of these songs as compc sitions will, however, remain for homes, and as such th may be recommended to a wide circle.

"A. Moszkowski."

New York College of Music.

THE series of concerts, recitals and musicales at tl New York College of Music opened auspiciously la Thursday afternoon in the hall of the college, 128 and 1 East Fifty-eighth street. Alexander Lambert, director the college, with the Venth-Kronold String Quartet, play as the first number the Brahms Quintet in F minor. Whi the performance was not a finished one, it was thorough musical and therefore enjoyable. This is one compositi where Brahms silences his detractors, or those who d clare that the composer lacked thematic ideas. Nothi could be more striking than the second and third mov ments of this truly beautiful piano quintet. The seco movement, Andante, Un Poco Adagio, first suggests t church, and in the adagio the knell of the tomb, and th ideas are all worked out in the painstaking Brahms sty The third movement, Scherzo Allegro, is festive in joyousness, and makes a happy introduction to the four movement, or Finale, Poco Sostenuto.

The string quartet played two movements of one Godard's interesting quartets, works by the way that a not as well known as they deserve to be. Mrs. Mildr Hirschberg, contralto, the vocal soloist of the conce sang four songs, "Still wie die Nacht," Bohm; "Es mu was Wunderbares Sein," Ries; "At Parting" and "I Liebe Dich," Grieg. Before her marriage, several ye ago, Mrs. Hirschberg distinguished herself as a memb of the German Opera Company at the Metropolitan Ope House. In her 'teens she studied with the late Carl Alv and among many aspirants won a scholarship at the N tional Conservatory of Music. Mrs. Hirschberg's vo is rich and both dramatic and sympathetic. At the co cert last Thursday she sang especially well the poe song by Ries. The large audience received her w marked cordiality.

Tonkünstler Society.

THE first meeting in Manhattan by the Tonkünstler Society was held at the Aschenbroedel Club House on Tuesday evening, October 15. As at the first concert held in Brooklyn a fortnight ago, the musical program was mainly devoted to Brahms. To cultivate the fraternal spirit among musicians is one of the aims of this society, but musically the ideals are set upon a high plane. Here is the program given at the meeting in the Aschenbroedel:

Sonata I. for Violin and Piano, G major, op. 78.....Brahms
Mr. and Mrs. David Mannes.

Songs for tenor—
Feldeinsamkeit, op. 86, No. 2.....Brahms
Die Mainacht, op. 43, No. 2.....Brahms
Meine Liebe ist grün, op. 63, No. 5.....Brahms
Charles A. Kaiser, accompanied by Josef Weiss.

Piano solo, Variations on an Original Theme, with Fugue on a Chorale by J. S. Bach (MS.).....Weiss
The composer.

Mr. Kaiser did not sing the Brahms songs in the order named. He sang the second one first, the last one second and the first one last, thus affording a better harmony of the poetry as well as of the music. The singer added as an extra song the beautiful "Ständchen," by the same composer. Mr. Weiss played in characteristic style his variations, and on general request of his admirers gave a second number, and for this selected the "Liebestraum," by Liszt.

FABIAN PIANO RECITAL.—A good pianist, who modestly signs himself S. M. Fabian, will give a piano recital in Mendelssohn Hall to-morrow (Thursday) evening. Fabian will play this program:

Prelude and Fugue, A minor.....Bach
Thirty-two Variations.....Beethoven
Two Etudes, op. 25, No. 1; op. 10, No. 12.....Chopin

Valse, op. 70, No. 1.....Chopin
Scherzo, B minor.....Chopin
Polonaise, op. 53.....Chopin
Walzer, from op. 54.....Rafl
Berceuse.....Grieg
Danse Caprice.....Grieg
Rondo.....Field
Gnomenreigen.....Liszt
Erlkönig.....Schubert-Liszt

A NEW BOOK BY A NEW AUTHOR.—"Opera, Its Accidental Discovery and Development" is the title of a book which will shortly appear, and of which critics speak most favorably. It is a history of opera gathered from old works and manuscripts, and it promises to be a help to musical people. The writer is a young Virginia woman, Mildred Carter.

Platon Brounoff.

PLATON BROUNOFF gave one of the lectures in the first course this season before the public schools of New York last Thursday evening. His topic, of course, was "Russian Music." In addition to the musical illustrations Mr. Brounoff enhanced his lecture with stereopticon views. The lecture delivered in Public School No. 15 will be given in other schools during the season. The Board of Education in the Borough of Brooklyn have also engaged Mr. Brounoff for a series of musical lectures in the Brooklyn schools. During the season 1901-1902 Brounoff has filled engagements or will fill them with the following clubs and societies: Harvard Club, Roselle, N. J.; New York State Music Teachers' Convention in Saratoga; Educational Alliance, New York; New York Board of Education; "Old First" Presbyterian Church, New York; Philharmonic Club, Washington, D. C.; Women's Philharmonic Society, New York; Musical Culture Club, Hornellsville, N. Y.; Engleside Girls' School, New Milford, Conn.; Montclair Club, Montclair, N. J. The title of Mr. Brounoff's lecture-recital is "Russian Life and Music." In his analysis he touches upon the Russian people, the Czars, Siberia, and the illustrations include folksongs, and the works of amateur, classical and modern Russian composers.

Brooklyn Arion Sings "The Bat."

JOHANN STRAUSS' tuneful operetta, "Die Fledermaus," was sung by the Brooklyn Arion at the clubhouse of the society last Sunday night. Arthur Claassen conducted, and altogether it may be stated that the singing, acting and the performance as a whole was far ahead of that of the American opera companies who have attempted to present it here. All of the principals were excellent. Dr. C. H. Klindt made a "hit" as Von Eisenstein, and Mrs. Marie Rappold, as Mrs. Eisenstein, shared the honors with him. Dr. W. John Schildge, as Frank the Jailer, was inimitable and deserves special credit for not overacting the part or making it vulgar, as some of the professional comedians do. Mrs. Annie M. Tischer, as Adele, the parlor maid, sang delightfully, but she was rather too tall for the role. E. S. Florenzie, as Dr. Falke, and E. Leuckert, as Dr. Blind, and Miss Anna Winkopp, as the Russian Prince, also deserve special mention.

TAFT RECITALS AT THE PAN-AMERICAN.—The Buffalo Express of September 28 published the following report of the Taft recitals in the Mission Building on the Pan-American grounds:

A series of delightful recitals on the Aeolian pipe organ at the Mission Building on the Exposition Grounds was given each afternoon last week by Frank Taft, of New York. As an instance of the enterprise of Mr. Taft and the Aeolian Company may be mentioned the fact that on Friday was played for the first time in America a selection from Paderewski's new opera, "Manru." This selection was the love duo between Manru and Ulana, which the critics have pronounced one of the most beautiful as well as one of the most popular numbers of the opera. It is a fact that the Aeolian Company has repeatedly produced excerpts from operas or whole works from famous composers before the scores could be bought in this country. Such enterprise is certainly to be admired.

ARTHUR HOCHMAN'S DEBÚT.

ARTHUR HOCHMAN, a young Russian-American pianist, who returns to his adopted country with high honors won at Berlin, made his début in Pittsburg last Saturday night with Emil Paur and the Paur Symphony Orchestra. While there has been no undue flourishing of trumpets to herald the coming of young Hochman, the American people will be certain to learn before the present season is half over that another musical genius has arrived.

Arthur Hochman was born in St. Petersburg, Russia. When he was eight years old he came to this country with his parents. One year later, when he was nine, he took his first lessons right here in New York. His rapid progress astonished no one more than his master, Xaver Scharwenka. The little fellow's memory was marvelous and his musical comprehension the wonder of those who heard him play after a few quarters' tuition. Soon after he was ten a concert was arranged for young Hochman, and among the artists who assisted on that eventful occasion were Emil Fischer, the operatic basso, and Heinrich Grünfeld, 'cellist. Hochman's parents permitted him to play at intervals in public, but as they were wise people there was no forcing or over advertising of the youthful prodigy. When Hochman entered his teens discriminating friends became convinced that he was something more than merely a talented boy. Study abroad was suggested and the right people came forward at the right time, and Hochman and his mother sailed for Europe.

In Berlin the Hochmans found good friends and advice in the matter of instructors for the budding pianist. For over four years the boy studied with Jedliczka and d'Albert. In the meantime his first master, Scharwenka, removed from New York to Berlin, and there had the happiness to see his gifted pupil play at the Berlin Philharmonic concerts. The Berlin début proved a brilliant success, and the subsequent appearances in other German cities quickly added to his reputation. Arthur Hochman is twenty years old. On the platform he looks even more youthful. In his home life the young artist is all a good son should be. A thoughtful, generous and happy nature, is kind to everyone, and most modest about himself and his achievements. To this writer the most remarkable thing in Hochman's playing is his touch—most musical and admirably suited to the performance of an eclectic program. It has been said of him that he plays Beethoven and Liszt equally well. New Yorkers will hear young Hochman before the holidays, probably in the early part or middle of December, when he will make his début here with an orchestra.

Following are some of Hochman's German press notices:

In the small hall of the Saalbau a young pianist, Arthur Hochman, presented himself to the public here in a concert of his own. The young American, a pupil of Scharwenka and d'Albert, began, before a numerous audience, his program with the E major Sonata (op. 109) of Beethoven. While the passionate traits that glow throughout the piece were not brought clearly to light, yet the whole scheme in the concluding variation parts was rendered clearly and in beautiful configuration. In the theme of the variations the young concert-giver showed his strongest side. He has at his disposal a delicate touch, capable of modulation and singing power, which naturally was of the greatest advantage in the rendering of the charming C major Fantaisie (op. 17) of Schumann in its purely lyrical moments. The soloist proved himself to be an accomplished techniker, a well cultivated musician in the interesting execution of "Alceste, Caprice on Ballet Airs," by Saint-Saëns-Gluck, and a "Momento Capriccioso," by Weber, which he played very fluently and with beautiful musical feeling. The program comprised also three pieces by Chopin and solos by Scharwenka, Liszt and the concert-giver.—Frankfurter Nachrichten, December 2, 1900.

On the same evening a pianist already well known, Arthur Hochman, again appeared. This highly gifted, still very young man, who on previous occasions attracted attention by his technical mastery, revealed here musical abilities which open to him prospects of an extraordinary career. His conception, full of temperament, always bears the stamp of a strong personality, and is supported by an intonation which is exceedingly charming in the "piano" and never too hard in the "forte." The Chopin A flat major Polonaise was given rhythmically with conviction, but would have borne a quicker tempo. Surprisingly effective was his virtuoso octave technic in a staccato etude by Scharwenka. The concert-giver received enthusiastic applause, which led to several additions.—Berliner Tageblatt.

On the same evening Arthur Hochman gave a concert in the small hall. He is highly, even if not extraordinarily, endowed. His delicate and soft touch and the charm of his conception spoke for him. We are especially grateful to him for the performance of the C major Fantaisie by Schumann. We seldom have an opportunity to hear a good execution of this grand work.—Frankfurter Nachrichten.

A very promising pianist is Arthur Hochman. At his concert in the Bechstein Hall he did honor to his teacher, Xaver Scharwenka. He played with a real impulse of enthusiasm. It is not the flickering of superficial excitement, but an artistic, noble unfolding of temperament. The grand Sonata (op. 109) by Beethoven and the uncommonly difficult C major Fantaisie of Schumann received a very valuable rendering. May the young man go bravely forward on his path!—Morgen Post, Berlin.

We were introduced on Saturday to a gifted young pianist in the person of Arthur Hochman, who in the E major Sonata (op. 109) of Beethoven and in the grand Fantaisie (op. 17) of Schumann gave proof of an early matured artistic intelligence and dazzling technical ability. A remarkable capacity for modulation in his touch was especially to be noted.—Frankfurter Zeitung.

In the Bechstein Hall the young pianist, Arthur Hochman, gave a piano evening, in which I heard a part of the E major Sonata (op. 109) of Beethoven and Schumann's C major Fantaisie. As a promising "coming on" artist Hochman has been already appreciated by me on the occasion of his first appearance. It would be too much to say that we recognize in him an already perfect artistic maturity, yet we can justly praise the progress he has made in the interval. He has not yet passed the Sturm und Drang period, and his view of the whole of an art work must be sharpened and broadened. Let Hochman only work earnestly at his own internal development—in virtuoso technic even now there is nothing lacking—and there is no doubt that he will be reckoned as one of the called in his profession.—Boersen Courier.

A young pianist, a pupil of Xaver Scharwenka, played on Saturday evening at the Singakademie three piano concertos, the E flat major of Beethoven, the C sharp minor of Xaver Scharwenka and the E flat major of Liszt. A considerably developed technic, boldness in grasping the piano and genuine virtuoso "verve" in delivery are already to be signalized in the player.—Die Post, Berlin, December 13, 1899.

On Saturday an examination of the pupils of the Klindworth-Scharwenka Conservatory took place. Especially deserving of mention was the surprisingly virtuoso rendering of the Liszt E flat major concerto by the young American, Arthur Hochman, a pupil of Dr. Jedliczka; in tone it was full of modulation, in technic untiring and brilliant, in delivery piquant and impulsive.—Berliner Lokal Anzeiger.

At the examination concert of the Klindworth-Scharwenka Conservatory special praise must be given to a young American, Arthur Hochman, who executed with brilliant bravura the E flat major concerto of Liszt.—National Zeitung.

Contrary to my usual custom, I make mention of the performance of the Klindworth-Scharwenka Conservatory, in order to call attention to Arthur Hochman, of New York. This still very young man studied in his native city under Prof. Xaver Scharwenka, and afterward for five months in the conservatory under Dr. Jedliczka. His execution of the E flat major Concerto of Liszt was at least from a technical point of view an astounding performance, and likewise in regard to delivery the young man gave much more than could have been expected from his youth. Unless all anticipations fail, he will be an extraordinary artist.—Allgemeine Musik Zeitung (Otto Lessmann).

Pittsburg Receives Hochman with Enthusiasm.

PITTSBURG, October 20, 1901.—Arthur Hochman, the young Russian-American pianist, scored an immense success here last evening. He played the Liszt Concerto in E flat, with the Paur Symphony Orchestra, at the Exposition concert. The local critics were enthusiastic over the skill of the youthful virtuoso. Here are their opinions:

An admirable move was made by the Exposition Society in securing a pianist to mark the concluding concert of the greatest season the Exposition has known. The move is made more admirable by the fact that the artist is one who promises to be one of the most enjoyable of the army of pianists that have come to this country. The player in question is Arthur Hochman. Mr. Hochman is but twenty-one years old. His appearance at the Exposition last night was his first in this country as a virtuoso. His Russian birth showed in the spirit of his playing. Yet he has not a wild, ungoverned abandon, for his temperament is curbed by a most thorough technic which is rather at variance with his youthful appearance. His playing of the Liszt E flat Concerto evidenced the finished art of the lad and the promptings of genius, and he deserved the enthusiasm with which he was received. Mr. Hochman is to give a recital in Pittsburg Carnegie Music Hall November 26, and this is one of the instances wherein one may look forward to greater enjoyment than usually attends a piano recital. Emil Paur and his orchestra played the accompaniment splendidly.—Pittsburg Dispatch, October 20, 1901.

The performance of a young Russian pianist, Arthur Hochman, came as a surprise to all who heard him at the closing concert. With less laudation from press agents than most famous pianists who come this way, his playing compared favorably with them. He came upon Pittsburgers quietly and relying entirely upon his merit won the plaudits of the thousands who heard him. In the Liszt Concerto in E flat he undertook the translation of a work difficult and wonderful. He played to the accompaniment of the Paur Orchestra, and his coloring and thorough appreciation of the beautiful parts came as a real pleasure. He is truly a pianist of no mean calibre, virile and powerful, and withal a thinking musician whose execution serves as a vehicle for the real depth of his conception. He has a wonderful wrist and seemed to delight in rapid runs and trills. For an encore he played a Tschaikowsky number. In this he was not accompanied and gave a delightful rendition of the dainty music. His performance augurs well for his coming tour and Pittsburgers will welcome him at his concert here this winter.—The Pittsburg Leader.

A Russian boy pianist, Arthur Hochman, just returned from Europe, after a seven years' course of severe study under Scharwenka and D'Albert, made his début before a Pittsburg Exposition audience last evening. Two reasons he had for this: First, he desired the benefit of Emil Paur's fine orchestral accompaniment and, secondly, he considered the judgment of Pittsburg music lovers an important factor in the early days of his public career. A splendid Wissner grand piano had been sent on from New York especially for his use, and a magnificent audience was in attendance to listen to his performance thereon.

Modest and unassuming, Mr. Hochman, who is but twenty-one years of age, at once found favor with his listeners. His task was a performance of the Liszt E flat Concerto, and his reward was applause that was distinctly flattering.

Hochman's style is that of the refined musician who delights in grace and suavity. His color work in dainty passages is beautiful in the extreme, his wrist work in octave runs is marvelous, his scales are limpid and delicious, while his trills, especially those that fade into a whisper, and his spiccato effects are simply ravishing. But while in technic he is more than splendid, his tonal sketches in the whole are drawn with rather timid hand. But he is young, and surely with the maturity of years and resultant strength and power there will come the bold sweep of the brush, applied with vigor, brilliancy and dash.

For an encore Mr. Hochman played in most charming manner the dainty Tschaikowsky Berceuse.

A final word must apply to the superb accompaniment to the concerto as directed by Mr. Paur.—G. S., in Pittsburg Post.

One of the pretty features of the closing day was the final concert of Emil Paur's Philharmonic Orchestra. In commemoration of the closing day the director gave one of the best programs in his repertory, which was enjoyed by a great audience in the music hall. Arthur Hochman, the Russian boy pianist, made a great hit at his first appearance before a critical audience during the day.—Pittsburg Press.

A great pleasure was the piano solo played by Arthur Hochman, a highly gifted young Russian pianist. Hochman has studied with Scharwenka and Eugen d'Albert, two of the great masters, and does his playing reflected honor upon his teachers. He played the Concerto by Liszt in E flat with brilliant bravura and finished technic. His reception was most cordial.—(Translation) Pittsburg Volksblatt und Freiheits-Freund.

LEEDS, ENGLAND, MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

LEEDS, October 11, 1901.

WHEN Prof. Villiers Stanford was appointed conductor at Leeds, a post formerly held by Sir Arthur Sullivan, the English musical world expected something. We all knew that what is called the Royal College clique would be well represented. Parry (the English Bach) would be there; Coleridge Taylor, at one time the pet pupil of the Royal College, and Stanford himself, would not be left out of the programs. Of that we were certain. But we did not foresee that even the choice of principals would be affected, because such a thing is dead against all festival principles. "The Messiah" at Leeds with any other quartet than Madame Albani, Miss Ada Crossley, Ben Davies and Andrew Black (the oratorio quartet nowadays) was unthinkable. But this year at Leeds we have actually had a new soprano, Miss Agnes Nicholls (Royal College, of course). She is a clever young singer, with a pleasing, liquid quality of voice, but she has not had sufficient experience, and her intonation is often wobbly. Plunket Greene (of the Royal College clique) was also one of the principals during the festival, and John Coates, a tenor, who took the part of Claudio in Stanford's "Much Ado About Nothing," was rewarded for his services to Stanford & Co., Limited, with a festival engagement. It is difficult to make American readers understand how this strikes regular English festival goers. Hitherto none but the most eminent singers have been engaged at our big festivals; and worthy people in the provinces who have a musical orgy once in three years resent being fobbed off with a young singer who has yet his reputation to make.

But the influence of Stanford & Co. does not end here. A pianist was wanted—Leonard Borwick was the man. Leonard Borwick is a decent little artist who has a fixed idea that the modern piano ought to be either a harpsichord or a musical box, but if he had not been a personal friend of Stanford, Parry, Fuller, Maitland & Co. (to give the firm its full title) he would not have been chosen for the Leeds Festival. Then dear old Joachim was given a lift—Joachim has always been the idol of the set. Well, I do not quarrel with that idolatry, except that the mouthpiece of the firm in the press would have us believe that Joachim is still what he once was. But the cream of the joke is to come. Someone had the brilliant idea of representing music of the nineteenth century at this festival, because it is the first in the twentieth century. At first blush this has a stupidly disingenuous air. But look how the string pans out! Professor Stanford is not a fool. He knows well enough that the musical world is beginning to kick against the ring made by his firm. So he set to work to include compositions by all the eminent British composers.

That seems laudable enough. But you must remember that the pride of Leeds is its chorus; it is, or was, almost entirely a choral festival. Now who are the British composers whose works have been performed? Coleridge-Taylor, represented by a new work, "The Blind Girl of Castel-Cuillé." Coleridge Taylor is Royal College. Stanford put down his "Last Post," one of the best things he has done since "The Revenge." Parry chose his "A Song of Darkness and Light," and the other choral work by a native composer was "A Dirge for Two Veterans," by Dr. Charles Wood, another dependent of Stanford & Co., Limited. Edward Elgar, by far the most original and gifted of living British composers, was represented by an orchestral work; Sullivan by his "In Memoriam" overture alone; Mackenzie by his "Columbia" Prelude and Cowen by his comparatively trifling "Endymion" scena. Edward German was only allowed to conduct the prelude of his "Romeo and Juliet" suite. Consequently we must draw the conclusion that Stanford & Co., Limited, are of opinion that these composers cannot write choral music, and that only those of the Royal College set can.

You may have some idea of the bitterness of which Leeds has been the stage from the opening of the festival on Wednesday, October 9, to its close on Saturday, October 12. Not only has Stanford managed to set professional musicians and composers by the ear, but he has, I hear, entirely lost the sympathy of the chorus. Now, a Leeds chorus is an opinionated body, and it is by no means always justified in its judgments. Thus when Stanford insisted on rehearsing bits of "The Messiah," many of the sturdy Yorkshire singers exclaimed, "What is the —— adoing? We could teach him sommat about 'The Messiah.'" In this they showed the pighcadedness which is gradually making our choral singing a by-word. But when they claim that they are the feature of the festival, and should have been given more to do, they are in the right.

Apart from all this I must emphatically state that Stanford has not shown the powers of conductorship which would justify his appointment. He is practically an amateur conductor. In the old days he directed the Bach Choir until he killed it; now he has the Royal College Orchestra to practice on, and often quite excellent orchestral performances are given at Kensington Gore; and of recent years he has a couple of seasons or so as conductor of the Leeds Philharmonic Society. He has done better than I had expected; but then I did not expect much. In the old days we had to accuse him of dragging everything. He has turned over a new leaf and now is inclined to rush along at an absurdly quick tempo. Parts of "The Messiah" were metamorphosed into comic opera. The press partner of the firm, the critic of the Times, has declared that these quick tempi have the authority of the Dublin tradition. No learned Händelian to whom I have applied for information (as I am not a Händel enthusiast) knows anything of that Dublin tradition. Nor could anyone but the Times critic defend the additional organ accompaniments played at Leeds together with the Mozart accompaniments. The performance was Stanford & Co.'s latest line in Händel, cut on the famous Royal College pattern, for the Royal College, as I have shown, knows all about choral music. The firm admitted many numbers and restored one, "Let All the Angels of God Worship Him," which is generally omitted. But the omissions included the famous "And He Shall Purify!" Then there was a bit of jugglery to suit someone in authority at Leeds—a sensible firm must adopt a policy of give and take. "He Shall Feed His Flock" and "Come Unto Him" are generally divided between the soprano and the contralto. At Leeds both were given to a soprano, Miss Ethel Woods, who is of Yorkshire birth. So for once we had two sopranos in "The Messiah." I do not know Miss Ada Crossley's views of this innovation, but I can imagine it. The Times said Professor Stanford's conducting was "beautiful" and perfect in every way, but in "The Messiah" and right through the festival he has conducted with a dry nonchalance that has made it a week of torture to my ears.

The Town Hall at Leeds is too small for the chorus of 300 odd and the orchestra of 125. All the week we have listened to a volume of sound almost paralyzing in its intensity. Stanford does not believe in expression in music; to be emotional would be to prove himself one of the common, vulgar herd. He is a university don at heart, and ought to have entered some less bohemian profession than music. The Verdi Requiem (the Royal College, once dead set on Brahms, now admit Verdi, whose boisterous energy probably acts as a tonic) was blatant beyond all endurance. The choir sang finely—you can have no conception of what these Yorkshire singers are if you have not heard them—but without any ebb and flow or elasticity of expression. The same fault was to be found with the finale of Act I. of "Parsifal." The orchestra was terribly coarse and blurred, and the choruses of knights were beefy. The only tolerable feature of the performance was Mr. Bispham's singing of Amfortas' agony. To-morrow I am to hear Bach's "Sleepers, Wake!" and Beethoven's Mass in D. I would have shaken the dust of Leeds off my feet had I not heard that the chorus is exceptionally fine in these works. I do not expect much, for our vaunted choral singers of the provinces have quite a virtuoso idea of singing. They are full of energy and like to give full play to their lung power. Of poetic intelligence there is not a trace, and under Stanford's baton they have been more belligerent than ever.

Of Stanford as orchestral conductor a few words will suffice. He has no idea of dominating his instrumentalists. He knows his scores and is a fine musician in his way, but he seems to have no idea of what an orchestra—and such a fine orchestra it was, too—can do. One instance will be enough—Schumann's Symphony in D minor. From the first bar to the last the performance was coarse and uneven, and you know what that means with Schumann's scoring. Even the beautiful Romanze was wooden and dry, and the Scherzo clumsy in its exaggerated ruggedness. What could be done with the orchestra was shown to-night when Edward Elgar conducted his "Enigma Variations," the best piece of orchestral music by a native composer. The novelties were few and one could have wished them even fewer. Coleridge Taylor's "The Blind Girl of Castél-Cuillé," a setting of Longfellow's poem, is a bad imitation of his own successful "Song of Hiawatha." The barbaric rhythm, coarse Royal College scoring, the snappy little themes popping in and out like rabbits in their holes at sunset—all are there; but there is not the invention of "Hiawatha." It is deadly dull, turgid stuff written to continue a success. Mr. Coleridge Taylor is clever, but he has outwritten himself, and had better pause for inspiration.

After all, it is necessary to have something to say in music. Joachim's "Marfa" scena, composed for his wife (why did he allow it to be done at Leeds), is not bad in its Weberish style, and Frau Joachim must have edited the score; the music is very effective for the voice, as Miss Brema showed us. Dr. Charles Wood's setting of Walt Whitman's "A Dirge for Two Veterans" is imaginative, tasteful music, simple in contour and quite an interpretation of the poem. But it lacks just the one essential thing—tune. I cannot quite understand why these things are written. The poem is impressive in itself, and gains no new impressiveness from its musical setting. Glazounov—ah, again I must explain. Glazounov has written a symphony—his sixth—which has quite taken the fancy of the Royal College in its renaissance mood for the bizarre. Mr. Maitland thinks it one of the finest of modern symphonies. It is really Tschaikowsky and water. So Glazounov was asked for a choral work, none of the Royal College set have one ready, I suppose. The Russian sent his "Memorial Cantata," which was written to celebrate the centenary of Pushkin, the Russian poet. It is a very simple, naïve, diatonic work with one or two nice little bits of orchestration. Quite a Sunday school choir sort of thing—only the modern orchestra is required. The novelties have certainly been disappointing. I don't know what I have gained by my week at Leeds. The noise of the chorus—the sopranos are strong enough to raise the dead—and the blatant orchestral playing have unstrung my nerves. I have learned one thing from this and the Birmingham festivals—unless a new school of chorus master arises choral singing in this country is doomed, except as a local form of art. The choristers are musical enthusiasts—many of them mechanics. They will go to work at 6 a. m. and leave off at 6 p. m.; hurry off to their festival choral rehearsals and wind up the evening by singing glees at a favorite tavern. There are hundreds of glee societies in Leeds and Yorkshire generally and very beautiful are the performances. The chairman of the evening is often a burly blacksmith with a Yorkshire dialect which is quite unintelligible, and one I heard has a voice which made the glasses on the table ring.

There is plenty of musical talent and enthusiasm here; but the art of choral singing stands where it did fifty years ago. These Leeds singers are all virtuosi and have no idea of modern poetry of expression. They could be taught and must be taught if choral composition is to remain a vital art of to-day. EDWARD A. BAUGHAN.

IT looks as if Howard Ticknor is to become the critic of music of the Boston Herald—a post that has been vacant since the death of Ben Woolf.

THERE is no connection whatsoever between a paper in London called the London Musical Courier and THE MUSICAL COURIER of New York, though certain persons have been endeavoring to confuse the interests of the latter and the one published but not read in London.

NOW that the musical season is about to open let managers and artists remember the value of time as it is regulated by the clocks of the universe. Concerts advertised to begin at 8:15 should begin at that hour and not at 8:40, as is so frequently the case. Those who give afternoon recitals are often great offenders in disregarding the matter of beginning on time. It should be remembered that public concerts and recitals are not amateur affairs or social functions.

MR. MARC A. BLUMENBERG and Mr. Otto Floersheim arrived here from Europe on Sunday, Mr. Floersheim coming on a visit after an absence of nine years, during which he has become a permanent resident of Berlin as representative of THE MUSICAL COURIER. Mr. Floersheim's friends will be glad to welcome him during his stay here, the length of which has not yet been decided.

Mr. Blumenberg has been visiting the leading musical centres of Europe, with the exception of those cities to which Mr. Huneker has been paying attention; the latter will be here end of next week.

All the offices of THE MUSICAL COURIER in Europe have again been visited by Mr. Blumenberg, and important arrangements made for an increased circulation of the paper on the other side of the Atlantic. It can now be seen and purchased at all leading news stands, agencies and kiosks in Central and Western Europe. It is the only musical paper in the world in general circulation and to be found on news stands.

THE London Times publishes every morning a reprint of its items published exactly on the same day one hundred years ago. On October 7, 1901, it published the following from its issue of October 7, 1801:

Theatricals.—In the year 1728, Miss Fenton, one of the most admired singers of her time, and afterwards Duchess of Bolton, thought herself greatly flattered by Rich, the manager, who gave her a salary of thirty shillings a week, amounting to about forty-five pounds for the season!

In the year 1801, a singer is thought worthy of an arbitration between two rival managers, contending who shall have her at the rate of four thousand pounds the season, and a clear benefit!

It is Mrs. Crawford, the representative of her late husband, Mr. Barry, that has put in a claim upon the Dublin Theatre, which has prevented Mr. Holman's bargain.

In the year 1901 a New York opera manager pays one of his singers £20,000, or $100,000, for an American season. In the year 2001, if geometrical ratios of progression continue, there will be no money left to purchase tickets to hear singers.

ONE of the things that turn up regularly in the "silly season" is Who wrote the "Marseillaise"? Karl Blind started this year in the English review the Nineteenth Century, and since then German patriots and French chauvinists are at war once more, and finally a lady, who is neither one nor the other, has discussed the question. She tries to reconcile the two theories of the Germans who refuse to acknowledge Rouget de Lisle as the author. One of these theories is that the melody is that of a Credo in a Mass in G major, composed by a certain Holzmann at Meersburg on the Bodensee, who in 1776 was capellmeister for the Palatine Elector. This theory was supported by the French critic, Castel Blazé. Then comes the second theory that a certain J. B. L. Grison wrote the tune for some words out of Racine's "Esther." But when did he write his "Stances de la Calomnie"? Moreover, Grison in all his other works stole whatever he could find, and as he did not die till 1815 may well have stolen the air of the "Marseillaise." Now comes the biographer of Musset, Arvede Barine, and she suggests that the plagiarist Grison took the air from the apocryphal mass of the unknown Holzmann, and that Rouget de Lisle stole it from Grison. The trouble about all this theorizing is that Rouget wrote the words of the "Marseillaise" beyond all dispute, and that the music suits the words to perfection, while it is inconceivable as church music. Dr. Hermann Abert, who has been writing about "national hymns," throws over the Grison theory and the Holzmann theory, and comes, for no conceivable reason except that all good things must come from professionals, to the conclusion that Rouget, an officer of engineers, who was a dilettante musician as well as a dilettante poet, must have stolen the tune from somebody.

What a pity it is for a non-professional to write anything popular! What a pity it is for anybody to write one good thing and no more!

A PERFECT newspaper has never yet been published, as the maxim of newspaper men goes; that is to say, a paper which must be hurried, "rushed" off the press, in order to appear on time, and still embody the latest news, must necessarily be imperfect, typographically speaking. This is no excuse or apology for the many rank errors that have recently appeared in THE MUSICAL COURIER; it is merely an explanation, for it may reasonably be understood that the apology exists anterior to the errors themselves. We make this explanation not because of former blunders, but because of late the number of elisions, misspellings and typographical misrepresentations have been too palpable for further silence, as witness the case of the recent letter sent to this paper by Henry Pierson, the manager of the Berlin Royal Opera, and which on appearance in these columns made of him a Henry Fiessor. When such an error occurs it is about time to suspend publication for a while in order to take a long and reflecting breath.

The Berlin criticisms of a young artist were reproduced a month ago in this paper, and in the introductory remarks it was stated that they were literal translations. That is, such was the original intention, when, lo and behold, we said that they were "liberal" translations. We have not yet heard from the artist on this little error.

Mr. Huneker's Bayreuth articles were full of typographical transgressions, and he writes from Paris that he can never again return to Bayreuth to face the musical authorities, in view of such fearful and fearless tergiversations as are made to appear. This will be a severe blow to Mr. Huneker, but he must try to recover from it before the "Parsifal" rights become invalidated.

There seems no way out of this difficulty. Years ago the San Francisco Argonaut made an honest confession to its readers regarding the then limited number of subscribers it had, referring to the literary and journalistic value of the paper and concluding that it probably did not understand its constituency. We can make no complaints on that score, but we are justified in assuming that our numerous readers are among the most intelligent people on earth, being musically intelligent, which necessarily embraces universal intelligence, and we cannot meekly pass by these errors without confessing our own discomfiture. We feel better now, but it would not surprise us to find blunders even in this reference to the subject, for a typographically perfect newspaper cannot be produced, and this is a newspaper.

SCHUMANN AS A MUSIC CRITIC.

EVERY thoughtful reader of musical literature must be impressed with both the quality and quantity of Schumann's contributions. Epigrammatic, eloquent and always sincerely honest were his musical reviews, and as for his words of advice to young composers, performers and students, they have passed into proverbs, to the joy of some writers of the day, who sometimes find it a pleasure to pen an essay on a text by Robert Schumann. Future generations will recognize the power and inspiration which forced Schumann to write and speak as he did. Those select and exclusive intellectual circles where the members prate about the ignorance, or rather self-centred narrowness, of musicians will find in Schumann enough philosophical and literary thoughts to endow a legion of fifth-rate authors, painters and scientists. Schumann dissected the great composers before his own day as no other musician has ever been able to do. From Schumann we may truly learn how divinely gifted were such men as Bach, Beethoven and Schubert. Indeed, while the pigmies belittle Mendelssohn, Schumann went in raptures over some of the works of the Hamburg-Berlin composer, thus administering a needed rebuke to the faint hearts who love Mendelssohn, but are afraid to admit it for fear of being considered puerile in their musical inclinations.

Could anything be finer than this Schumann estimate of Bach?

"The unsurpassable Bach knew a million times more than all the rest of us put together."

Another Schumann tribute to the father of German music reads:

"In my opinion Bach is incomparably incommensurable."

And here is a third tribute that is wonderfully true:

"We are never at an end with Bach; he seems to grow more profound the oftener he is heard."

That a critic and analyzer of Schumann's greatness should write eloquently of Beethoven is not strange. In this classic language the great German romanticist writes of the Bonn master:

"Beethoven! How much lies in that word! In the deep tones of the syllables there seems to sound a presentiment of immortality. I even think no other written characters but these would suit his name."

Bach, Mozart and Beethoven are included in this gem of a paragraph:

"Where there is genius, it does not much matter in what manner it appears—whether in the depth, as in Bach, or in the height, as in Mozart, or whether alike in depth and in height, as in Beethoven."

The literary student will find in such expressions the symmetry and proportion which make prose-poetry. A word, by the way, should be said for the translators. These diligent workers must have faithfully studied the best style in both the German and English, for the Schumann quotations, which abound in the musical literature of England and the United States, show rare skill in the writing over from the one language into the other.

That Schumann considered men in the other arts as much in need of advice as musicians was clear when he wrote:

"A cultivated musician may study Raphael's Madonnas with as much profit as a painter may study Mozart symphonies."

"In the art of sculpture even a torso is enough to reveal the master, while in music coherence and completeness are indispensable in every individual composition, however small."

To the painstaking the above two paragraphs will read like a sermon. Schumann's literary expressions, at almost every turn, seem aimed at the ambitious composer and performer and as for music students, they were eternally in his mind. Who does not appreciate the force of this opinion?

"To master an art requires a lifetime, and early training is not neglected with impunity."

Not one of the modern essayists who have written a chapter on Schumann neglect to relate the story of Schumann's visit to Schubert's brother in Vienna, and how Schumann was instrumental in having the manuscripts left by the modest Franz Schubert published and performed. As a composer Schumann has grown greatly since his tragic death. If some of the fools are yet alive who declared Schumann a second-rate composer they must know by this time how blindly and stupidly they studied his compositions. As a literary man and music critic the lustre of Schumann's fame is growing, and those who love him as a composer reverence him also for his rare literary gifts and sterling honesty. Schumann's criticisms were never weakened by dogmatic and egotistical trimmings, and never, never did he create the impression that the critic was a greater personage than the composer or the performer. As a critic Schumann was first of all sympathetic, then analytical and then patient in the writing. The freshness of his style shows him to be a man who regarded the work of a critic as a sacred duty—a duty that should not be entered into unless the man was in the proper mood for the task of writing an intelligent and unbiased opinion.

Young composers who feel that they did not receive just treatment from the critics will find food for thought and solace in their disappointment by reading over this advice from Schumann:

"Never judge a composition on a first hearing, for what pleases extremely at first is not always the best. The works of great masters require study."

WAGNER AND "LOHENGRIN" AGAIN.

THE letter addressed by Richard Wagner to Adolf Stahr, lately published in THE MUSICAL COURIER, has naturally given rise to many comments. In this letter to his friend Wagner states that he had "written a couple of lines to Liszt that if it amused him he might put 'Lohengrin' in rehearsal at Weimar," and adds that when it had been performed at Weimar "it vexed me that 'Lohengrin' had ever been produced." This letter is dated May 31, 1851, when he was living near Zurich.

In Vol. I., pp. 54 and 55, of the correspondence between Liszt and Wagner, there is a letter dated Paris, April 21, 1850, about a twelvemonth earlier, marked by a very different tone, and it is far from being a "couple of lines" written "gutmüthig," but a heartrending cry of entreaty: "Dear friend, I have just read a bit of my score of 'Lohengrin.' I almost never read my work, but now an immense longing flames up in me to see it performed. I now lay my entreaty to your heart. Produce my 'Lohengrin'! You are the only one to whom I would address this entreaty. I trust to nobody but to you the creation of this opera, and I hand it over to you with the fullest, most joyful confidence. Produce it where you like, even if it is only in Weimar! I am sure you will employ all possible and necessary means for that end, and nobody will deny you anything. Produce my 'Lohengrin,' and let his coming into life be your work!" Here is no talk that "wenn es eben Spass mache" Liszt might produce it at Weimar, not a hint that the composer thought his work a mere trifle, but on the contrary an urgent, pathetic cry for aid. So much was Wagner's heart and soul set on having the piece performed and seeing the first performance that he had resolved to visit Weimar incognito to see the first representation, in spite of the danger he would run of being arrested and finding himself in jail as a political "suspect," and Liszt had some trouble in dissuading him from this rash enterprise. Wagner, although unable to be present, took the utmost interest in the studying of "Lohengrin," the smallest details did not escape him, he gave hints as to the tempi, as to little changes; in fact he took much care about the performance. When it had taken place Wagner could not find words adequate enough to express his overpowering gratitude. See the dedication which he inscribed to Liszt on the score of "Lohengrin"!

The difference between the two letters is striking, and may most easily be explained by the fact that men who have made a success often forget or belittle the means by which they gained it. Some people may call this ingratitude; but George Münzer defends Wagner from this charge, at all events in this case, by attributing the change of tone to the emotional condition which he was in when the letter to Stahr was written. He had just completed "Siegfried," and was in the first glow of creative rapture; he wrote on the day, perhaps the very hour, when he had penned the last lines, and felt that he had far surpassed all his previous work. In such a moment of enthusiasm the artist temperament might easily express itself, especially in a private hurried letter, in the terms that Wagner used.

The remarkable thing in the letter, however, is his description of "Lohengrin" as a "cast off skin," the sight of which was "painful." At that time he was going back from "Siegfried" to the Holy Grail, and the Christian notions which he tried to read into "Lohengrin" seemed feeble by comparison with "Parsifal." In fact, an old fairy tale, into which Christian notions are foisted, necessarily seemed feeble to the concocter of a parody on the Christian history. The story of "Lohengrin" is, we know, a mere variant of the Cupid and Psyche story in Apuleius, of Melusina and Raymond in the French romance, of countless other tales having the same motif in all parts of the world, the latest being the "Rautendelein" of Gerhard Hauptmann, and to talk of Lohengrin being the impersonation of Faith is mere nonsense. Wagner himself gives another interpretation of the legend. According to this Lohengrin is bringing to mankind the blessings of art, and in place of understanding and love finds only doubt. This seems perilously like saying that Lohengrin is an unsuccessful Wagner, whom the world will not take at his own valuation. Poor Elsa deserves our sympathy. She was a sensible young woman, and was well rid of a husband who would not tell her where he came from, so little faith in her had he.

MEININGEN ORCHESTRA.

THE orchestra at Meiningen, Germany, which was at one time under the direction of Hans von Bülow, and whose present director is Fritz Steinbach, will give 80 performances this coming season, including those at home. The tours will cover Berlin, with 6 concerts; Frankfurt, 4; Eisenach, 6; Erfurt, 5; Gotha, 4; Hildburghausen, 3; Göttingen, 2; Halle, 2; Cassel, 2; Switzerland cities a number, and cities in Austria are also included in the tour. A number of concerts will also be given in the "course" of the New Symphony Concerts at the Opéra Comique, Paris.

When we reflect on the 120 Nikisch orchestral concerts, the concerts of Colonne and his orchestra on tour, the Kaim traveling orchestral concerts and then the permanent orchestral events in the leading German cities we can well understand how and why Germany is so thoroughly musical, and why its musical knowledge is so temperate, so well balanced, so artistic and so progressive.

London Season.

LONDON, October 10, 1901.

ALL indications point to a season here which will introduce new musical forces and bring before the public personalities hitherto unknown, and it is about time, too, to give young blood an opportunity for circulation. Without disparaging anyone, and with a due respect for all that has been done by certain singers still before the public (which has rewarded these artists munificently), I think it about time for some of them to be retired. Madame Patti has acquired millions through her exquisite art, but there is no reason why she should sing when nature has stepped in to stop the vocal apparatus, and it does seem entirely out of the modern spirit to listen to "Home, Sweet Home," and "Comin' Through the Rye" instead of hearing Brahms, Franz, Schumann and Schubert. The concert stage on which Madame Patti continues to appear is the forum for these songs and for the beautiful, rarely sung Italian arias, the songs of Cimarosa, Mercadante, Pergolese and their modern followers. So long as Madame Patti does insist upon singing, why, then, does she not give out to the world the hidden beauties of the classical and romantic song; why does she insist upon singing that which the musical intelligence rejects except for the very purposes for which it is created? Patti and Albani should now make way for young singers, for young women with a vocal apparatus who must secure opportunities to be heard before their organs also lose their vitality. Patti and Albani are now singing here in England, and this letter is dated 1901. The one has been before the public 45 years; the other 38 years. In the interim many good singers have become disconsolate, and rightly so, because Patti and Albani were both extraordinarily excellent singers; but how many years during the twentieth century are they to continue their vain efforts to sing with broken voices, and thus withhold from young singers the chances they are entitled to?

The same argument applies to Lili Lehmann, who is to visit the United States again, after having demonstrated several years ago that her vocal cords are wasted. And why not? An artist like Lehmann, after such herculean work as she has been doing, is not expected to sing. Howling, screaming and bellowing—the forces that must be applied to accomplish work after the vocal cords have been worn—is not singing. The matron on the concert stage should give way to the young woman, if not the maiden.

ROBINSON ANNOUNCEMENTS.

The Concert Direction Ethel L. Robinson gives out important announcements for this season. I propose to classify them, to show what is done by a few London managers only, and this will be followed up by the announcements later on of others:

Soldat Ladies' Quartet, Vienna—Marie Soldat, first violin; Elsa von Plank, second violin; Bauer-Lechner, viola, and Lucy Campbell, 'cello—will give four concerts at St. James' Hall, October 31, November 11, 14 and 26, and Leonard Borwick will be one of the soloists.

At Bechstein Hall the chamber concerts of the Wessely Quartet are booked for October 30 and November 25. Hans Wessely is first violin.

Miss Marie Busch and Miss Marie Motto give a vocal and violin recital at Bechstein Hall November 1.

Miss Margaret Vereker and the Saltaire Prize Choir (I have not the first idea what a Prize Choir is) give a concert on November 2. (Maybe a Prize Choir gives prizes.)

The Wietrowitz Quartet gives a chamber concert on November 4. Fräulein Wietrowitz is the first violin, Miss Margaret Wild is at the piano and J. Campbell McInness will do some songs.

On Monday, November 4, Mlle. Ella Spravka gives a piano recital and Plunket Greene is engaged to sing.

Fräulein Wietrowitz, on November 7, will recite on the violin, and Montague Fordham, whose name is euphonious, will sing along.

Then on November 28 Lilian Hovey will give a recital vocal, and Miss Ethel Barns, who is a violinist, will play on the violin. This same Miss Barns and Charles Phillips will give four chamber music concerts, and Lily Henkel will be the pianist at one of them, while at others Miss Isabel Hirschfeld, pianist, and Miss Constance Vipan, 'cellist, will appear. All these events are to take place at Bechstein Hall.

Sterling MacKinlay, assisted by Mme. Antoinette Sterling, with recitations by Mrs. Kendal, will appear at St. James' Hall.

Olive Rae and Sydney Poyser give a concert December 2 at Bechstein Hall, and on December 3, at Ada Wright's Piano Recital, Maud Powell, the violinist, will be heard. Miss Marjorie Lutyens also gives a piano recital at Bechstein Hall on December 5.

The Joachim Quartet concerts at St. James' Hall are dated April 26, 28; May 2, 5, 8, 12 and 15.

These are just a part of the many concerts and performances to be given by the Concert-Direction Ethel L. Robinson, or under its management.

Why do I give these programs in extenso? B cause they illustrate the art of combining classic and popular works by a careful method that giv such preponderance to the classical, education features of the scheme as to make them worthy repetition elsewhere. It is a most difficult task f a conductor to accomplish, such an equilibrium f a limited number of concerts, but Mr. Wood d serves unusual commendation for balancing abo 60 to 80 such programs following night upon nigl

MARK HAMBOURG.

It will be observed that Mark Hambourg figur prominently in these concerts. The demand for H playing has grown so rapidly in London, as ev denced by crowded houses, that he can appear will and attract a paying audience. On Tuesd he played the Rubinstein D minor Concerto a swept the audience off its feet—for they stand the pit at Queen's Hall—and his recital on Satu day, October 19, is sold out. This is his progra on that afternoon:

Faschingsschwank.....Schum
Sonata Appassionata, op. 57.....Beetho
Nocturne, E major.....Cho
Polonaise, B flat major.....Cho

Barcarolle, G major.....Rubins
Wedding March.....Mendelssohn-H

CRYSTAL PALACE.

The scheme at Crystal Palace became somnole and Mr. Robert Newman had to be called in t awaken it, the 46th series, as the present is e merated, being now under his management. S Saturday afternoon concerts are announced. M Henry J. Wood and his orchestra form the inst mental nucleus, with the following soloists, who will be heard during the series;

Vocalists	Madam Alice Estey. Miss Florence Schmidt. Mrs. Henry J. Wood. Mme. Marian McKenzie. James Leyland. Watkin Mills.
Piano	Mark Hambourg. Signor F. Busoni. Mme. Janotha.
Violin	Mme. Von Stosch. Nadia Sylva (beautiful name). Eugen Ysaye.
Cello	Hugo Becker
Organist	Percy Pitt

Signor Busoni will give a Piano Recital November 9, and on the 16th of November Busoni, Ysaye and Becker appear as soloists. The Crystal Palace Concerts draw entirely distinct audiences, geographically speaking, from those at Queen's Hall. The area of London and its population—some seven millions, including the suburbs—justify many concerts no other city could give, and by concerts I do not mean débutant concerts, which are given by the débutant who pays for them; I mean concerts where admission is paid—just as we give them in America.

Other Events.

Mr. Newman has additional concerts and musical affairs under his regimen than those already mentioned and the Promenades referred to previously. For instance:

November 22.—Sullivan's "Golden Legend," Queen's Hall.
December 12—Mendelssohn's "Elijah," Queen's Hall.
November 7—Ysaye-Busoni Recital, Queen's Hall.
November 29—Scotch concert, Queen's Hall.
December 25—Christmas concert, Queen's Hall.
January 1—New Year's concert, Queen's Hall.
Five concerts—November 16, 23, 30; December 7, 14, Royal Albert Hall.
Busoni Recitals—November 29, December 10, Queen's Hall.
Lemare Organ Recitals—November 13, 20, 28; December 4, 11, Queen's Hall.
Etc., etc., etc.

Now, Then.

In addition to all these musical events come many concerts at St. James' Hall, at Steinway Hall, at Salle Erard and many, not mentioned above, at Bechstein Hall, and now, then, I ask, Why is it that such a tremendous activity exists in the London concert field and why can and why do singers and instrumentalists find such a market? It is simply an economic question; that's all. Place into London an opera season under fashionable dominion running 16 to 18 consecutive weeks and these numerous concerts will at once dwindle to less than one-half. Each and every community has a certain and a limited amount of money at command for music, and if that is paid out for an opera season the concert season must become the sufferer, and vice versa. In New York such concert activity is impossible, because at the very start $1,500,000 is spent on opera and the opera artists during the season; the short spring season in London is an insignificant financial affair in comparison; but place our New York opera season into London and have the opera artists occupied in addition with concert work and it will end the activity of the London concert stage.

With the Grand Opéra and the Opéra Comique in Paris open during the greater part of the year, concerts are completely effaced as compared with London.

In Berlin the great majority of concert-givers pay to be heard. In Paris they usually sing or play at concerts without receiving a fee, and if a fee is paid it is absurdly small.

Is it now seen that this paper has not only been right but also just in its opposition to the foreign high salary system? If we would abandon the system we would kindle a musical life in this community which would place us in the very first rank of musical cities in the world, and artists and débutants would then seek New York first for indorsement, and not come to New York—à la Patti, Lehmann and others—when they have become passé. The foreign opera scheme is the one impediment that prevents the logical progress of musical art in America, and every American musician—native born and resident both—is personally interested in emancipating the country from the vicious influence of this foreign growth, which constantly and consistently destroys the inner musical consciousness of the people.

Mr. Mayer.

It cannot be denied that compliments paid directly to the editors of this paper on the strength of the universal influence and distribution and excellence of the publication are, as a matter of course, pleasant to listen to; but they are as the zephyr to the tornado when compared with the indirect compliments lavished upon us, particularly when we are not expected to hear of them. I cannot leave Europe without referring to this, because of the many reports brought to me by artists, publishers, managers and journalists to whom Daniel Mayer, of the London Erard house, has spoken in the most flattering terms regarding The Musical Courier. I am quite sure that Mr. Mayer never for a moment believed, when he said what he has said, that it would ever reach my ears, and yet in nearly every case the lady or the gentleman would manage to hunt me up and tell me how effusive Mr. Mayer was in his indorsement and in his praise of The Musical Courier.

This gives me the opportunity therefore to return the compliment (of course, without Mr. Mayer's previous knowledge), and to say that, judging from what I have heard recently in London, he may soon stand for Parliament, with excellent chances for election, for at Bexhill, where his residence is, he is among the local officials already. Soon after Mr. Mayer's conversion from Judaism he became a deacon, and can be seen now on Sundays passing the hat, but it is not this which has caused his fellow citizens to ask him to become an M. P. I hear that there are many Jews among M. P.'s, and at one time as high as 26 members of Parliament were chosen people, both by the Lord and the British elector. The fact that a man is a Jew has never interfered with his progress in the country of which Benjamin Disraeli was Prime Minister and creator of the Crown of the Empire of India. They look to the real worth of the man and not to traditional surgery in pushing a citizen forward, just as we do in the Union, and therefore Mr. Mayer as a Jew had as much chance as will have Mr. Mayer as an Episcopalian.

It would be a splendid triumph to see the former clerk of a Brighton music store stand up in the House of Commons and deliver a speech on—well, let us say "The National Support of the Musical Establishment," and providing pianos for Orphan Asylums, Hospitals, Sailors' Homes, Schools, Insane and Inebriate Homes, Alms Houses and Synagogues, the same to be paid out of the surplus of the Budget at the end of each three months, beginning after the War is over. Mr. Mayer would not urge his bill until the return of the Volunteers, I am sure. But it all lies with him. He may refuse to stand, and if he does I am sure that the combined music trade of Great Britain, among whom he has not one enemy, will demand his acceptance of the honor, as an honor to the trade, and Mr. Mayer will then for once eliminate his usual altruism and do something in his own interests, even if force is required to compel him.

Nellie.

Madame Melba's movements are always of interest, and her visit to the Duchess of Abercorn and Lady Rossmore in Ireland tells of her latest whereabouts. She remains with them until the 18th of October, when she leaves for Belfast to sing in Ulster Hall. She is to sing a new song which Rossini is to write for her to be called "Una Voce," &c., Bishop's "Lo the Genteel Lark," and a song by the young composer Arditi. She is engaged to sing in Liverpool October 22; Brighton, October 25; Birmingham, November 25, and will appear in opera in February at Monte Carlo. If a great vocalist like Melba were to sing a modern concert repertory what a stimulus it would be for all the vocal world!

The Critics.

The London critics are comparatively unknown outside of the town, and their modesty, while it is becoming, places them at considerable disadvantage. In the inner, select and, I may say, sacred circles they are naturally known, but the world at large is unconscious of the personality of the men who make up the total of insular criticism in Europe. Mr. Chester, who represents this paper in England and France, suggests that a series of biographical sketches be arranged, together with the portraits, for publication in this paper, so that the musical world will know more than it does regarding this valiant band of brethren, who tell us what they think of the musical movement, and who are relatively as little recognized as those of whom they write are in inverse ratio recognized by them. Mr. Chester will attend to this matter, and no doubt the first to appear will be the portrait of the doyen, Mr. Joseph Bennett, of the Telegraph.

BLUMENBERG.

Klindworth-Scharwenka Conservatory.

THE final examination of the summer term of the Klindworth-Scharwenka Conservatory, held in Bechstein Hall, Berlin, September 27, had satisfactory results. The piano classes of Herrn Ansorge, Xaver and Philipp Scharwenka and Mayer Mahr were each represented in a number of the program. The singing classes of Herr Goldschmidt and Frl. Lena Beck brought forward three already very advanced pupils, of which Frl. Doering distinguished herself as a coloratura singer of remarkable flexibility, brilliant technic and pleasing delivery. The violinists Herrn Grünberg and Zaps contributed to the success of the day by their excellent performances.

Mlle. Esthon.—Mlle. Esthon, a young singer of whom excellent things are expected, has this summer been singing with much success at the fashionable summer resorts of St. Malo, Paramé, &c., in the North of France. Mlle. Esthon is still in her teens, being barely eighteen, and is a pupil of the teacher Haslam, of Paris, who predicts a successful career for her, and is being specially trained by him for opera and concert. The singer is said to have a good telling voice, coupled with an attractive face and figure; is an accomplished musician, having, like Sembrich, appeared when a child as a pianist, and sings excellently in English, besides French and Italian. It is owing to her fluency in the former language that her master, Haslam, is also perfecting her in an English repertory, as it is intended that she will sing later in London. Mlle. Esthon will shortly make her appearance in Paris.

Mary Fidelia Burt.—Miss Mary Fidelia Burt, author of "New Method of Sight Singing for Staff," "Ear Training and Musical Stenography," "Musical Comprehension" (theoretical and historical), and "Rhythmical Development and Singing for Kindergarten," has resumed her teaching at 1202 Carnegie Hall, and at her home studio, 48 Lefferts place, Brooklyn. Miss Burt will give one of her unique exhibitions of her method (children illustrating) on Saturday afternoon, December 7 and 14, at 4 o'clock. Cards of admission may be obtained by writing for them. As usual there will be some new features added to demonstrate the latest developments in her work.

Miss Burt has no authorized teachers or representatives in Greater New York, and has copyrighted her method, with all charts, maps, &c.

Peck-Ensworth Vocal Recitals.—Sarah King Peck, soprano, and George Ensworth, the baritone, whose joint vocal recital at Carnegie Chamber Music Hall last spring was so very enjoyable, expect to give more of such recitals. They sing solos and duets, the former with much finish, the latter with entire unity, and present at the same time a distinguished appearance.

MUSICAL COURIER OFFICES—FINE ARTS BUILDING.

CHICAGO, October 19, 1901.

MUCH sympathy is felt for the distinguished pianist, Mme. Bloomfield Zeisler, owing to the death of her esteemed father. Mr. Bloomfield died in this city on Sunday, October 13, after a short illness, and the funeral took place on Tuesday.

A rule was established by Mr. Sherwood's manager at the inaugural concert in the Music Hall, Fine Arts Building. Mr. Baker believes that musicians and music devotees should be the principal supporters of concerts, and that the fact that many free tickets are given is frequently the cause of managerial failures. Thus, at this event, complimentary seats were limited almost strictly to the press.

The American Conservatory opened its regular series of musical events auspiciously by a recital given last Saturday afternoon, Howard Wells, Jan Van Oordt and Mabel Goodwin being the performers. It is not saying too much to state that Mr. Wells is one of the most gifted pianists in this city. Every number, from the D minor Sonata of Beethoven to the last selection, Chopin's "Andante Spianato and Polonaise" was given with comprehensive command of technical difficulties and sympathetic musical interpretation. Mr. Wells elicits from the piano a beautiful singing tone, which he applies in a proper manner, phrasing with good taste and admirable judgment. Indeed, the only criticism to be made is that there exists an over supply of reserve which interferes with perfect freedom of execution.

Miss Mabel Goodwin, who has just returned from abroad, where she prepared a new repertory with noted masters, sang Liszt's "Mignon" with excellent taste and satisfactory control of vocal resources.

Jan Van Oordt won unqualified success by his superb playing of Max Bruch's "Kol Nidrei" and the Polonaise by Wieniawski.

Carolyn Louise Willard, the talented pianist, will shortly be heard in Michigan, where she will fill engagements on three consecutive nights, the dates being as follows: November 20, Union City; 21st, under the auspices of the Athelsten Club, Battle Creek; 22d, at Olivet College, Olivet. Miss Willard's programs are artistic and her interpretative ability is recognized. During the season she will be heard at other important concerts.

Glenn Hall, the eminent tenor, has for the past year been a member of the faculty of the American Conservatory, in this city. His extensive studies in all the branches of vocal art with some of the most famous masters, both in this country and abroad, fit him admirably for his duties as instructor. Judging from the results of his work, he will doubtless become as noted a teacher as he is a singer.

Miss Electa Gifford, the soprano, has been secured by the Philharmonic Society of Minneapolis and the Apollo Club, of St. Paul, to sing "The Creation" in these cities on respectively April 9 and 10 next.

A pupil of Mrs. Johanna Hess-Burr, Miss Jeannette R. Holmes, will present an excellent program in the Music Hall, Fine Arts Building, on Tuesday evening, November 5, the songs including "Divinites du Styx" ("Alceste"), Gluck; "Repose Toi," Bemberg; "Lungi Dal Caro Bene" (Old Italian), Secchi; "Violette" (Old Italian), Scarlatti; "Blumlein's Tod," W. Middelschulte; a group of Schumann selections; "Return, O God of Hosts," Händel, and "Autumnal Gale," Grieg. Scene sixth, "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saëns, will constitute the fourth number. The assisting performers will be the Misses Maude Lindon, Lillian Roemheld, Katherine Allison, Sarah Perry and Mary A. Hansel; William H. Thompson and Edward Basse.

Bruno Steindel, the 'cellist, will visit Texas in the spring, after closing his engagement with the Thomas Orchestra. He will be accompanied by Mrs. Steindel, who plays his accompaniments.

Mrs. Eunice St. Clair Martens, the exceptionally gifted dramatic soprano, whose picture graced the front page of last week's MUSICAL COURIER, has returned from New York to Chicago, and will sing here next Monday evening at a private musicale. Mrs. Martens speaks very highly of Panzani, with whom she studied in London.

THE HAMLIN COMPANY'S ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Mrs. Genevieve Clark Wilson, soprano, will sing with the Union Club, of St. Louis, Mo., on the evening of November 21.

The Orpheus Club, of Cincinnati, Ohio, has secured Sydney Biden, baritone, for its opening concert on December 5.

The Spiering Quartet gave the inaugural recital of its ninth season in Milwaukee on Thursday last at the Athenæum. This organization's Chicago events will consist of a series of three concerts, to be given at the Music Hall, Fine Arts Building, on November 19, December 17 and January 21. The most interesting novelty for this season will be the second quartet, in E flat major, by D'Albert.

Much interest is centred in Mrs. Theodore Worcester's forthcoming piano recital at Aurora, Ill., on the afternoon of November 2. Students of piano music will find that the program is rich in substance. The numbers to be played are: Variations on a theme by Glinka, Liadow; "L'Alouette" (the lark), Glinka-Balakirew; Rhapsody in B minor, Brahms; Capriccio in B minor, Brahms; Scherzo in E flat minor, Brahms; "Wiegenlied," Adolph Henselt; concert study, "Elfensspiel," Carl Heymann; Erotikon No. 7, "Kypris," Jensen; Nocturne in C sharp minor, Tschaikowsky; etude, "La Nuit," Glazounow, and "March Militaire," Schubert-Tausig.

Prominent members of the MacDowell Club, which Frederick Warren, of the Chicago Auditorium Conservatory, successfully conducts at Brook, Ind., are Joseph W. Zaring, president; J. J. Sell, secretary and treasurer; Mrs. A. M. Vondersmith, Mrs. B. G. Turner, Miss Edith Jones, Miss Ruby Bjorklund and Mrs. Sherman White.

A number of divinity students at the University of Chicago are organizing themselves into classes in singing under the direction of Lester B. Jones, the object being to reach a more appreciative understanding of hymnology.

Katherine Hoffmann, pianist, has been engaged to assist Electa Gifford and Sydney Biden in their song recital at Milwaukee on November 4.

This morning the Chicago Tribune prints the ensuing startling dispatch from Mexico, Mo.: "The Garden City Opera Company, of Chicago, composed of nineteen members, stranded in this city. They gave a performance to raise money to get out of town."

Albert A. White, pupil of William A. Willett, of the Auditorium Conservatory, sang with much success before the Niké Club on October 7, Mrs. Waixel, ably assisting. Mrs. Annetta Williams, another pupil of Mr. Willett, starts on October 24 for a two months' tour through the West as soloist with the Euterpean Quartet Club.

Among talented pupils of Howard Wells, piano instructor at the American Conservatory, are Reginald Martin, the boy organist of the Church of the Ascension, who promises to be a fine pianist; Wallace Hobart, who has studied three years with his present instructor, and now, in addition, teaches a class of thirty pupils at Rockford, Ill. Miss Nema Phipps, of Evanston, who received an honorable mention in the American Conservatory examination last season, and Miss Nellie Swartwout, of Morgan Park.

who returns this year, having studied with Mr. Wells at Rockford College.

Madame Rique, of New York, who has just added to her models of hands that of William H. Sherwood, states that it is very unusual for a hand so small to manipulate the keys with exactness or power. That Mr. Sherwood should have become so great a pianist under these circumstances is marvelous. Madame Rique's collection, established to illustrate psychological truths, is said to include models of the hands of Olga Nethersole, Sarah Bernhardt, E. S. Willard and John Philip Sousa.

SHERWOOD MUSIC SCHOOL.

The ensuing announcement which the Sherwood Music School, Fine Arts Building, makes regarding the career of a gifted member of its excellent faculty will be read with interest:

"For eleven years a pupil and assistant to Mr. Sherwood, and unusually gifted by nature, Mrs. Georgia Kober Barnum has attained an enviable name as a teacher and concert pianist. Under Mr. Sherwood's tutelage she began early the development of her natural ability until it has now reached a high degree. Mrs. Barnum had the honor of playing Grieg's A minor Concerto with the Thomas Orchestra at the National Congress of Musicians at the Omaha Exposition, and the following season was the solo pianist in a long and successful tour with the principal concert company of the Redpath Lyceum Bureau of Boston. As a teacher Mrs. Barnum succeeds in arousing and holding the interest of her pupils. She also develops a musical instinct so that their playing is marked by correct interpretation as well as accuracy of technic."

ELIZABETH BLAMERE.

It has been said that no singer of more promise of success has appeared in Chicago recently than Oscar Saenger's pupil. Miss Elizabeth Blamere, and this statement is indorsed by a number of prominent musicians. Miss Blamere's voice is a brilliant dramatic soprano. She possesses an abundance of taste and temperament and an attractive personality. Her repertory is extensive, and it is understood that as a musician she is exceptionally talented. Since coming to Chicago she has taken Mrs. Judd-Smith's place at the Union Park Congregational Church for several months, during that singer's absence in Europe. At present she is solo soprano at Dr. Lawrence's Church.

So many talented and deserving candidates show a desire to compete for honors and an opportunity to study at the Chicago Musical College that it is probable fifty free and 200 partial scholarships will be awarded at this remarkably prosperous and influential institution next year.

Lillian Woodward Gunckel, an able member of the Chicago Musical College's faculty, has recently published an article on "The Art of Speech," which embraces the following sentiments: "We must prepare and cultivate the soil of our minds by using rules of right reasoning. Voice and action are the means for the expression of thought and feeling. Everything we produce is merely the form of what exists in the mind. The body should be cultivated so that every muscle will obey the brain; for mind speaks through the body as well as through the voice.

"In order to know principles we want rules to work by and with. Learning a theory is but a small part of the work. We may learn all the notes of the keyboard of a piano by name; we may learn all that can be told about the quality and quantity and value of notes. Can we then play the simplest sonata, or even an exercise, well? No; and why? Because we have not made the knowledge a part of ourselves.

"One cannot treat of eloquence without entering the domain of the highest philosophy; and philosophy is knowledge of things, not as they appear, but as they are caused." * * *

MARY M. SHEDD.

One of the busiest and most sought after teachers in Chicago is the American Method of Singing's exponent, Mary M. Shedd, whose studios in the Auditorium Building are unceasingly a scene of activity. Miss Shedd is so fortunate as to be associated with several sympathetic and competent assistants, most prominent among whom is her clever and energetic sister.

Allen Spencer is a magnetic pianist. When you enter the concert hall and hear his opening number this is your first impression. As you listen to varied selections throughout an exacting program you are of the same opinion. The finale is reached and you have not changed your mind.

Under the auspices of the American Conservatory, Mr. Spencer, assisted by Elaine De Sellem, contralto, gave a recital in Kimball Hall on the evening of October 17. The representative piano selections consisted of "Kings Hunting Jig," John Bull (1563-1628); "Le Coucou," Claude Daquin (1694-1772); Rondo in A minor, Mozart; "Danse of Dervishes" ("Ruins of Athens"), Beethoven-Saint-Saëns; "Moment Musicale," A flat, Schubert; Scherzo, op. 4, Brahms; "Carnival Mignon," op. 48, Eduard Schutt; Waltz, op. 17. No. 3, Moszkowski; Berceuse, op. 57, Chopin; Etude in D flat, Liszt, and "La Campanella," Paganini-Liszt.

Mr. Spencer displayed a sympathetic and, as occasion demanded, a brilliant touch, which in the Paganini-Liszt "Campanella" fairly sparkled. The Chopin, Moszkowski and Mozart contributions were worthy of special mention, and Edward Schutt's Carnival was an artistic conception, abounding in poetic fancy. Upon the question of correct phrasing Mr. Spencer is evidently an authority. His future recitals will be looked forward to with much interest. Students of piano music will find them of great value educationally.

Miss Elaine de Sellem's beautiful contralto voice was heard to advantage in contrasting songs by Massenet, Nevin, Willeby, Denza and Randegger. Both performers were enthusiastically received. The efficient accompanist was Mrs. Karleton Hackett.

In the large audience were many prominent musicians, including Mrs. Genevieve Clark Wilson, soprano; John J. Hattstaedt, director of the American Conservatory, and Glenn Hall, the tenor.

THE MUSICAL COLLEGE CONCERT.

The high esteem in which the Chicago Musical College is held by the general public was forcibly illustrated on Tuesday evening, October 15, when an immense audience assembled in the Auditorium to hear a notable faculty concert. At musical events under the auspices of this famous institution there prevails an artistic atmosphere and a feeling of unanimity. Likewise, enthusiasm, interspersed with proper discrimination, is never wanting. The strong personality and noble aspirations of Dr. Ziegfeld, president, are far reaching and effectual. To him must be attributed marvelous capacity for solving educational problems and advancing the cause of thousands of music students.

On this brilliant occasion the program was as follows:

Overture, Egmont.....Beethoven Orchestra.
Vocal, Recitative and Cavatina, La Reine de Saba.....Gounod
John R. Ortengren.
Organ—
Prelude, from Premier Suite.....Borowski
Meditation, Elegie, from Premier Suite.....Borowski
A la Marcia, Finale from Fantaisie, op. 8.....Brune
Dr. Louis Falk.
Vocal, Aria, Il re Pastore.....Mozart
Mary Forrest Ganz.
Violin obligato, Walter Schulze.
Piano, Fantaisie, op. 15.....Schubert-Liszt
Hans von Schiller.
Violin, Grand Slavonic Fantaisie.....Vieuxtemps
Bernhard Listemann.

FAUST.
(Gounod.)
The Last Act (original French version).
Marguerite.....Mme. Forrest Ganz
Faust.....M. Gauthier
Mephistopheles.....M. Herman Devries
Hart Conway, stage director.

Under the capable direction of Rudolph Ganz, the orchestra played creditably, furnishing effective accompaniments. John R. Ortengren's interpretation of Gounod's Recitative and Cavatina won an ovation, and Dr. Louis Falk played his group of organ selections with characteristic grace, ease and finish. Of the intricate art of organ manipulation he is a consummate master.

Chicago is fortunate in the possession of a soprano of the standing and rare accomplishments of Mary Forrest Ganz, the violin obligato to whose song Walter Schulze executed effectively. Hans Van Schiller and Bernhard Listemann shared the honors of this auspicious concert, while the last act of "Faust," as presented in costume and with dramatic action by Mme. Forrest Ganz, M. Gauthier and Herman Devries, was an achievement of which the Chicago Musical College may well be proud.

Elsa Marshall in Boston.

MISS ELSA MARSHALL, the soprano from Cincinnati, has been appointed solo soprano in the First Church of Christ, Scientist, in Boston. This is the Mother Church of the sect, and is always written "The First," in order to distinguish it from first churches in other cities. A generous salary is paid to the solo singers in the Boston church. The congregation is wealthy and socially important in the cultured circles of Boston. During the summer Miss Marshall sang at special musical services in the church, and at the time her beautiful voice attracted much attention. Soon after she returned to her home in Cincinnati she received the offer of solo soprano, and her new engagement begins the first Sunday in November. Before leaving her home in the West Miss Marshall was honored with a series of farewell receptions and dinners. Now that she has come East, Miss Marshall is to be heard here in concert and oratorio.

GERARD-THIERS.—Gérard-Thiers has been engaged by the Board of Education to deliver his lecture-song recital on "Technic of Musical Expression" before the public schools of the city. Mr. Thiers has prepared an entirely new lecture, which he has entitled "Eliland," and in delivering the same will use for illustrations the familiar song cycle by Von Fielitz.

CLARA LUDVIGH is a young American-Hungarian girl of sympathetic appearance and lovely voice. She has letters from Campanari, Mrs. de Navarro and others, recommending her as a singer. Lately she sang for interested listeners Arditi's "Se Saran Rose," "Yea and Nay," by A. L. (Liza Lehmann's mother, by the way), and the difficult "Nightingale Song," by the Russian Albieff. Her vocal expression, range and skill in handling the voice were all equally unusual. Her concert last April at the Waldorf was a successful affair.

Platon Brounoff starts the season with a lot of engagements to deliver his lecture-recital on "Russian Music," having engaged to go to various cities; also a series under the auspices of the Board of Education of New York, and another series in Brooklyn. He is making a specialty of this, and everywhere he has given the lecture, which is replete with anecdote, vocal and instrumental music, he has made a hit.

Arthur D. Woodruff's activity as conductor takes much of his time, and the other day he was found "digging into" all manner of music, for female voices, male voices, mixed chorus, &c., arranging and planning for the coming busy season. His Orange Musical Art Society, 100 women's voices, will give Gilchrist's "Blush of Evening," with string orchestra, with a flute obligato, and other novelties, at their first concert. The Englewood Choral Society, seventy-five voices, and the Newark Lyric Club, seventy-five women's voices, and finally the University Glee Club, some half a hundred men, all have demands on his time, notwithstanding which Woodruff teaches extensively both here and in Orange.

Late in the summer he gave two concerts, at Litchfield and Washington, Conn., the Dannreuther Quartet participating.

Kathrin Hilke returns from her four months' stay in Europe with much gain in weight, and a string of interesting experiences. With Madame Ashforth she went to Paris, where she remained seven weeks; then to Switzerland, four weeks, and finally Germany, four weeks. She sang for various managers, who all urged her to remain and prepare for opera. She has, however, no such idea. She was present at the concert given by Miss Minnie Tracey, which she says was a crowded and successful affair, and enjoyed the change, though it was not a rest. She has resumed her singing at St. Patrick's Cathedral and at the Temple Beth-El.

Robert Kent Parker made a considerable reputation in Buffalo and Western New York before going abroad to study, and recently he was heard at a private residence. He displayed a rich voice, of large compass, combined with musical temperament and interpretation. Parker should have a fine future here, for in him are united all the elements to produce it.

Mme. Amelie Hild gave a musicale at her studio last week, some of her professional pupils appearing. Miss Louise Barthel, soprano, a New Yorker, has a dramatic voice of great range, an artistic temperament, fine appearance and should make her way here. She sings in four languages, and her repertory is large.

Of Miss Sadie Bostwick, also, only good things can be said. This paper has ere this spoken of Theo. Wendling, baritone-bass, who sings fluently in various languages; he is well known, especially in leading German circles.

Madame Hild can be proud of these pupils, who are all excellent artists. As accompanist and coach Madame Hild stands at the top.

A recent visit to a leading New York church having evening service led to some reflections, chief of which was that the entire musical department was in a pretty loose state. The organist improvised throughout, preluding and postluding in most conventional fashion, and the singers all seemed animated with a desire to hurry up and get through. As a matter of fact, the entire service was over in exactly one hour. Now it seems only just that all these music makers should give their best, but the fact remains that they did not; the idea seemed to be "any old way is good enough." In view of the prominence of this church and the reputation it has for good music, the service was most disappointing.

Caryl Florio, who occupied a prominent place here, later for some time in Biltmore (near Asheville, N. C.), where he was organist of the Vanderbilt church and conductor of the Asheville Choral Society, is mourning the loss of all his manuscript compositions. He left them boxed ready to ship, and some person stole the box, which contained the result of many years' labors. He will return to New York soon. Concerning his leaving the city, a local paper said:

> The loss of their director, Caryl Florio, whose resignation of the position of choirmaster at All Souls' Church, Biltmore, took effect last Sunday, and who will leave in a few days for New York, is, however, the principal thing that causes the members of the Choral Society to take a pessimistic view of the future. Indeed, the loss of Mr. Florio is a serious one to all the musical interests of the city. It is not so much that he is a fine organist, or a talented composer or a leader capable of inspiring the highest enthusiasm, but that he combines all these qualities.

Rebecca W. Holmes is happy in the possession of a new violin, a real pedigree instrument, Guarnerius, with certificates to prove its genuineness. It looks as only such instruments can look, for the real violin of ancient lineage is always shabby.

Amy Fay has been engaged by Dr. Henry M. Leipziger, superintendent of lectures, to give three of her piano conversations, as follows: November 14, Publ School 15; November 18, Public School 14; December Realty Hall, High Bridge. Miss Fay is at work on h special programs for these.

Marie A. Stilwell, from Rochester, N. Y., the contralt who succeeded Grace Preston, came here entirely u known last spring. She immediately secured this ve prominent position, despite great competition, and al became alto in a leading synagogue.

Now this was not luck at all, but simply that she w prepared to fill the place, thanks to her Rochester teach Mr. Leach, of the Powers Block, a voice specialist wi knows his business. As Miss Stilwell says, "he did it for me." Miss Stilwell's career here will be watched wi interest.

Signor A. Batti is an Italian tenor recently arrived, w speaks English with facility, also five other languages, which German is especially excellent. He has been e gaged for certain musical affairs and has originated sketch in which he sings in all these six languages; in tl cosmopolitan town that should certainly please. H card reads, "Tenor della Scala e S. Carlo." He r cently sang excerpts from "Cavalleria" and "Pagliacc and those who were present admired his enthusiasm a musical singing.

On this occasion E. Pfaff played for the singer, trai posing into any key desired, from memory; quite a fe His specialty is piano, organ and harmony, and he is ganist of St. Anthony's R. C. Church of Brooklyn.

Florence Mosher spent a pleasant and profitable su mer abroad, gathering new material for her piano-illust tions in the Mosher-Burbank lecture-recitals on fore music. She played for and met some of the most e nent men in the musical world, and had offers to rem and concertize. Her engagements here, as pianist a as teacher in a leading women's school, prevent this

Beginning last Sunday evening the special musical se ices at the Church of the Divine Paternity were resum Seventy-sixth street and Central Park, West. Here organist is J. Warren Andrews, and his choir consists Miss Estelle Harris, soprano; Miss Cornelia Marvin, al Albert Quesnal, tenor, and Gwilym Miles, baritone, th forming the solo quartet—and a better one there is not the city of New York. Besides these there is an octet c sisting of Mrs. Madge Stewart Whitman and M Josephine Dyer-Johnstone, sopranos; Mrs. R. A. Pu and Miss Augusta Northup, altos; Irving Dewey Willia and John F. McDonough, tenors, and W. H. Pringle M. Weishoff, basses. The music at the first Sunday ev ing service was taken from Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," the soprano solo, sung by Miss Harris, with the cho went especially well. The usual fifteen-minute organ cital precedes the evening service. In the morning music was from Rossini's "Stabat Mater." The choir pects soon to give extracts from Willard Patten's "Isai a very creditable work done at the Omaha Exposition. Patten is one of Andrews' former Minneapolis pupils.

Last Wednesday afternoon Miss Harris and Miss Marvin sang at the Weickert-Beinecke nuptials at the church, and Sunday afternoon at a funeral.

Harriette Brower, after a busy summer spent in teaching and playing (mention of her New York recitals was made in this paper), followed by a brief vacation, has returned to New York to resume her professional work, and may be found at her very attractive home studio, or at Steinway Hall. Her time will be fully occupied this season, what with teaching and playing; she expects to give a number of musicales both in and out of the city. She will also do considerable musical literary review work.

Abbie Clarkson Totten sends a handsome souvenir program of the dedication of the new M. E. church at Irvington, N. J., in which she appeared as the soprano soloist at the organ recital given by Wm. E. Ashmall. She sang Buck's "My Redeemer and My Lord," Gray's "A Dream of Paradise," Millard's "Ave Maria," and Shelley's "Abide With Me."

Madame Totten has originated a series of "Illustrated Songs," such as the "Holy City" and "When I Was Sweet Sixteen," with stereopticon views, each line of the song being illustrated with the appropriate picture. In this she has made a distinct hit, and the views also include an especially handsome colored picture of the vivacious soprano, who has many friends.

What might have been a serious accident was the runaway of a team of truck horses, colliding with the carriage in which sat Miss Katherine Ruth Heyman and Miss Fanny M. Spencer. They were driving alone, their horse being the "Ben Hur" stage horse known as Della Fox, now performing in "Arizona," when as they neared Forty-fifth street on Fifth avenue this truck team ran into them. Their little rubber tired trap was shivered by the crash and the girls much shaken up, nothing worse.

Mrs. Frances H. Rice, the Rochester flute virtuoso, is in the city to remain some time, and it is to be hoped this lady will be heard ere long, for she is a fine player. Having studied long and seriously in Germany some years ago, she plays the Terschak works and pieces of that calibre, and at the Buffalo meeting of the New York State Music Teachers' Association she was one of the special stars. Handsomely gowned, with a beautiful silver flute, playing with artistic taste, she made a hit. Her sister, Mrs. Ettenheimer, is the well-known pianist.

Organist Frank J. Smith of the Second Collegiate Church, Harlem, has a new soprano in the person of Miss Edith Chapman, Miss Martha Miner going to Europe for two years' sojourn. Miss Miner's engagement to a prominent business man of Denver, Col., is announced. The new bass is F. J. Wheeler. Mr. Smith remains the conductor of the New York University Glee Club, which gives several college concerts; also of the well-known Lotus Glee Club, and he has some thirty concerts to give with the latter this season. He also arranges considerable music for publication.

Wade R. Brown is a newcomer here, having after European study of several years' length spent ten years in South Carolina, where he was in charge of the music at Gaffney State Normal College. His specialty is organ, piano and theory. His May festival this year was an important event, with 100 singers in a well-schooled chorus, and such soloists as Baernstein, Bendix and others. There were three concerts, all of a high artistic nature. His local women's chorus, some 100 voices, formerly gave a series of concerts also, and Mr. Brown has evidently had much experience in music. Some church should secure his services.

O. Heywood Winters has removed to a newly decorated studio on East Twenty-third street, where he has fine light, much room and artistic surroundings. He is planning certain musical events with his students and those of last season will be recalled as especially enjoyable and well managed. Mr. Winters is a thorough and careful student and his pupils get the best of modern thought in him.

Mrs. Morris Black has become prominent here by reason of beauty of voice and highly intelligent art in singing. Her singing is that of the earnest, intellectual order, and gives pleasure that is lasting, combining, as it does, musical intellect with artistic personality and charm. A recent conversation led to her giving her views as to singers and their habits, in the course of which she said many things most singers do not know, simply because they do not think.

She is an annual soloist for certain leading concerts here and in Pittsburg, Cleveland, Philadelphia and Washington, D. C., and looks forward to an April journey to London next year.

Miss Annette Flannagan, a contralto, of New Rochelle, died at the home of her uncle, John Healy, after an illness of six weeks from typhoid fever. Miss Flannagan was well-known in New Rochelle, having appeared as a soloist in all of the leading churches. She has been for several years the leading soprano in St. Gabriel's Roman Catholic church.

Edward Calthrop, formerly of Syracuse, N. Y., has been engaged as tenor of the West End Collegiate Church. He is an excellent singer, a brother of Richard G. Calthrop, well-known as teacher and baritone in Central New York.

BENNETT PUPIL ENGAGED FOR OPERA.—Miss Ruth Pebbles, one of the soprano pupils of S. C. Bennett, has been engaged by Henry W. Savage to sing the leading soubrette role in "King Dodo."

Success of the H. W. Greene Summer School of Music.

THE second season of this institution surpassed in its successful outcome all expectation. Pupils from as far West as Montana and as far South as North Carolina gathered together to enjoy their summer's work and recreation in the beautiful Connecticut hills, where three attractive houses in a picturesque little village had been comfortably equipped for their reception. The pupils were exceptionally congenial, each finding the artistic personalities of the others attractive and inspiring.

Mr. Greene has aimed to combine ultra practical musical training with a life entirely favorable to its acquirement. The distractions of the ordinary summer resort are not to be found there, and the school formed a select musical colony, every feature of which was conducive to profit as well as to health. It was conducted with a system so perfect that all friction as to hours of practice was avoided. Nearly every evening was devoted to recitals and lectures, interspersed with special exercises for the individual needs of some pupils. It was unanimously agreed that the season was one of great profit.

The personnel of the school was of a high order, the majority being professionals of rank or teachers who had made a distinct success in their several specialties. The most delightful programs were those which had been prepared by artists for their winter tours, and the classes that excited much interest were those held by the pupil-teachers themselves, who employed the rest of the school as a medium for putting into practice the ideas they had gained.

Heink.

THIS name having become widely known, not only in Europe among the musical profession but also in this country to a considerable extent, it will be of interest to music lovers generally to learn that Felix Heink has returned to New York for the present season. Mr. Heink, who will be remembered by many from his concert tour here five years ago, will be under the direction of the Metropolitan Concert Bureau, Edward Kimpton manager, 1144 Broadway, New York. Herr Heink's remarkable versatility and highly artistic work, both as singer, pianist and composer, have always been highly commented on, and he is exceptionally well qualified for recital work, to which he intends to devote a large part of this season in this country, traveling extensively both in the Southern and Western States.

Yale Bi-Centenary.

THE musical program at the Yale Bi-Centenary in progress this week consists of an organ recital by Samuel S. Sanford and Harry B. Jepson on Sunday last; a performance of Horatio W. Parker's "Hora Novissima" by the Gounod Society and the New Haven Symphony Orchestra, for last night, and a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this afternoon at 2:30, when the same program is to be performed that was given on Saturday night at the opening of the season in Boston. The latter is Colonel Higginson's form of attention to the celebration.

WHITNEY TEW

The London Press says of Mr. Tew's singing:

The Stage—"Mr. Whitney Tew proved himself a singer of excellent capabilities. His voice, which is a bass of great compass, is delightfully sympathetic—now full of tenderness, now instinct with passion and joy. He could not have been surpassed in his rendering of Schumann's 'Der Knabe mit dem Wunderhorn' and Liza Lehmann's curiously weird 'Myself when Young.'"—July 4, 1901.

London Musical Courier—"Mr. Whitney Tew's singing was marked by a high order of intelligence. He is one of the few singers now before the public who possesses the many qualifications that mean success. Besides a voice powerful and sympathetic he has a remarkable memory, and he never fails to display an intuitive knowledge of the poetic and dramatic significance of the text. In four songs by Bach, Brahms, Schubert and Schumann he exhibited great powers of vocalization and expression, and a style in singing German so thoroughly Teutonic that it was hard at times to realize his American origin . . . Three songs in English were equally impressive."—July 5, 1901.

Ladies' Field—"That fine bass singer, Mr. Whitney Tew, gave the first of his recitals in Steinway Hall. Madame Lehmann's 'In Memoriam' was a great test of Mr. Tew's manner and inflection, and he sustained the interest of his audience well throughout it; and it is a supremely hard work for a single voice—fragmentary, passionate, moody, with its pedal-note of acute sorrow. . . . Mr. Tew is fortunate in possessing a powerful voice of fine quality, and he has both the voice and brains for success."—May 25, 1901.

Daily Telegraph—"Mr. Tew is an artist who commands attention and deserves praise. Especially has he the gift of feeling and the power of conveying it to others, while in point of intelligence he leaves but little to desire. Mr. Tew essaye last evening songs of widely contrasting kinds and of various entres, but the manner and spirit proper to each were easily revealed, and the result was a conspicuous success."—May 23 1901.

On Board Steamship Palatia,
More than Half Seas Over,
October 15, 1901.

IT seems to me that, although this time for a change I am on board a Hamburg-American steamer, professionally I am in the same boat as Hans Sachs, who in the "Meistersinger" self-complainingly exclaims: Immer nur Schuster!—"always only a cobbler." Indeed, not even a sherry cobbler. Thus I was, am and shall remain a critic, yea, even a music critic, to the last. "As it was in the beginning, is now and ever shall be. World without end. Amen." I irreverently quoted in my mind and not in a mood for prayer, as I trudged the accustomed way to the Philharmonie, where promptly enough, viz., one day before the official day set by custom, the Berlin musical season was ushered in on Monday night, September 30, with a benefit concert given for a charitable purpose by the Hamburg Teachers' Male Chorus Vocal Society.

What may have possessed the Hansa town Gesangverein to invade the German capital I am, of course, at a loss to know. Whether it was mere ambition to show that they could sing as well as the Berlin or any other societies, barring always the New York Liederkranz and Arion; or if they had the secret object of bringing themselves into prominence and into the mind of H. I. M. for the next Emperor's prize; or whatever else may have actuated these pedagogues to spend money in traveling and hotels, one thing is certain, viz.: that they would not have done so for mercenary purposes.

The very purpose of the concert showed this; but even if this charitable cloak had not been hung around it, it is hard to believe that they could or would have counted with substantial box office receipts. Be that as it may, and leaving the monetary consideration entirely out of question, it must be acknowledged that the artistic side of their undertaking deserved more attention than it received from the public and the press. An organization made up exclusively of teachers; that is, of people accustomed to discipline and education, general as well as most frequently musical also, is apt to be a good vocal society. We have seen this in Berlin, where both the male and the female teachers' singing societies belong among the best in the city. It is so also in other and much smaller towns of Germany, and it might be made so elsewhere if the right sort of people would take the matter in hand. Much of course depends also upon the selection of the conductor, and in this regard the Hamburg society was especially fortunate, for Prof. Richard Barth had made a name for himself in his chosen field when he was still at Marburg, the director of an academic university students' chorus. In Hamburg he found increased material, and he seems to have made the proper selection from it, for his male chorus, about 200 strong, shows not only excellent quality, but also, what is very rare, a nearly perfect tonal balance. The first tenors, usually the weak spot in most male and mixed chorus societies, are sufficiently represented in volume and are brilliant in effect. Training of an artistic nature this society must have had in abundance, for the ensemble is well-nigh perfect, and all hands, or rather voices, obey with utmost precision, and yet with a certain freedom, not to say abandon, the musical intentions of the leader as indicated by his baton.

Under the circumstances, and as Professor Barth's program was also of more than average interest, it was a pleasure to listen to the singing of these people. Hegar's "Totenvolk," a crucial test piece for male chorus singing, was delivered with absolute purity of intonation, the Hamburgers maintaining the pitch of C sharp minor from the first to the last chord without the slightest deviation at the close. Three quartets by Johannes Brahms were new to me, and were probably placed upon the program more because of the fact that Brahms happened to have been born at Hamburg than for reason of their intrinsic musical merit, interested as quasi novelties. The third one of them, entitled "Marschieren," is a humorous setting of a text of more than doubtful propriety. Of course, it was the one that took most with the audience.

Miss Lucy Samuelson, who had been brought on from Hamburg, and upon the program probably for the purpose of vocal variety, one female contrasting well with a chorus of male voices, acquitted herself of her task respectably, but not in any exciting way, by the delivery of two groups of Schubert and Brahms songs.

Somewhat on the style and scale of the French Society for Instrumental Music, Berlin now owns an organization of Royal chamber musicians, all of them, of course, members of the Royal Orchestra, who have united for the purpose of performing chamber music for a variety of instruments. Their undertaking deserves public support and general encouragement, for only if works of the sort are brought to cognizance of a larger circle than just a few music students and enthusiasts, will this noble branch of the art find renewed impetus of a creative as well as of a merely reproductive sort. Moreover it is more interesting than is generally supposed to be able to hear in excellent performance some of the old masters' chamber music works of the existence of which musical historians have knowledge, but which otherwise remain dead letters, figuring only in the catalogues and libraries without ever being reawakened to the temporary resurrection of an actual and public performance. Hence Emil Prill, flute; Franz Bundfuss, oboe; Carl Esberger, clarinet; Adolf Guetter, bassoo and Adolf Littmann, first horn player of the Royal O chestra, deserve praise for having associated themselves conjunction with the pianist, Fritz Fuhrmeister, a chamb music player of just the right calibre for the above d scribed purpose. That there is a field for their activity t very first concert demonstrated, for Bechstein Hall w filled to its, for such soirées, adequate capacity with audience which was equally as attractive as it was e thusiastic. The program also proved an attractive one, which modern and classical works were interspersed as to strike a happy average. Among the latter was M zart's delightful Quintet in E flat for piano, oboe, clarin bassoon and horn, which belongs among the master's mc characteristic and also deepest works, while the G maj Trio for piano, flute and bassoon, by Beethoven, without opus number, must date back from the composer's creati infancy and proved, to quote Henry T. Finck, of on an "historic interest."

August Klughardt, the Dessau court conductor a one of the most fertile of modern composers, was repr sented upon the program twice. First with a quintet, o 79, for the combination of flute, oboe, clarinet, basso and horn, which proved a well written but somewh leathery and dry novelty. An earlier work, however, Concertstuck in F major for oboe, Klughardt's op. showed fresh invention and a partially pastoral, partial plaintive spirit, which well corresponds to the charact of the instrument.

Two movements from a quintet, op. 48, for piano, flu clarinet and horn, a Lento in E flat minor and a rousi Rondo in B flat from the pen of my esteemed confrè Prof. E. E. Taubert, the music critic of the Berlin Po evinced his masterly musicianship and also a certain, n inconsiderable amount of original invention.

This latter quality is almost entirely lacking in t compositions of Carl Kaempf, a hitherto unknown Ber musical author, who deserves to remain in the obscuri from which he tried to emerge by giving a concert t program of which was made up exclusively of songs a cabinet organ pieces of his own manufacture. I use th word intentionally, for Mr. Kaempf's music is of the bored sort, containing only a modicum of melody and t most strained harmonic progressions. Mit den Hanr herbeigezogen, the Germans call this sort of creation, a the expressive term, for which I know no equivalent the English language, holds good in music as well as poetry. The poeta nascitur axiom, viz., that a poet born and not made, might just as well be applied also the genus composer. Of the songs of Mr. Kaempf, whi were delivered by Marie Rost, soprano; Else Gerlac alto, and Alexander Heinemann, baritone, and a doz and a half of which were figuring upon the program, heard a sufficient number to convince me that Mr. Kaem has missed the right vocation and also as a perform upon his chosen instrument, the Mason & Hamlin ca inet organ, for which he professedly wrote the only thr instrumental numbers of the evening, he is not a pr nounced success. I know some others, notably Arth Bird and Paul Ertel, who can play far better and can a do compose music which is much more adapted to displ to advantage this American instrument, which has co to the front rapidly and in a pronounced degree in Be lin's concert life.

Another American musical product, but a live one, w heard in Berlin on the same night. Miss Martha Cunnin ham is the possessor of one of those pleasing, light sopra voices which are as characteristic of God's own count as are Little Neck clams or sweet corn, peanuts a other delicacies indigent to the soil and the climate. Th is the only way I can explain why the modern sopra leggiero should grow almost exclusively in the Unit ates. I also believe that they grow there naturally and n sing in their own pure and delicious crystalline style easily as the proverbial rolling off a log, if they are not oiled by any vocal teachers, foreign or home bred. ney sing like birds, and then they are in their natural ement, such as was the case with Miss Cunningham nen she warbled some of the coloratura in Viardot's arrangement of a Chopin mazurka, or coquettishly de- ered the Cadiz young ladies of Alfred de Musset, which o Delibes clad in graceful musical garb. When it mes to Dvorák's weeping gipsy songs, however, or even e lighter calibre of Brahms and Schumann lieder, such the "Staendchen" of the former and the "Auftraege" the latter, the poor American songbird begins to floun- r about like the Palatia in a heavy sea, and although cally she may hold her own, musically she is utterly at . Nevertheless this young girl is a rather sympathetic ger, and with her prepossessing stage appearance and dest, unassuming manners, she will be able to captivate ny another audience just as she did the one at the Ber- Singakademie on Wednesday night, October 2.

I had not heard Arthur Friedheim for a long time, for he one of the few pianists of note who have not played in rmany for the last decade. In New York many years we were often witness of performances which seemed justify Liszt's preference for this gifted pupil, but also of ers in which he appeared under less favorable aspects. any rate it could not be denied that at that time his hnic was anything but certain, or of a Joseffian polish. as all the more surprised, therefore, to find that in this ticular respect Friedheim has regained in the years of experiences in the United States and lately in England ood deal of that finger and wrist technic which he must e possessed in his younger years, or else he could not e been the great Friedheim who was at once the admi- on and also the envy of the many other pupils who had privilege of sharing Liszt's company and profiting by a master's, advice in Weimar and during the sojourn Rome. The Liszt influence is also still quite apparent prevailing in Friedheim's playing and in his predilec- for the master's compositions. I am, as I have often candidly confessed, not an ardent admirer of Liszt's ks, and yet I must acknowledge that in such reading Friedheim knows how to present them they seem to in musical significance.

hus it was with the incongruous B minor ballad, and such smaller and less important pieces as the "Will o' Wisps," the peculiar nocturne entitled "The Bells of eva" and the Tenth Rhapsody, which latter was per- ned with considerable virtuosity, and of course drew iders of applause from a large audience of connoisseurs had assembled at the Beethoven Hall, and among m I noticed, to mention only a few, such well-known ists as Godowsky, Xaver Scharwenka, De Pachmann, genial Hugo Mansfeldt from San Francisco and his ng and highly gifted pupil, Alma Stencel, as well Moritz Mayer-Mahr, and a few others of the lent Berlin pianists. The profession appeared interested also in the reproduction of the Beethoven "Diabelli" Waltz Variations, not one of all the thirty-three of which was missed by Friedheim, and to listen to which ever was and will remain a severe task to many an audience. It is certainly not an offering for a provincial public, but a Berlin parterre of professionals will swallow the whole opus quite eagerly, even if some of the variations are given somewhat dryly and in schoolmaster style, and if the tone produced from a Bluethner grand is often more glassy than glossy and more brutal than brilliant.

In a group of smaller pieces, which included the Weber "Moto Perpetuo," Mendelssohn's "Song Without Words" in F, which Paderewski likes to select for an encore after a stormy finale, five of the Chopin preludes and the same composer's G sharp minor study in Godowsky's clever arrangement for the left hand, winding up with Rubinstein's C major study in octaves, I really liked only the virtuoso numbers, while I was slightly disappointed in Friedheim's delivery of everything that required true musical feeling and tenderness of touch and tone.

This was the last concert I attended before leaving Berlin for Hamburg and I therefore can affirm truthfully that I was in harness up to the day before sailing.

The Philharmonic popular concerts began on the same evening and the orchestra, looking hale and hearty after their summer sojourn at the Dutch watering place of Scheveningen, presented one of their standard programs, including a Beethoven symphony, to a large and enthusiastic clientèle. The two concertmasters of the Philharmonikers performed in excellent ensemble the Bach double concerto, to the delight of the audience, and Josef Rebicek was greeted with an extra liberal dose of applause when he took up the baton for the first number of the program, for he celebrated the fortieth anniversary of his artistic activity. On October 1, 1861, he appeared before the public for the first time as violinist of the Grand Ducal Court Orchestra at Weimar, in which organization he soon occupied a prominent position. Rebicek is the scion of a musical family of Bohemia, he having been born at Prague, where, after finishing the usual course of general education, he entered the conservatory. Here he became a pupil of Mildner and after six years of study left the conservatory with the first prize for violin playing. Liszt then heard him and immediately engaged him for Weimar.

The contact with the pioneer of neo-German music and the whole musical life and atmosphere of Weimar influenced, of course, the young artist. First he founded and gradually increased his reputation as a violin virtuoso, and then, following renowned examples, took up the career of conductor. In 1862, viz., at the age of eighteen, he became the first concertmaster at the Opera in Prague and violin teacher at the conservatory of his native city. When Jahn in 1868 was director of the Wiesbaden Court Opera he made Rebicek his assistant, and then the young artist progressed rapidly. At Wiesbaden he founded a chamber music society and began his career as operatic conductor. In Warsaw, in 1881, he assumed the same high function at the Imperial Opera, and thence was called in 1891 to Budapest, until in 1894 he returned as first court conductor to Wiesbaden. In all this diligent activity Rebicek still found time for the furtherance of his own musical ideas, as shown in many compositions of worth and beauty, and he continued to educate himself in all branches of the art until he became one of the most versatile as well as well versed and technically admirably equipped musicians. Since October 1, 1897, Rebicek belongs to Berlin as steady leader of the Philharmonic Orchestra. About the importance of this position, especially as far as the educational side of the Popular concerts is concerned, also about the earnest and high standard style in which he conceives and fulfils his duties, I have often had occasion to speak. May he long continue at the head of his excellent and well trained body of artists in the same erect stateliness which distinguishes him up to date and which makes it seem hardly credible that he has just celebrated his fortieth artistic anniversary.

Another artist of high repute and a similar career likewise looks back upon an activity of forty years to-day. It is Prof. Isidor Seiss, one of the most eminent among German musicians, the vice-director of the Cologne Conservatory, who celebrates the fortieth anniversary of his entrance into the teaching staff of that old, renowned institute. Seiss was a pupil of the celebrated piano pedagogue, Friedrich Wieck, the father of Clara Schumann, and studied theory with the hardly less renowned teachers, Julius Otto, C. Riccius and Moritz Hauptman. As pianist Seiss is scarcely known any longer to the present generation, although in the sixties and the early seventies he acquired fame as one of the best concert pianists of Germany. I heard him last at a Guerzenich concert in Cologne in 1874, when, under Hiller's direction, he performed a Mozart concerto in most musical and finished style.

Shortly after that he renounced the career of a traveling virtuoso and devoted himself almost exclusively to teaching, in which field he achieved considerable success. He also gave proof of his gifts as a composer in a number of small piano pieces of value, works for orchestra, male choruses, an adagio for 'cello with orchestral accompaniment, as well as a one act opera, "The Four Years' Sentinel," which has been given with success at Cologne and elsewhere in Germany. His arrangements for two and four hands, and also for violin and piano of Beethoven's German dances and contredances, likewise found favor with a large number of musical people. The Musikalische Gesellschaft, an orchestra consisting in the main of amateurs and conservatory pupils, which organization Seiss has conducted for a period of twenty-seven years, he brought up to a standard of perfection of performances which one rarely finds elsewhere.

Among the callers during the last few days before my departure from Berlin were Miss Elfreda Rhoda-Neuberger and Mrs. Neuberger, from New York; the charming young singer intends to give a concert of her own in Berlin on November 13; Miss Beatrice M. Davidson, of New York, and her mother; Moritz Mayer-Mahr, the eminent piano pedagogue and virtuoso; Miss Adrienne Gorsolke, a young Berlin pianist now residing in St. Petersburg; Arthur Friedheim, the celebrated virtuoso, whom you all know; Ernest Schilling, the American born young piano virtuoso, who performed for me a finely constructed and very musicianly as well as brilliant Rhapsodie Fantasia he composed upon motives from the second act of Paderewski's opera, "Manru"; Otto Kunitz, a young composer from Santa Cruz, Cal., who called on me in company with his teacher, Max Loewengard, of the Stern Conservatory; Mr. Kunitz performed for me an Albumblatt, a barcarolle and a theme with variations, winding up with a four-part fugue, all exceedingly well written piano music, which does credit alike to teacher and pupil; and Hugo Kaun, the Milwaukee composer and conductor. Lamperti School, Paris.

THE school of Madame Lamperti in Paris, to be opened on November 1, for the purpose of giving vocal instructions on the original Lamperti method, is to be located at Rue Jadin 14 bis, in the Parc Monceau quarter. Lessons are given in French, English and German diction, and the price is $100 for a full term, three singing lessons a week including pension. The address is Mme. Edvige Lamperti.

It must be remembered that this lady is the widow of the late maestro Francesco Lamperti, of Milan, and also a pupil of Albani Campanini and other celebrated artists who have impressed their methods upon the vocal system of the present day. She is thoroughly equipped as an artist, having sung on the operatic stage herself with great success in all the European cities.

Josephine Jacoby.

ON October 31 Mrs. Jacoby will sing in Rossini's "Stabat Mater," at Calvary Methodist Church, in which Kathrin Hilke, the soprano; Van Yorx, the tenor, and Julian Walker, the basso, will also take part. Madame Jacoby will also sing in Washington on December 27, and later in "Samson and Delilah," with the Apollo Club, Chicago. These are a few of the more important engagements of this singer for the near season.

ERICSSON BUSHNELL.—Ericsson Bushnell, the basso, sang Parker's "Hora Novissima," on Tuesday, October 22, at the Yale Bicentennial celebration. Mr. Bushnell created the part in 1893, when the oratorio was first given.

ALMA WEBSTER-POWELL.—Madame Webster-Powell is now in Russia singing with Eugene Pirani. The papers say that after the concert tour in Russia the two will sing in the United States.

Madame Maconda in New England.

THE singing of Mme. Charlotte Maconda at the New England festivals this autumn is being heralded over the country, and this brilliant success insures for her numerous engagements during the season. This singer has established herself a prime favorite in the cultured communities, and her fame keeps growing all the time.

Appended are some of the criticisms telling of her success at the recent Maine festival:

Madame Maconda has her own place in favor with Maine and Portland audiences and repeated visits emphasize the fact that here is a singer who must be considered one of the most satisfactory ever heard in our concert halls. Her warm, sympathetic tones awake response in the educated and uneducated alike, while her splendid vocalism leaves the critics little to decry. An all round singer is Maconda, and her few solo parts last evening were gems rarely appreciated.

Madame Maconda was given an ovation upon her entrance. Her appearance was exceptionally attractive in a dazzling gown of white, completely covered with silver sequins, which glinted and shimmered with every movement. With this she wore a string of beautiful pearls. Her first solo, "From Thy Love as a Father," was encored.—Portland News.

In "From Thy Love as a Father" Madame Maconda again displayed all those fine qualities and technic which have made her a favorite with our public, the enthusiasm aroused calling out the encore of the evening.—Portland Argus.

Madame Maconda was welcomed heartily on her appearance upon the stage, and sang so beautifully as to inspire general regret that she could not be heard in other concerts of this season's festival. Her voice has grown steadily in power and quality since she began singing for Maine people, and her charming personality has endeared her to us more, perhaps, than any other singer.—Portland Daily Advertiser, October 9, 1901.

Charlotte Maconda in oratorio was new to a Portland audience. She was in admirable voice and won an enthusiastic encore by her rendition of "From Thy Love as a Father."

Maconda's first number was "The Lord, He Is Risen Again." Her flutey, flexible voice was heard to advantage, and in her supreme opportunity of the evening, "From Thy Love as a Father," she sang brilliantly. In the concluding phrase, "Shall Rise to Heights Supernal," she rang clearly above the thousand of the chorus. The house clapped loudly.

* * * Maconda sang "Ye Mountains," a very difficult number, with brilliant ease.—Portland Daily News, October 9.

Madame Maconda had no difficulty in making us forget that she had not been advertised to appear in this concert. The ever popular duo for voice and flute was beautifully done, the lady being in excellent form and the accompanist in sympathy with her. Maconda's tone is wonderfully pure and her high notes marvelously true and telling. Of course the first selection carried the audience by storm and insured a recall. The singer's real victory was won in the very difficult air of Filina, from "Mignon," the famous Polonaise. Has any one of us ever heard it done better? I doubt it. This also was received with enthusiasm and the whole of it repeated. Here again the orchestral accompaniment was most commendable, the extremes of verve and delicacy being managed with unusual art.—The Manchester Daily Mirror and American, October 11, 1901.

Madame Maconda sang the "Pearl of Brazil" aria as only she can sing it. Her voice seemed even better than when she was last heard here and her audience was completely taken by storm. The music gave her the opportunity to show her marvelous tones and her ability to make her voice do just what she wants it to do. Her higher notes are reached with no apparent effort, and in rapid passages there is the same evident ease. The flute part was taken by Charles North, who accompanied the singer perfectly. She was recalled and repeated the cadenza.

Then Maconda sang again, this time the "Mignon" Polonaise. Again she delighted her audience with the display of her wonderful talent.—Manchester Union.

Of the soloists Madame Maconda, not only in the concert numbers, but particularly in the exquisite "From Thy Love," which received an encore, and the recitative and aria in Part III., beginning "Ye Mountains," sang with a greatness of power, a limpidity of tone, a depth of feeling, which fairly electrified the audience. With a voice of great power, a clearness of enunciation almost wonderful, a magic magnetism which places her en rapport, not only with chorus and orchestra, but the audience as well, Madame Maconda's modesty of demeanor and charming stage personality combined to these other features make her irresistible. Let us have the great pleasure of hearing her another year.—Burlington Free Press, October 16, 1901.

Miss Caroll-Badham.

BACK from her annual trip to Paris Miss Caroll Badham opens her season this year with brighter prospects and more pupils than ever before. Miss Caroll Badham has the gift of progressiveness in the conduct of her artistic career, and many are the pupils who will testify to the modern ideas she uses in voice cultivation, based always on the famous Lamperti method, in the knowledge of which she stands as an authority with the maestro's own endorsement.

Her studio at 65 Central Park West will be a busy place this week, as her many American pupils have anxiously awaited her return and welcomed her when she reached here a few days ago.

There is decided novelty in Miss Caroll-Badham's tutorship. She is a firm believer in establishing a fraternal feeling among voice teachers, which, she says, can only be found among the well-known teachers of the French metropolis, among whom she looks up to with respect are Marchesi, Laborde, De la Grange, Mme. di Picciotto and others. In her annual trips to Europe she loses not an opportunity of attending the classes of these teachers, gleaning hints and material with which to enrich her own pupils.

Miss Caroll-Bedham's Paris studio address this summer was 3 Avenue MacMahon, and there she left a reputation which means the necessity for an early return to meet the many calls for her advice and tutorship; in fact so successful was she that there is a probability of her not returning to America when she leaves for Paris again next year.

PERCY HEMUS SINGS.—Mr. Hemus was specially engaged to sing at the memorial funeral serivce of the Rev. D. Mott, at Roseville Presbyterian Church last week. He is booked for several engagements, and is making the progress which can be expected of him, in view of his merits.

SIGMOND LANDSBERG.

The best music published today must represent not only the highest conceptions of the form most composers, but also the most careful editorial supervision and the best results of the engraver's art and of the printer's skill. Oliver Ditson Company's editions of modern, classic, standard, and popular music fulfil these requirements, with the result that not only do the representative American composers publish with this house, but singers, pianists, and teachers draw from its catalogs for material. Mr. Sigmond Landsberg, born in Berlin, and a student of the Kullak Academy of Music, has earned a well-deserved reputation in this country as a concert pianist and composer. He finds John Orth's "Third, Fourth and Fifth Finger Waltz" particularly useful in teaching, and highly commends two Grade II pieces by Carl C. Müller—"On the Hobby Horse" and "The Chase"—as instructive recreation pieces. Included in his concert repertoire are Salmon's "Gavotte Humoresque," Manney's "Première Valse," Adele Lewing's "Romance," etc.

MINNIE TRACEY'S FINE CRITICISMS.

JUST as he captured Paris and Berlin—France and Germany—so has Sousa taken London and England by storm. We reprint the London criticisms just to hand and by a coincidence our Mr. Blumenberg was in London at the time the Sousa performances were occupying the attention of the people and he privately confirms the quick and deep impression made by Sousa and his band now performing at the Glasgow Exposition to thousands daily.

The concerts at Albert Hall were packed events, seats being at a high premium. It will also gratify her many friends in America to know that Miss Minnie Tracey had the success which the same set of criticisms show. Miss Tracey had many recalls and it was a curious commentary on musical affairs that while she could please musical London, certain American managers could see only her form and not hear her voice, although she claims to be merely a singer. We could not see what avoirdupois has to do with singing or speaking or thinking or succeeding. If it were a national question all girls weighing over 140 or 150 pounds should stop the study of singing or not begin it.

We herewith reproduce the criticisms:

SOUSA AT THE ALBERT HALL.

The Albert Hall wore an unwonted air of festivity last night, when the much-heralded "March King," John Philip Sousa, made his first bow in England together with his famous band. Expectation had run high over the appearance of the celebrated composer-conductor, and a huge audience testified its appreciation of the musical fare provided in terms which left no doubt as to the instantaneous impression which Mr. Sousa's magnetic personality could not fail to have made. We may say at once that such playing by a band consisting of wood wind and brass instruments alone has without doubt never been heard in this country before. It was a perfect revelation. This is not to be wondered at when one realizes the temperamental qualities of Mr. Sousa. He is evidently a musician of rare refinement and instinct, with an appreciation for and gift of rhythm which fairly amounts to genius. Much of the music performed was of the lightest description, yet we cannot pay Mr. Sousa a higher compliment than to say that one's purely critical musical faculty was entirely carried away by the extraordinary entrain and verve of the interpretations. There was on the part of the players an absolutely spontaneous response to the conductor's slightest movement or gesture, while the auditors themselves seemed to be influenced in no less a degree from an emotional point of view. The quality and balance of tone of the band was well nigh perfect, while in the accompaniment of the vocal and violin solos one quite failed to realize that the fundamental strings of the ordinary orchestra were replaced by the harsher and more assertive woodwind group of instruments. Mr. Sousa obtained more than once as absolute a pianissimo from his players as the most fastidious could desire. The most interesting items given, musically speaking, were Goldmark's Overture to "Sakuntala," a Liszt Rhapsody and a very clever arrangement of a scene and finale from Giordano's "Andrea Chenier," an opera which made a vivid impression upon the writer when it was first given at La Scala, Milan, and which verily cries out for a hearing in London. An effective suite of Mr. Sousa's, entitled "Three Quotations," to say nothing of numerous marches, the "Washington Post" included, served to rouse the audience to repeated enthusiasm, while a trombone solo by Mr. Pryor showed what unsuspected qualities that generally considered unwieldy instrument possesses in the hands of a real artist. Miss Minnie Tracey sang an air from Massenet's "Herodiade" with much expression and sympathetic beauty of tone, and Miss Dorothy Hoyle played Nachez's "Gipsy Dances" most effectively. In Mr. Sousa and his band we seem to have the musical epitome of all that is bright and sparkling in the characteristic personality of our American cousins across the water.—S., in St. James, October 5, 1901.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL.

Mr. Sousa and his American band have been so loudly heralded in London, and such claims have been made as to the superiority of his orchestra over all others, that some curiosity was felt concerning its first appearance at the Albert Hall last night. It may be as well to say at once that no comparison can fairly be made between Mr. Sousa's orchestra and our own fine military bands. The latter are primarily constituted for playing in the open air, Mr. Sousa's is specially built up for concert room performances. It consists of four flutes, fourteen B flat clarinets, one solo E flat clarinet, one alto clarinet, one bass clarinet, two oboes, two bassoons, two alto saxophones, tenor saxophone, baritone saxophones, four cornets, one flugelhorn, two trumpets, four horns, three trombones, two euphoniums, four tubas, tympani and drums. The tubas are of very large scale, and their downward compass extends to the low E flat. This, combined with the other proportions of the band, renders it possible to secure a remarkably rich and full volume of tone. This fullness and the absence of "blare" from the brass instruments were prominent and pleasing characteristics of the performances yesterday. The concert was opened with our National Anthem, played, however, at so slow a tempo as to have a somewhat tunereal effect. It was followed by "The Star-Spangled Banner," the large audience remaining standing. The first work on the program was Goldmark's overture to "Sakuntala," and in this, and in Liszt's Fourteenth Hungarian Rhapsody, the band was heard at its best. In the former the effects of tone color were very fine, and in several instances beautiful; and in the latter the florid passages were rendered by the clarinets with remarkable brilliancy. The interpretation of an excerpt from Giordano's opera, "Andrea Chenier," was also a fine performance. In these transcriptions a high level of artistic excellence was attained, but in other pieces sensational effects were indulged in which detracted from the musical interest of the concert, although it is only fair to add that what was attempted was always accomplished, and testified to the great executive skill and to the perfect training of the instrumentalists. Encores were freely granted, and included the popular march from Mr. Sousa's comic opera, "El Capitan," and the familiar "Washington Post." Mr. Pryor showed extraordinary command of the trombone in a solo which included florid passages seldom associated with this instrument. Miss Minnie Tracey, who made her début in England on this occasion, is the possessor of a soprano voice of pleasing quality, which is well produced, and her rendering of the aria, "Il est doux," from Massenet's "Hérodiade," was expressive and finished. A successful appearance was made by Miss Dorothy Hoyle, a young violinist whose playing was distinguished by excellent qualities.

Earlier in the day Mr. Sousa was entertained at luncheon at the Trocadero Restaurant by a reception committee, with Sir Lewis McIver in the chair.—Standard, October 5.

SOUSA AND HIS BAND.

AMERICAN MARCH KING AT THE ALBERT HALL.

John Philip Sousa, who appeared for the first time in London last night at the Albert Hall, is a man of records, and has added another to his long list of triumphs.

The great hall has perhaps never been the scene of nine encores in a short first part of five pieces, and never before has it heard brass toned to such fine gradations of sonority until it vied in effect with the tones of the superb organ, which on this occasion only served to support the twin flags of England and America.

Sousa directs with his body as well as his soul. Whimsical it may be, but it has the force of authority. There is no beating of time; he dominates everything with his personality.

The band is absolutely balanced. That is its chief charm. The trombones and the basses are superb in their strength, the clarinets approach nearer the tones of the violins than any other brass band to which we have been privileged to listen. The phrasing and delicacy, the marvelous oneness, and the rhythmic precision of the fifty-two artists make up an effect that must be heard to be really understood.

It required a building of the size of the Albert Hall to hold all who flocked to hear this wonderful band; but one could not help thinking of the delight to be in the open air and hear this bright and fascinating music—the Palm Garden at Leipsic, for instance, with its quaint bandstand of shell-like shape. Here we love to take everything seriously.

For once, however, the solemnity of the home of oratorio had to give way to the uproarious appreciation of such things as the "Washington Post," played as none else in the world could play it, and "potpourris" of nigger melodies. The graceful actions of the conductor were hardly more interesting than the agility of the gentleman behind the drums, who rubbed sheets of sandpaper together and rapped on the floor with wonderful effect.

But with all the pleasantries and vigorous brilliance, real music crept in and asserted itself. Sousa's musical power was shown by his artistic accompaniment to the songs of Miss Minnie Tracey, whose encore—a serenade of Strauss—was exquisitely sung, as well as to the beautiful violin playing of Miss Dorothy Hoyle. Nor must the marvelous trombone solo by Arthur Pryor be passed over without at least a mention.

The enthusiasm of the audience reached high-water mark after the exhilarating "Stars and Stripes Forever"; but even "Rule Britannia," which came into one of the medleys, seemed to flow with renewed vigor when played by such a band as Sousa directs.

The band is to be heard again this afternoon and evening, and on Monday it appears at Glasgow.

Mr. Sousa was entertained at luncheon at the Trocadero Restaurant yesterday afternoon, the guests invited to meet him including G. R. Sims, Arthur Bourchier, Arthur Roberts, John Hollingshead and many theatrical and musical folk, besides a large number of newspaper men.

The health of the guest was proposed in a witty speech by Sir Lewis McIver, M. P., who presided, and was received with hearty enthusiasm.—Daily Express, October 5.

MR. SOUSA'S BAND.

CONCERT AT THE ALBERT HALL.

The visit of John Philip Sousa and his band has certainly excited curiosity in the musical world, for the Albert Hall was well filled last night when they made their first appearance in this country. The enterprise has scarcely been judiciously advertised, some of the statements concerning its superiority over every other band in existence being calculated to excite prejudice. As a matter of fact, comparison between Mr. Sousa's organization and our military bands cannot fairly be made, the American orchestra being especially formed with a view to performances in concert rooms only. A glance at its construction proves this. It consists of four flutes, two oboes, seventeen clarinets, including one E flat, one alto and one bass clarinet; two bassoons, four saxophones, comprising two alto, one tenor and one baritone; one flugelhorn, two trumpets, four cornets, four horns, three trombones, two euphoniums, four tubas, tympani and drums. The tone produced from this combination is remarkably rich, and individually the players are manifestly very skilled executants. They have been very highly trained in ensemble, and play with a precision and delicacy and light and shade which made their performances last night of Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, an excerpt from Giordano's "Andrea Chenier" and Liszt's Fourteenth Hungarian Rhapsody most enjoyable. In all these pieces great artistic excellence was achieved. Mr. Sousa is not only a clever conductor, but a very successful composer, and several of his marches, including the famous "Washington Post" and sundry selections were rendered with great spirit during the evening, but the performances of these was on a lower artistic level and not altogether free from touches of sensationalism. Miss Minnie Tracey and Miss Dorothy Hoyle made most successful appearances. The former is a soprano vocalist gifted with a fine voice, which has been admirably trained, and the latter is a young violinist who produces an excellent tone from her instrument and has acquired great executive facility. Remarkable skill was also shown by Arthur Pryor in a trombone solo. Mr. Sousa's band play this afternoon and evening.

RECEPTION AND LUNCHEON.

J. P. Sousa was entertained at a reception and luncheon earlier in the day at the Trocadero Restaurant, when Sir Lewis McIver presided over a gathering of journalists, actors and musicians, by whom the American conductor was welcomed. After the toast of "The King" had been duly honored, and followed by that of "The President of the United States," the chairman proposed "The health of John Philip Sousa." In a speech that was both cordial and humorous, he said his task was a simple but grateful one. It was to welcome in their name, and in the name of a far larger circle outside, a distinguished visitor and eminent artist—who, as an exponent of his art, splendidly voiced a language which was universal—and still more notably to receive one of our cousins. He tendered Mr. Sousa the heartiest and most affectionate welcome, and expressed the hope and belief that at the conclusion of his visit he would take away with unimpaired health memories of the old country at once pleasant and profitable. (Cheers.) They thought it very kind of the United States to have lent him for a time; it might be as an anticipatory consolation for our not winning the America Cup, or to spur us on to keener endeavor in the struggle with other nations for pre-eminence in that art of which Mr. Sousa was so famous an exponent. Or perhaps it was intended to suggest that, besides athletics, yacht building, steel construction, electrical installations and political wire-pulling, there were other things in which they could go one better. (Laughter.) In the British commercial market as in the singing world they were always prepared to welcome an improved method of production. (Laughter.) The presence of Mr. Sousa suggested a curious national characteristic which we seemed to be developing; it was a tendency to take a licking from other Anglo-Saxon nations, not only without ill-will, but with a kind of complacency—with a sort of reflected pride. The friendly rivalry of art and sport made wholly for good, and was fresh evidence of the warmth of feeling and an indication of that sense of brotherhood which inevitably grew from a common language and identical aspirations. (Cheers.) Mr. Sousa expressed his gratification at the welcome accorded him, and reciprocated the kindly feelings of relationship uttered by the chairman. Philip Yorke, managing director, then presented Mr. Sousa with a souvenir of his first professional visit to London. It was a jewel with an enameled picture of the Royal Albert Hall, having the British and American flags at either side, and the inscription, "Welcome, Sousa, 1901." Mr. Sousa acknowledged the gift in felicitous terms, and "The health of the chairman," proposed by John Hollingshead, concluded the proceedings.—The Morning Post, October 5.

THE MARCH KING AT THE ALBERT HALL.

First Appearance of Mr. Sousa and His Band.

Mr. Sousa, whom his admiring countrymen have dignified with the somewhat grandiose appellation of the "March King," made his first appearance in England as conductor of his famous band last night at the Albert Hall. It says much for the interest which his advent has excited that at a time when the holidays are barely over, and when the musical season can hardly be said to have begun, his appearance should have drawn an audience which filled the Albert Hall from floor to ceiling. It is true that Mr. Sousa's efforts hardly appeal to the class of musicians which frequents Queen's Hall and St. James' Hall. He is essentially a man for the people. Not that we desire to belittle his reputation on that account. Within certain limits his achievements are remarkable. To many people a wind band is a synonym for mere noise. Mr. Sousa proved last night how wide its range may be. He can be as noisy as anyone when he likes, but he has at command pianissimos of ethereal delicacy, and his management of the nicest gradations of sound is surprising. It is, of course, unfortunate that when he wants to play good music he has to fall back upon arrangements in which naturally the charm of the original score is to a certain extent lacking. Thus, Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, which was given last night after the concert had begun with "God Save the King" and "The Star-Spangled Banner," sounded rather monotonous in its altered form, admirably as it was played, and it was not until he passed to a somewhat bewildering arrangement of English airs, followed by his own "El Capitan" march, that the audience felt it was on terms with the real Sousa. After that the evening was a long triumph. Mr. Sousa was generous in the matter of marches, the popular "Washington Post" being, of course, included. Another number which was much appreciated was a suite of Mr. Sousa's own composition, the last section of which illustrated in amusing fashion the antics of a youthful "Alabama coon." The program was diversified by trombone and violin solos contributed by Arthur Pryor and Miss Dorothy Hoyle, and Miss Minnie Tracey, an American soprano, who has improved vastly since she sang at Covent Garden some dozen years ago, sang two songs in admirable style to an accompaniment conspicuous for exquisite delicacy. We may remind our readers that Mr. Sousa gives concerts to-day both in the afternoon and evening at the Albert Hall.—Daily Graphic, October 5.

MR. SOUSA'S BAND.

The much advertised appearance of Mr. Sousa's brass band began at the Royal Albert Hall last night. The first performance can only be written down as a great success, for the audience was enormous and very enthusiastic, and this enthusiasm was not misplaced. It is just possible that a portion may have found the program a little long, as, though it only contained nine numbers, encores were given with an unsparing hand, as many as three being played to Mr. Sousa's suite, including his "Washington Post," which received an ovation. The conductor has certainly trained his band till it has reached a very high degree of proficiency indeed. The performance by military bands of music written for string orchestras can never be wholly satisfactory. The clarinet is a very beautiful instrument in itself, but it is not a violin, and however skillfully it may be played it can never resemble that instrument in quality, timbre or flexibility. Goldmark's fine "Sakuntala" overture suffered to some extent from this, but it was certainly a remarkably good performance otherwise. Two of the most noticeable features of the band's playing are the richness of the tone produced and the really wonderful balance preserved. Few conductors indeed can have their orchestras under such control as Mr. Sousa. One is rather apt to connect his name with that which is noisy in music; the pianissimo, however, which he gets out of his band is remarkable, and nothing could have been better than his performance of a "Rococo" by Meyer-Helmund. Among the most successful of the other performances may be mentioned that given of Liszt's Fourteenth Hungarian Rhapsody, and of his own suite, "Three Quotations." He also, of course, included several of his famous marches, "The Stars and Stripes Forever" having to be repeated. The concert, taken as a whole, proved an admirable and most surprising lesson in the possibilities of a wind band when ably trained; and Mr. Sousa is to be complimented most heartily on the remarkable way in which he has his forces under control. Perhaps almost the best proof of this control was the great success which he achieved in accompanying the vocal solos of Miss Minnie Tracey, who sang an air from Gluck's "Alceste" in excellent style, and the violin solos of Miss Dorothy Hoyle, who played Saint-Saëns' "Rondo Capriccioso" with great neatness and taste. Arthur Pryor gave an excellent account of two trombone solos, playing the most florid passages with ease. The program opened with the British and American national airs.—Times, October 5, 1901.

THE SOUSA BAND.

For some years past, and more especially since the "Washington Post" and the "El Capitan" marches made the name of John Philip Sousa familiar to the public in this country, we have been waiting to hear the band which has won such a great reputation for itself on the other side of the Atlantic. Now, at last, with much booming of big guns, or perhaps we should say with much blowing of trumpets, Sousa and his band have made their début, and we had the opportunity last night of comparing them with similar organizations in our own country. Fortunately, however, we can criticise them without in any way disparaging such fine bodies of instrumentalists as either of the three Guards' bands, and those who are acquainted with the work of such bands as the Besses o' the Bârn, to whom we were introduced last year at the great band contest at the Crystal Palace, need no telling that we possess material that cannot be surpassed in any quarter of the globe. With these few remarks of a general nature we may pass on to consider the merits of the Sousa Band on the strength of what we heard last night. In the first place, we must pay tribute to the very fine tone which was noticeable in all they did and to the admirable technical skill which each individual instrumentalist undeniably possesses. Here was a good foundation for any conductor to build upon, and Mr. Sousa has certainly erected a musical structure which deserves the enthusiastic appreciation of amateurs. His program opened with a performance of the National Anthem and its American equivalent, and then we had an opportunity of hearing what could be done with music not intended originally for military bands. It is only a few nights since we heard Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture at the Queen's Hall, and naturally we missed not a few of its chief beauties, but, allowing for the absence of the violins and bass strings, Mr. Sousa secured a very admirable rendering. Another very excellent performance was that of Liszt's Fourteenth Hungarian Rhapsody, which more readily lends itself to brass band treatment. It was, however, in the typical pieces with which the Sousa Band is identified that the audience was excited to the most enthusiasm. Several of these came by way of encores, which were taken with a promptitude that was a little astonishing. Such popular airs as the "Washington Post," "El Capitan" March, "Hands Across the Sea," and "The Stars and Stripes Forever" brought down the house and were the most striking features of the entertainment. Mr. Sousa has a certain quaint method of conducting, and to the casual observer it would appear that it is done from the point of view of impressing the audience, rather than for any especial effect it may have on his orchestra, but he gets the required effects, and among the things for which he must be particularly complimented is the restrained and delicate manner in which he accompanied the vocal and instrumental soloists. These agreeable reliefs to the inevitable monotony of brass band playing consisted of a soprano solo by Miss Minnie Tracey, a singer with a light, pleasing voice; a trombone solo capitally rendered by Arthur Pryor, and a violin piece charmingly played by Miss Dorothy Hoyle. An American Fantaisie was the last item on the program, but this was supplemented by "The Star-Spangled Banner" and a repetition of "God Save the King."—The Morning Advertiser, October 5, 1901.

SOUSA'S BAND.

Debut at the Albert Hall.

Mr. Sousa's band, which made its first public appearance in this country at the Albert Hall last night, hold in America practically a unique position. In this country we have nothing exactly like it, for in England our crack military bands are greatly superior to the average army bands of the United States, while, on the other hand, private organizations for open air work in these isles have not the same opportunities of securing well paid engagements enjoyed by Mr. Sousa's orchestra in the holiday resorts on the Atlantic coast. Nevertheless Mr. Sousa's fame was chiefly won by those swinging marches, the captivating strains of which have long ago penetrated across the ocean, and are almost as popular in Europe as in the land of their birth. It was therefore, perhaps, a pity that Mr. Sousa did not announce more of the march element in his opening program at the Albert Hall last evening. He, it is true, played a good many of them among the encores which he accepted with true American liberality, but there must have been a large proportion of the Britons among the audience who failed to recognize them, until it occurred to a sensible attendant to place on the bandstand on a huge placard the name of the piece actually being performed. The "Washington Post," given as one of the encores to an American melody bearing the characteristic title of "A Nigger in the Woodpile," was, of course, recognized at once, but although the "Rag Time" March was vociferously applauded, few, we fear, knew its name. "Stars and Stripes Forever" was also well received, and so also was Mr. Sousa's "Hands Across the Sea," which was among the encore pieces. In these marches the American players are emphatically at their best, and it is a pity they did not more exclusively confine themselves to music of this sort, instead of trying a version of a Hungarian Rhapsody (a familiar item of Richter's repertory, but now played with comparatively little spirit), or the paraphrase of the finale from Giordano's "Andrea Chenier," an opera which has been performed in the United States, but is unknown here. Miss Minnie Tracey, too, would have been wiser to have sung some of her native American melodies rather than excerpts from French operas, which were not at all effective in the Albert Hall, although the admirable manner in which the vocal music was accompanied showed the pains which had been taken to cultivate this feature of the performance. A clever trombone player, Mr. Pryor, was much applauded for his rendering of a medley of tunes from Mr. Sousa's comic opera, "El Capitan," and Mr. Sousa's "Quotations," based, we believe, upon American melodies, found much favor. The tone of the band is peculiarly rich and refined, and it would be very interesting to hear them in the open air, where, after all, a wind band is most in its element. The players are also highly trained, answering the movements of the conductor's baton with much intelligence. No doubt the temptation to compare them with some of our own military bands is strong, but the proceeding would be invidious, and to a certain extent unmeaning. Mr. Sousa, on taking his place to commence his program with "God Save the King" and "Hail, Columbia," had a cordial reception from an audience which filled all but the more expensive seats, and among whom the American colony was, of course, largely represented. He will give further concerts at the Albert Hall this afternoon and evening, and will then be off to Glasgow to fulfill a month's engagement at the Exhibition. Then will come a provincial tour, and possibly another concert in London, when it is hoped the program will be formed mainly of American music and especially of Mr. Sousa's marches.—Daily News, October 5, 1901.

THE SOUSA BAND.

The audience which assembled at the Albert Hall last night, when Mr. Sousa and his band made their first appearance in London, if not an abnormally crowded one, certainly went far toward filling the vast building. As the composer of more than one of our most familiar and popular marches, Mr. Sousa has established a very widespread reputation; but until yesterday those who did not happen to hear the performances which he gave at the Paris Exhibition of 1890, or during the course of his Continental tours, had had no opportunity of judging him in his other capacity, that of bandmaster. The expectations raised by his much heralded advent here have naturally been high, and if he did not quite fulfill all of them last night he certainly scored an ample popular success. It was, naturally, in his own compositions that his merits as a conductor and the special qualities of his band were displayed in the best light. The printed program of his opening concert contained only two of his own works, the "Three Quotations" Suite, consisting of three short and effective numbers, each with a certain distinctive and appropriate atmosphere of its own, and the familiar "Stars and Stripes Forever" March; but early in the evening Mr. Sousa began a lavish succession of encore numbers, nearly all of which were wisely chosen from among the most popular of his own compositions, including "The Washington Post," the "El Capitan" March and "Hands Across the Sea." All of these were given with great precision and fire, and their spirited interpretation was greeted by the audience with very genuine and hearty enthusiasm. Of the more serious efforts of the evening the most successful was the selection given from Giordano's deservedly popular opera, "Andrea Chenier." An admirable sympathy was shown by the band in their accompaniment of Miss Minnie Tracey, Miss Dorothy Hoyle and Arthur Pryor, who appeared with success as soloists; and musicians hearing the American orchestra for the first time last night must have been struck throughout by the remarkable homogeneity into which Mr. Sousa has welded his forces and by the rich tone of his instruments. His interpretation of Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture was unfortunately lacking in poetic feeling—a defect hardly attributable entirely to the absence of stringed instruments—and his attempt to give Liszt's familiar Fantaisie on Hungarian Folktunes with the forces at his command was an obvious artistic error. In the main, however, the criticisms suggested by these two items are such as can always be advanced against any performance by a military band of works whose charm is lost when played by forces other than those for which they were primarily scored. It is, in fact, as the glorified ideal of the military band that Mr. Sousa and his players present themselves to us; and as such their visit is of an educational value quite apart from the evident interest and pleasure which it excites.—The Globe, October 6, 1901.

Richard Burmeister.—A new edition of Burmeister's "Persian Love Song" has just been published by the Rohlfing Sons Music Company for a high as well as for a low voice. Mr. Burmeister leaves this week for Boston, where he is to play Liszt's Concerto Pathetique with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A Concert Company.—Miss Nellie Allen Hessenbruch, a pianist of St. Louis, has joined a concert company of which Miss Sibyl Sammis is soprano and Ion Jackson is tenor. The company propose to make an Eastern trip.

EUROPEAN NOTES.

"Can a director of a theatre make a married artist sing in his theatre in spite of the formal refusal of her husband, especially when such refusal has been communicated?"

This legal question has been decided by the Civil Tribune of the Seine in the negative.

Moreover, the husband whose authority has been repudiated can demand damages.

M. Le Docte, a Belgian, married in 1897 Mlle. Jane Mercy. M. Gaudrey, director of the Grand Cercle at the watering place of Aix-les-Bains, wrote to M. Docte asking for his consent and confirmation of an engagement of his wife at the Grand Cercle.

"No," replied M. Docte, "I do not consent to what you demand, but I oppose in the most formal and absolute manner to Madame Le Docte continuing to follow a theatrical career."

But Madame Docte thought otherwise. She returned to the theatre and sang in "Manon," "Lakmé," "Romeo et Juliette," and other operas in her repertory.

M. Le Docte without hesitation brought suit against the director of the Grand Cercle for the modest sum of 50,000 francs.

The director of the Grand Cercle said that he could not represent in court the Society of the Grand Cercle, of which he was merely the manager, and the court held that plea good, but condemned the manager personally to pay 3,000 francs damages to the husband.

Karl Fetzlaff, the famous stage manager of Berlin, will soon retire. He made his fame by his mounting of "Die Fledermaus" in 1870. He was stage manager in Dresden 1879-1881, then went to Vienna, and since 1890 has labored at Berlin.

The competitors for the Wagner monument at Berlin are at work on new models, as none of the old ones was satisfactory. The sculptor who may receive the commission for executing the monument to Brahms at Hamburg has not yet been chosen. The report that Max Klinger had been chosen is contradicted.

The death of the 'cellist Louis Marsick at Liege is announced. He was for forty-six years a member of the Royal Theatre orchestra, and a teacher in several institutions.

The monument erected to Beethoven in 1880 at Vienna is to be turned round. When first erected it stood in a quiet square, to which the little River Wien, with the old trees on its banks, formed a background. But since that time great changes have taken place. The Riven Wien is covered over, the trees are cut down and there is much traffic. The Viennese are now vexed to see Beethoven turn his back upon them, and so the municipal council has decided that he shall execute a right about face. In place of looking westward he will henceforward look to the east; instead of looking toward the Rhine he will look toward Hungary. The designer of the monument, Zumbusch, is still alive, and will superintend the work.

At Dresden a Frenchman has triumphed in the list of performances. Wagner's "Tannhäuser" was given twelve times, but Saint-Saëns' "Samson" twenty times. The latter was a novelty for Dresden; the former, perhaps, they had grown tired of.

Josef Rebicek celebrated, October 1, his fortieth anniversary as an artist. He first appeared October 1, 1861, as violinist in the Weimar Court Orchestra; in the following year was recalled to his native city of Prague as concertmaster of the National Theatre; in 1868 he left Prague and became concertmaster at Wiesbaden. Here he distinguished himself in symphony and chamber concerts as well as in the theatre, and tried his hand at opera conducting. In 1881 he went to Warsaw, and ten years later to Budapest, when three years later he returned to Wiesbaden. On October 1, 1897, he assumed the position of director of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra. He is also distinguished as a composer of chamber music and pieces for violin, piano and orchestra. He is now in his fifty-seventh year, in the fullness of all his powers and is likely to retain the highest esteem of the artist world, the critics and the public.

A posthumous work by Ponchielli, the author of "Gioconda," is announced as nearly ready for publication at Milan. It is entitled "I Mori di Valenza." The score is not quite finished, but will be completed by Annibale Ponchielli, the son of the composer.

The centenary of Bellini will be celebrated at his birthplace, Catania. There will be an exhibition of Bellini relics and souvenirs, a grand procession will lay crowns on his tomb and on his monument; a "Hymn to Bellini," by Platinia, director of the Conservatory of Parma, will be sung; all the military bands in Italy will be there, and a grand musical season will be inaugurated at the Theatre Bellini, at which nothing but Bellini's works will be given.

The Deutsche Kunst Zeitung, of Vienna, says that the departure of Trangott Ochs from the Brünn Music Society has given rise to some trouble. There are four competitors applying for the vacant part of conductor, but Richard Wickenhausser, whom a strong party desires, is not one. The explanation given by the journal is that he is an anti-Semite, and that a majority of members of the society would resign were he appointed.

The Artavia collection of autographs, lately acquired by the Royal Library of Berlin, consists of part of Beethoven's works purchased by Dominick Artavia in 1827, when he bought for seven gulden the "Missa Solemnis" and the finale of the Ninth Symphony. He purchased altogether ninety-three numbers by Beethoven, among them the piano sonates (op. 110 and 111). Haydn is represented in the collection by thirty-two numbers and copies of 120 string and flute trios, mostly unpublished. The collection has also manuscripts by Schubert, Rossini, Salieri and Paganini; two numbers by Mozart, one of which is a beautiful copy in his own hand of the F minor composition written for the mechanism of a clock. After the death of Dominick Artavia's son the collection was offered for sale and fears were expressed that it might be bought by Americans. To prevent this Dr. Erich Prieger determined to purchase it for 200,000 marks, and offered it at cost price to the Prussian Minister of Fine Arts, but four years elapsed before it became the property of the Royal Library at Berlin.

The new Philharmonic Society of Paris proposes to give twenty concerts, on Friday of each week after November 22. The programs will be of vocal and instrumental music and chamber music, interpreted by the most celebrated artists.

Engagements have been made with the quartets Geloso, Hayot and Parent, of Paris; Marteau, of Geneva; Ysaye, of Brussels; Soldat, of Vienna; the Tcheck Quartet, of Prague; the Trio Chaigneau, of Paris, and the Trio Heermann, of Frankfort. Soloists engaged are: Vocal, Madames El. Blanc, Marie Olénine, G. Vicq Henschel; piano, Messrs. D'Albert, Bauer, Busoni, Chevillard, Cortot, Lamond, Risler, Stavenhagen; Madames Th. Carreño, Thérèse Chaigneau and Cécile Silberberg; violin, Messrs. Geloso, Hayot, H. Heermann, Marteau, Rebner, Rivarde, Ten Have, Ysaye, &c. It is probable that other names may be added to the list.

Late accounts of Abbé Perosi's "Moses" report that it is divided into three parts and a prologue; the characters are Moses, Pharaoh, Aaron, Rachel, Zipporah, Miriam and the head of the Hebrew family, and "the voice of Jehovah." The choruses are varied and numerous. The text is taken from Exodus, chapters 2, 3, 4, 5, 12, 13, 14 and 15, and is described as remarkable for its grandeur and elevation.

As soon as "Moses" was finished the indefatigable Abbé set to work on a new piece, to be called "The Apocalypse."

At Rome a regimental band announced on its program: "Wagner—The Nibelungen March." It was Siegmund's "love song" in the first act of "Die Walküre," arranged in march time. This horrifies a correspondent of the Ménéstrel, but that journal reminds him that Wagner was much flattered at hearing a military band at Venice take its whole program from his works. But a love song a pas redoublé!

At a late performance of "The Flying Dutchman," at Elberfeld, the role of Senta was played by Della Rogers, who both vocally and dramatically was the star of the soloists. The Elberfelder Zeitung writes: "Frl. Della Rogers pleased us exceedingly as Senta. Her playing and singing harmonized very well; her voice is clear and fresh,

The pianist Busoni has this year, as last, occupied part of the Temple in the Park of Weimar, and gathered round him a number of talented and well-advanced pupils.

E. Jaques Balcroze succeeds Prof. L. Ketten as director of the singing society of the Conservatory of Geneva.

The composer, Von Fielitz, after a long residence in Rome, has settled in Berlin as teacher in the Stern Conservatory.

The ten selected artists who are working at new designs for the Wagner statue at Berlin all represent him sitting, as his erect figure was not heroic enough. The jury will decide as to the best model November 1.

No final determination respecting the continuation of the Bayreuth Festival next year has yet been reached. There is to be a council at Wahnfried in the latter part of this month to settle the question.

A search in some church documents proves that Albert Lortzing was born on the 23d of October, 1801, not in 1803, as the musical dictionaries and lexicons assert. This month then really contains the centenary of his birthday.

Mascagni is working on a new opera, the text of which, by Illica, is based on Russian peasant life. The long talked of "Roland of Berlin," by Leoncavallo, will be produced in Berlin at the beginning of next year. On October 26 the first performance of a new opera, "Chopin," music by Orefice, took place at Sonzogno's Teatro Lirico, in Milan.

A direct descendant of J. S. Bach is making a poor living as piano teacher at Erfurt. Hermann Bach is fifty years old, and is gifted with a remarkable musical memory that enables him to reproduce even long compositions when he has once heard them.

The project of rebuilding the Court Theatre at Weimar has been abandoned.

Arnold Dolmetsch a Bankrupt?

ACCORDING to an eminent music trade paper Arnold Dolmetsch, the collector and expert and lecturer, &c., has recently been examined in a bankruptcy court, with liabilities of $3,000 and assets of about $1,900, the failure being due to a liability of a lease. Mr. Dolmetsch is a Swiss, and is the original Mr. Innes, the father of Evelyn Innes, in George Moore's novel of that name. We hope that Mr. Dolmetsch will not be misinterpreted in this unfortunate affair and that his difficulties will soon be translated into more propitious circumstances.

MINNE HUMPHRYES.—Mrs. Minne Humphryes, the church and concert soprano, will soon leave New York to fill engagements in the West. Her manager is in Ohio, and there will arrange additional dates for this artist.

VERSUS PHILIP HALE, POOR MAN!

BOSTON, Monday.

Dear Musical Courier:

I SEE by this week's issue of your paper that you are once more following your pernicious habit of not permitting your critics (alleged!) to speak the truth. Now, there's Phil. Hale! I've known Phil. since he was a boy. I had a hand in his education. I know that as the critic for a daily paper he cannot ventilate his true pent up emotions, and I always hoped that as an associate of yours he might be allowed to write just what his musical acumen dictates. Of course you wouldn't write against the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the world, and so you have probably given poor Mr. Hale spiritual advice in advance. I attended the Boston opening, and wished I had spent my money on "Florodora," up on Broadway. Why? Well, I might as well tell you at once that as a musician, trained before the mast, I am accustomed to orchestras which are led by the director, and not to one which takes the director by the hand and conducts him! That's the Boston epidemic now. Take my word for it! You know me! That orchestra, and this is not after dinner either, is the finest in the world! Such material! Such instruments! Such individual intelligence! And the management! Where can you find men like Higginson, with his brown trousers; Ellis, of the genial heart; copious Fred. Comee, and that fine, kindly man, L. H. Mudgett? Wouldn't these brains build up any organization from Tammany Hall, the D. A. R.'s, to the Mafia? I "guess" they would! Now, what is the difficulty? They have the hall, the orchestra, the management, but not the director. Saturday night I wanted to be umpire, and call down good paternal advice to Gericke, but I was afraid of waking up the audience he had so carefully put to sleep! It wasn't a square deal anyway.

You know, if you remember anything outside of the trusts, that "Academic Overture" of Brahms'! Well, after the men came on the stage and knelt in prayer to Kneisel, they yawned and stretched themselves and then Gericke came along. He had on clothes, but not much hair. It took some time for him to get his glasses on, and then when Mr. Higginson squeezed a dollar to make the eagle mourn—they were off! It was a great start! The men were just a little ahead of the director, but he jumped a hurdle and caught them. It's sad enough when Brahms tries to be kittenish through the medium of a full orchestra and a heavy score, but it's sadder still when a director works like yeast to see the joke, to be young, joyous, devil-may-care in the seeing. Gericke didn't do this. He took it seriously. It hurt his feelings. It made you feel like rag-time at a funeral. That's probably the way it made him feel. Then when salty tears were gathering, ouf!—the men got ahead! But Gericke's a routined director and was—out on first! He felt so pleased, it was such a surprise! The men looked quite annoyed, as they had evidently counted on winning. I lost $10 betting on the men, because I know and believe in them. There's Kneisel, and Schroeder and Loeffler—I felt sure they would win. Life is full of these disappointments; you know how it is. While my dismay was still fresh from the bat, a shock of black hair and a pair of "googling" brown eyes escorted a 'cello on the stage. It was Gérardy! Play! He struck into the broad opening movement of the Lalo Concerto, and somebody behind me dropped a brass button down my back and all my hair sat up. This little, wee, titan possesses tone, temperament, trills, technic to beat the whole band back of him! Such a sincere, manly youngster, such sincere, manly art is a rarity even in these days. Did you ever notice his down-bow staccato? Then again legato playing as he has it in his wrist is a gift, a direct g... Another feature is, if Gérardy sings the same theme a hundred times—and you know how Lalo treats his them—he sings it differently. It tells a new phase of the story. While he is essentially a temperamental player, he never overdoes; you don't find him portamentoing up and down the strings or exuding undue sentiment. The trouble is that an untemperamental conductor is a skull and cross-bones to a temperamental soloist; the orchestra pulled back badly at times, but Gérardy woke up the audience just the same. This was a treat indeed, and one felt braced for the Liszt number.

It's a curious study about magnetic currents. A man like Paur or Nikisch holds his men as in a vice from the moment he steps on the stage. Gericke or Thomas establishes it only at times. You can see it born and wane and disappear. Gericke starts in all right for a climax—the kind he knows about, you know; he goes along for a few bars when suddenly he loses hold of the men and that climax cometh not. Same thing, when the men work up momentum to a high pitch, where drums, trumpets, pianos, aeolians, &c., are all toiling, he can't work them down to a pianissimo until the middle of the next number. The Boston cannot have true artistic climaxes or pianissimos because there is no architect there to build them. What is a symphony without shading, nuance, color? This is to get us over the Liszt number mentioned above. I want to forget it. You know how effective the full stop of the orchestra is, and how the silence throbs and throbs with anticipation of the continuation of the story. When the Boston Symphony strikes a rest, it stops—just stops—that's all, and it's a time for conversation. It is more irritating when an organization like this continually misses it than anything you can conjure up. An orchestra cannot play itself. Already the standard raised by Nikisch and Paur has been lowered, although the orchestra itself has improved. The woodwinds have been augmented you know and they do great work. I never heard the theme for oboe in the Beethoven Seventh played so beautifully, and the duet for two oboes and two clarinets was delightful.

The second movement was flawless. Mr. Gericke's ability to color and contrast was never more apparent than in the Scherzo and Trio. You remember all the "tooling" the woodwinds have to do in this movement with the drawn tones or pedal points (any old thing you want to call them), which stand still on one note and whistle. Well, my wife said to me: "Pro Bono, can't you be still"; but I just writhed in agony. I thought the whole world consisted of unshaded pedal points and "toothing" tubes. You ought to hear Paur color and shade this difficult movement, which sounds frivolous and even impudent after the grandeur of the second movement unless it is played with refined understanding. The finale has wonderful scoring, hasn't it? Think of the trumpets and violins fighting against the woodwinds! Still the strings were less numerous in Beethoven's time, we mustn't forget that. The last movement was a scramble, a run-for-your-life scramble—and then I came away. The audience was not once aroused to spontaneous applause save by Gérardy. This is the whole truth and I am sorry Phil. isn't permitted to tell it. What's the use of having a critic if you coach him all the time? Still he has troubles of his own! An organist and a music critic in Boston! That would feaze a harder man than Hale.

I could write lots more, but I am tired now, and my wife says the beer is getting stale. Any time you want

MME. LUISE REUSS-BELCE.

N the Maurice Grau Opera Company for this season appears the name of Mme. Luise Reuss-Belce as ima donna for the grand Wagnerian roles. This artist longs to the singers who have sung in "Parsifal" at Bay-ıth, under Richard Wagner. Later she sang in Carls-he, under Felix Mottl, the roles of Elizabeth, Elsa d Sieglinde. In Wiesbaden she sang at the Kaiser tivals Sieglinde, Venus, Brünnhilde and Isolde. Here Amcrica she will sing Isolde in San Francisco, where ristan" will be given for the first time. She has col-)orated at Bayreuth for many years, and especially as icka in the "Rheingold" and in the "Walküre," with ex-ordinary success. The Colnische Zeitung writes re-cting her:

mong the goddesses as the greatest performance the Fricka of dame Reuss-Belce must be singled out. In perfection of style, lignity and chiseling, in song and gesture, she presented a classi-model of dramatic vocal art.

The Musicalische Wochenblatt:

thoroughly excellent performance which came well into the ground was the Fricka of Madame Reuss-Belce, whose great e in the second act of the "Walküre" depicted the indignant nan, the protector of family life enraged by the violation of holy rimony. Madame Reuss-Belce showed in everything how pene-ed she was by her mighty task, of the importance of the person-represented by her, and in every tone and word was a grand st.

Concerning her Sieglinde the Wiesbaden Journal writes:

ll her mimetic and vocal resources Madame Reuss-Belce knows to employ in sovereign fashion, and even in the inspired out-st of passion she never overstepped the artistic standard of the of beauty. Her expressive play, with its grand, noble lines, at scizes us, but how she acting sings, and singing speaks, and king accentuates—this thorough interpretation of song and play ls the public fast from the first bar to the last. Her Sieglinde no theatre figure in the usual line. The artist was this evening linde herself.

The Rheinische Kaiser writes:

er yesterday's Sieglinde demonstrates Frau Reuss-Belce to be oroughly eminent artist. Her exemplary declamation, her fiery throughout to the smallest details, the whole style of her musi-delivery, supported by beautiful vocal resources, well schooled capable of all modulations, matured in the Wagner traditions, make us recognize her as a genuine modern stage singer. To these qualities are united her poetic appearance, and her effective facial expression, lit up by a speaking eye, to incorporate in most expressive fashion the touchingly beautiful Sieglinde. With a compelling power, with a deep warmth of feeling, Frau Reuss-Belce made her part in the love duet with Siegmund one of splendid authority. The "grand gestures" which Wagner demanded and the glowing speech of genuine passion let us have a presentiment of what kind of Isolde Frau Reuss-Belce will be. When the great tragedian Ludwig Barnay saw Frau Reuss-Belce as Sieglinde he exclaimed: "She is the German Bellincioni."

Before her journey to America Frau Reuss-Belce sang, at the Royal Court Theatre of Dresden, Brünnhilde in the "Götterdämmerung," on which it was said in the Dresdener Nachrichten:

In the very first scene the artist convinced us that we had to do with a distinguished singer, with a singer who can measure herself with the best Brünnhildes. Taking it all in all, we have scarcely seen here a better Brünnhilde. Only a perfect artist of soul painting delivery like Frau Reuss-Belce can sing into the heart with such beautiful and touching power the noble daughter of Wotan. All the details seemed worked out spiritually and intellectually to the finest point, yet the whole alone seemed called out before us by these inspired demands of the moment. The beautiful, powerful enhancement, the marvelous growth of the noble character, the victorious execution of the role, all this worked in favor of the artist. The success was complete. The storm of applause would never cease.

The Dresdener Anzeiger writes about the same role:

Frau Reuss-Belce presented a figure of imposing greatness, in which the divinity and the humanity of this "Walküre" were harmoniously united, a form of a unity and sharpness of characteristic which enchained one in the highest degree, of passion and feeling, of a power of expression which was of the most powerful effect. The agony over Siegfried's perjury and treachery, the despair over the lamentable deception were impressively presented, while the tragic side of this powerful, womanly figure achieved its highest expression. Hence, we never looked at the theatrical poses, but always to the beautiful gestures, a proof of the æsthetic, fine feeling of the artist. The vocal performance of the singer stood on an equal height with her dramatic art. Her voice is grand and sonorous, always filled with soul; the organ follows the will of the singer unwearicdly when it is required to express passionate agitation, deep tones of the heart, sharp, dramatic accents, sincerity and coldness. The performance was one to which one had to give undivided interest. The public was electrified and never wearied of countless demonstrations of applause.

Richard Kleinmichel Dead.

RICHARD KLEINMICHEL, the editor of the German occasional musical paper, the Leipsic Signale, is dead at the age of fifty-five. He arranged a great many Italian and German operas for Berthard Senff, of Leipsic, the original editor of the Signale, in addition to having made easy arrangements of Wagner operas for piano. He died at Charlottenburg, Berlin.

E. M. BOWMAN IN PENNSYLVANIA.—E. M. Bowman, the organist and teacher, is conducting the nineteenth annual meeting this week of the Musical Alliance, of Lackawanna and Wyoming counties, at Factoryville, Pa. Two concerts will be given to-morrow and Friday. Bessie M. Bowman is the chief soloist.

MARY LOUISE CLARY.—Mary Louise Clary will make a short trip to the West next week, singing, among other places, in concerts and recitals in Wheeling and Parkersburg, W. Va., and Steubenville, Ohio. On her return she will be heard in a big concert in this city, November 8.

PHILADELPHIA, October 19, 1901.

THE outlook for the coming season in Philadelphia is a bright one. Although a great many of those directly interested in the musical life of the city are still away, yet every day brings back more familiar faces, and by November 1 practically all will have returned.

Foremost in importance before the local musical public at the present time is the Philadelphia Orchestra and its plans for the future. This worthy organization has every reason to look forward to a season of more than ordinary success. The friction which arose some time ago between the local Musical Union and the orchestra management on the point of supplementing local talent (where the same proved insufficient in either quality or quantity) with professional musicians, chosen either from foreign or domestic ranks, has in some measure abated. It seems to be the general opinion of press and public that the matter will end in the near future by the union removing the objections they have upheld. It might be said in passing that a dispute of this nature is not a new occurrence by any means. The same thing had to be gone through by the Boston Symphony Orchestra before that organization became what it is to-day. This also might be said of many others. There is an interesting fact that ought not to be overlooked while the present disagreement is in progress. When the Philadelphia Symphony Society was founded some nine or ten years ago by a number of amateurs it was with the expressed intention of opening up the way for a professional symphony orchestra like that in Boston, that would bring praise and dignity to Philadelphia, and make the city to some extent a musical centre. The old society worked quietly and patiently, giving three concerts every year, but always with the idea of finally merging into a professional orchestra kept well in mind.

This task has now been accomplished and the Philadelphia Symphony Society retires satisfied that their work has been done well.

In view of these facts it seems a little ungrateful to the faithful few of the old society that a quarrel of this kind should have arisen out of their efforts. While Mr. Scheel is in Europe there is necessarily a dearth of news. He returns the latter part of this month, at which time I shall be able to announce definitely the number of foreign musicians he has secured, as well as a general idea of the program for the season and many other items of interest which are now either unknown or only to be guessed at.

The Kneisel Quartet will give a series of five concerts at Witherspoon Hall at 2:45 o'clock on the Monday afternoons of November 11, December 16, January 20, February 24 and March 24.

Seats for the first series of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city have been entirely taken by the old subscribers.

The Choral Society of Philadelphia will sing Bach's B minor Mass on April 16. The soloists are Mrs. Hissem De Moss, Gertrude May Stein, John F. Braun and Carl E. Dufft. The first concert of the society will be held on December 30, when "The Messiah" will be given with the following soloists: Miss Estelle Liebling, Mrs. Emily Stuart Kellogg, Ellison Van Hoose and Whitney Tew.

Nicholas Douty will sing Bach's Passion Music according to St. Matthew with the Mozart Club of Pittsburg early in the season.

HENRY I. MAGEE.

BAERNSTEIN'S FIFTH ENGAGEMENT IN DETROIT.—Last season Baernstein went a perfect stranger to Detroit to appear as soloist with the Symphony Orchestra. His success was so remarkable that he was re-engaged for their next concert. Although hardly possible, his success was even greater than the first, and a third engagement followed immediately. Ordinarily, three appearances in one season will suffice for a city the size of Detroit, but not so when Baernstein is the soloist. There was a popular demand for a fourth engagement, and he returned to satisfy the music lovers of that city, who seemed never to hear enough of this artist's work, and now, lo! behold, for the fifth time they bring him back to sing the part of Mephistopheles in Gounod's "Faust."

MUSIC OF THE FUTURE.

Editors The Musical Courier:

DEAR SIR—Now that this solemn mockery is o'er, n that this tyranny is over past, now that "Parsifal' wrapped up in jewelers' cotton and tissue paper till n called for, there seems to be a general feeling of dis pointment about the last Bayreuth festival. The Fre chortle in their joy and say "I told you so"; the Germ are sad at the terrible price of Bayreuth beer, the Am cans lay the blame on amalgamated copper, what the E lish say I do not know. But all find fault with F Cosima Wagner. Most unjustly I think. I remem the days when everybody said: "Only at Bayreuth justice done to the master's creations. There are the t traditions, there are no blasphemous innovations. Th you can see the Rhine maidens, there you can see flower maidens, there you can see the Fafner and h the 'Yo-ho-te-ho' of the Walkuren as the master ordere In fact, in those old days nothing but the traditions Bayreuth were any good. And now people complain Frau Wagner's adherence to these traditions. Rich Wagner was a bahnbrecher, a pioneer, an epoch mak what you will, and like all such men, he believed nobody had had similar ideas before him, and that nob ought to have any ideas at all after him. A good of water has run beneath the bridge since the first B reuth performances; our tastes have changed, our sources are enlarged, what we liked then we do not now; in fact, we are a good deal older. This fact F Cosima, like other ladies, is apt to forget. I believe has the true traditions and tries to carry them out Richard insisted they ought. Therefore I say we ou to respect the reverence she displays in her managem of Bayreuth, and not lay all the blame on her conse tivism.

But I did not begin to write about Cosima and l things, but to congratulate you on the change of min your writers, who have come to the conclusion a we have had too much of Wagner. I was delighte read in your last number a confession, that a dear fr of mine, "speaking as a man and not as a critic, I put y self down in black and white as wearied of Wagn (Chorus: "So say all of us!") Lohengrin he finds al unendurable. It is tedious to sleepiness, and then s relates how he is obliged to adopt artificial means to himself on to hear an opera which once on a time, in callow youth, he dubbed a divine revelation. ur last number is dated September, 1901, and curiously ough it reminded me of an article written from Vienna November, I think, of 1878, by a gentleman who says had spared "neither trouble nor self abnegation in work- , as it were, at his 'Nibelungen' education." He had been Bayreuth," where "material annoyance," probably the ality or the price of beer, made his irritability into exas- ation, and therefore he tried the quieter air of Vienna. om that imperial city he wrote:

'In direct contradiction to the composer's original as- ance that the 'Tetralogy' could and should be repre- ted at the Bayreuth Stage Festival Playhouse only, we ve beheld it for the last year, covering, like a gigantic d-spider, all Germany with its white threads. Prodigious wds and enthusiasm everywhere mark the early perform- es of it, but these, it would appear, do not last. A con- erable portion of the public, after their first curiosity s been appeased, discover that the enjoyment is far too iguing—nay, that it is absolutely overpowering, and that y are seldom equal to it. A smaller number frankly confess that the total impression of a 'Nibelungen' evening, or of several such evenings in succession, should not be called enjoyment at all, but torture. It is to this unfortunate fraction that I myself belong." And after allusions to his visit to Bayreuth and the performances at Vienna he continues; that even there "I experienced neither improvement nor pleasure. It was of itself a remarkable and fatal sign that I had to exert pressure on myself every time I went to a performance." The more he heard of "Nibelungen" opera the more disagreeable it was. He could not but confess to himself that he could live exceedingly long and be exceedingly happy without ever seeing one of the four Bayreuth operas again; for the more he heard them the more unnatural and unlovely they seemed. He wrote, too, of Wagner's vein of melody drying up, and concludes:

"Without being insensible to the isolated beauties in 'Siegfried,' I left the theatre with an irrepressible feeling, not that I had experienced any enjoyment, but that I had suffered martyrdom. Yes, it is, indeed, martyrdom, to see a wretched and partially repulsive plot dragged along laboriously for five hours, in atrocious German, by antiquated gods, ugly dwarfs, and ridiculous fairy animals. It is martyrdom to be under the necessity of listening to music rising and falling between drunkenness and nothingness, and which, with painfully restless modulations, in eternally over-excited chromatics and enharmonics, with a lamentable monotony of cutting chords of the ninth and eleventh, tugs away at our nerves. It is martyrdom to have to sit out a long opera without chorus, without concerted pieces or finales, nay, till quite close to the termination, without any female voices—an opera in which the singers do not sing, but declaim in the most unnatural leaps over intervals, and yet are unable, unless we uninterruptedly peruse the book, to make us comprehend what they are declaiming."

So 1878 and 1901 agree, and both will agree with one sentence of the writer I am quoting: "All genuine works of art, even such as strike us as strange or repugnant, leave behind in our breasts a desire to hear them again. Tone poems of pure classic beauty, can we ever hear them often enough?"

What does the world want to-day? Dare I say not music drama, not program music, but absolute music, and vocal music with simple accompaniments.

Excuse my tediousness, and, if you like, incoherence, and believe me, Yours,

P. Q. R.

Sansone Gives a Bach Recital.

IT will be interesting to read the subjoined criticism from the Chicago Record of October 18, 1901, of the Bach recital by the Italian violinist Errico Sansone:

In the Auditorium Recital Hall last evening Maestro Errico Sansone, late professor of violin in the Naples Conservatory and now a member of the Auditorium Conservatory of Music and Dramatic Art faculty, of which Frederic Grant Gleason is director, gave the first of a series of recitals which he has arranged for the present season. The program was devoted exclusively to the music of Johann Sebastian Bach, and opened with a concerto in A minor for violin and piano. It received a most artistic interpretation, being played with a beautiful tone and highly finished phrasing, the soloist being ably seconded by Miss Fay Hill, who gave the piano part with fine intelligence and a variety of shading not often found in Bach interpretations.

The second number was the Sonata in D minor (No. 4), for the violin alone, rarely if ever played as a whole, but closing with the well-known chaconne, which is such a favorite display number with violinists who are able to cope successfully with its difficulties. The giga, which preceded it, won warm manifestations of approval from the audience, but after the chaconne, which was played with superb accuracy and fire, Maestro Sansone was twice recalled, and played for an encore a Siciliano from the G minor Sonata. The fact of a violinist securing an enthusiastic encore after a number on a Bach program is certainly noteworthy.

The recital closed with a trio in C minor for piano, flute and violin, in which Sig. Giuseppe Vecchione assisted in the flute part. Of the four numbers of which it consisted the largo is perhaps the most beautiful, being somewhat suggestive in certain movements of the flute part of the score in the "Elysian Fields" in Gluck's "Orpheus," but this only in the matter of mood and not of content. All three artists played con amore, and Signor Vecchione added greatly to the general effect by the sympathetic quality of his flute playing. Maestro Sansone and Miss Hill both gave artistic and finished renditions of their respective parts, and under their skillful hands the trio was most enjoyable, forming an excellent climax to the evening's program.

SEVERN PUPIL ENGAGED.—Miss Laura W. Wheeler, a pupil of Edmund Severn, has been engaged as first violinist of the Fadette (ladies') Orchestra, of Boston.

TIVADAR NACHEZ.—Here are two more of the violinist's European press notices:

The enthusiasm called out by the playing of Tivadar Nachez was fully justified. This son of Hungary is a violinist of the most stupendous virtuosity, mastering the most hair-raising, breath-checking difficulties with astonishing sureness and impeccability, while he displays at the same time the qualities of a grand, richly flowing, warm tone, combined with a fiery yet intellectual mode of expression.—Signale, November, 1894.

Dresden.—The rarest thing in the world of art is perfection, and yet it was this that seized the public at the concert yesterday. When Tivadar Nachez sounded the first bars of Tartini and Ben Davies opened his mouth to sing, the audience felt the deepest respect for the true artistic spirit which gave it such a treat. Yesterday, during the concerto of Bruch, in the concluding theme of the adagio and in the glowing rhythms of the "All' Ongarese," we doubt whether the prize should be given to Sarasate or Nachez.

Of the violinist it can be said that such noble, sweet beauty of tone, with grandeur and inspiration, is reached only by Sarasate. While he with the G and D strings took possession of us like a human mezzo voice by warmth, he exhibited the highest charm and astounding purity in the full passages. Remarkable is his bowing; never arises any sharpness, the elegance of form is always preserved. In the cases of Bazzini or Paganini something like daring deviltry springs from the audacious passages and trills. But in the cantilene and the song in thirds and octaves, than which none purer can be imagined (what enjoyment in Bruch's Concerto), Herr Nachez is so self-concentrated that we hear only the musician, not the virtuoso, whose whole soul streams forth in wonderful melody.—Ludwig Hartmann, Dresdener Zeitung, November 2, 1894.

LITURGICAL MUSIC.—The first meeting of the class for the study of the liturgical music of the Protestant Episcopal Church was held at the American Institute of Applied Music on Thursday last, and was well attended. Under the able direction of Thomas Egbert Perkins the class will be of great value and interest to organists and choir singers.

Mme. Liza Delhase-Wickes, pianist; Alfred Donaldson Wickes, violinist; McCall Lanham, baritone, and William Fairchild Sherman, accompanist, will give a recital at the institute, Friday evening, October 25.

CARL TO GIVE A BENEFIT CONCERT.—A concert will be given in the chapel of the "Old First" Presbyterian Church, on Tuesday evening, October 29, at 8 o'clock, for the benefit of the endowment fund, under the direction of William C. Carl, assisted by Mrs. Mary Elizabeth Cheney, soprano; Mrs. Antonia Sawyer, contralto; E. Ellsworth Giles, tenor; Edward Bromberg, baritone; Alfred Donaldson Wickes, violinist, and Mme. Liza Delhase-Wickes, pianist.

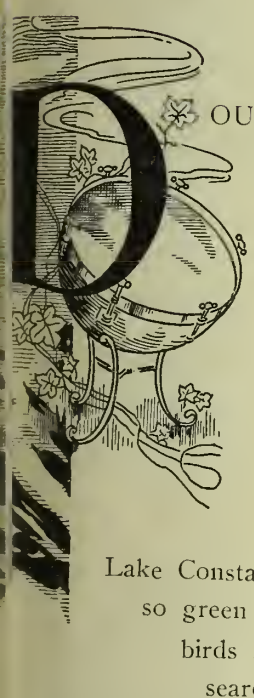
IN OLD AUTEUIL AND PARIS.

BY JAMES HUNEKER.



DOUBTLESS there are lovelier views in the world than the one that presents itself of a cool, clear September morning as you leave Lindau and sail towards Romanshorn on Lake Constance—the Bodensee of the Germans—but if there are I never witnessed one. Lake Constance is as green as Erin, so green that the bellies of the birds hovering over its bosom searching for fish are tinged emerald tints. The distant view of the rlberg and Apenzell Alps is enlivening; but, all and done, it is the color of the water, its soothsmoothness and the pink mist that garbs the of the mountains at your back that woo and you. Zürich is more picturesque, for, lying as es at the foot of Lake Zürich and on the green Linmat, it presents a variety of charms. The nt Alps, the broad quays, the villas hidden by poetic poplars—surely the most distinguished that grow—enchant one. I had only three ; and preferred driving about to visiting the al, where William Tell's bow and Zwinglius' axe are on view. There is a Romanesque dral and St. Peter's Church, where Lavater hed; but the abiding attraction is the lake. After driving about it I began to underwhere Böcklin found his dream-like villas emed in melancholy poplars. He was a Swiss is landscapes are truly Swiss in character. the implacable clock told me of the train for a, and I was forced to leave Zürich, after a handclasp.

raveling from Germany to Switzerland it is ting to note the gradual modulation from m to French. In Lindau German prevails. Romanshorn; but in Zürich both French and n are spoken. The question of language to be a matter of indifference to the natives. Berne, Freiburg and Lausanne are reached French dominates. The trainmen become French and so the transition to Geneva is an easy one. Three days in the city on the Lake of Geneva made me think that I was in Italy. The weather was warm, the skies soft and clear, and the river Rhone as blue as the heavens. I did the regulation thing. I went to Fernay, saw Voltaire's house; to the Salève, and wondered if Mt. Blanc really touched the tall stars; to the villas of Byron, Lola Montez and the Empress Josephine; to the Protestant Cathedral, where Calvin preached; to Rousseau's birthplace, No. 40 Grand Rue; to his island, where stands the statue erected to his memory; and finally on the inviting lake up as far as the boat would carry one—Montreux. By Nyon, the birthplace of La Harpe; by Morges, where I saw the beautiful but unoccupied villa of Paderewski; by Evian, by Ouchy, by Vevay, by Clarens, to the doors of the castle of Chillon. This Byronic spot I reached after a short ride on a shaky tramway. It was Sunday afternoon and the world and his wife were abroad, for the castle that once held Byron's mythical prisoner is free on Sundays; hence the rush. I was in company with Dr. Rose, the English consul at Stuttgart, and we literally fought to gain admission, only to flee from the horrors of a guide who talked nasal history. But we saw where Byron scrawled his name on the pillar to which was chained his prisoner, Bonnivard. So what more could we expect?

From Geneva to Paris is a trip that needs no minute record, despite the hateful tunnel and the pretty city of Dijon. As in a dream I found myself arguing with a custom house officer of the Gare de Lyon, wondering if it was 1878 or 1896. But the burr on my French accent soon told me that the victorious years had rolled on—while my vocabulary stood still. Where is the accent of yester year? Gone with my other dreams, the dream of the idiot who dared all to kiss the hand of Franz Liszt—and to this hour does not know whether the hansom which he madly chased for a half hour on the rue de Rivoli contained the person of the great Hungarian pianist and composer or his double—his "William Wilson" as Poe would have said—warts, white hair and the rest of the make up.

I changed my usual tactics, and instead of stopping at a hotel, like most of my preposterous countrymen—ah! what bourgeois nightmares are the English and American hotels in Paris!—I went to Auteuil, dear old, delightful, quaint—I've forgotten the rest of the adjectives!—Auteuil. There, said I to my soul, will I find the peace which passeth all understanding—also would I see Vance Thompson, a name still remembered by the readers of THE MUSICAL COURIER. "Vance," I wrote him from Geneva, "find me a poetic spot near the Goncourts house, where I may sit on my balcony and listen to the frogs parse the more irregular verbs of their sweet mother tongue." He found it. Never shall I forget my first night in old Auteuil. From my balcony—it was a real iron one—I heard and saw the railway trains of the Ceinture. They run every five minutes, and make more noise than those of Ninth avenue, Manhattan. No; not noise, but Hades! After I really fell asleep for ten minutes I was awakened by voices in the street below—the voices of "powerful uneducated persons," as Walt Whitman calls them. These voices were in a wrangle. I distinguished pet phrases: "Cochon!" "Cornichon!" "Homard," and again "Cornichon!" Yet it was I who was the "pickle." Then came the climax—a superb stroke of municipal orchestration. A steam roller, a brutal "machin" went to and fro before my very window for five or six hours, crunching with a horrid crunch the stones and gravel prepared for its midnight lunch. That settled it. I dressed and went across the street to the police station on Boulevard Exelmans and talked cigarette French to the amiable officers on duty. Just here I wish I could say a good word for the sorry specimens that comprise the French army. But I cannot. The police, the firemen are stronger, better drilled men. After the formidable display of military strength that I witnessed in Germany, France and the French present a poor front. Yet hint at this here and you are chattered out of court. So patriotic, so blind is the average Frenchman—partially the fault of the lying, Chauvinistic Boulevard journals—that if you mention the magnificent training of the German army, mention the magnificent civilization of Germany—to her belongs the future!—you are sneered at, and Russia's name hurled in your teeth. The Latin decadence is genuine, I fear. Russia will prove a sorry prop for any European nation to lean upon, for Russia is Russia—that is, Asiatic. A coalition between Russia and Germany, incredible as this may sound, is more to be looked for. Power kisses power, is an old diplomatic proverb.

But to Auteuil. I told Thompson the next day that his frogs were railroad frogs, and he retorted by taking me over the district and filling me full of history. Here is some of it. Vance Thompson lives in the Hameau Boileau, a retired little hamlet, heavily shaded and containing half a dozen villas. His own is the original Boileau house bought by the poet for 8,000 livres in 1685. Voltaire called it "un vilain petit cabaret borgne." Here came Chapelle, Mme. Deshoulières, and every Sunday the poet—I can't abide his verse—carried his fruits to Madame Racine. Racine and Molière visited the house continually. Molière in 1667 lived at No. 2 rue d'Auteuil, where he died, 1673.

Racine wrote here his only comedy, "Les Plaideurs," about the same time. Lafontaine, Despreaux also visited Boileau, about whom some racy stories are related. Rousseau lived at 28 quai de Passy. Rameau, the composer, and Gossec and Piccini—of Gluck fame—all lived in Auteuil. Piccini died in the rue d'Assomption. La Tour, the pastellist, lived at No. 59 rue d'Auteuil, and our own Benjamin Franklin on rue Singer. There is a street named after him, but further down. Piron, Florian, Mme. Helvoetius—Franklin wanted to marry her as well as Turgot—lived here. Jefferson visited her, as did all the poets. Then think of Lamartine, the poet, who died at 109 avenue Henri Martin; of Victor Hugo, on the avenue Victor Hugo; Proudhon, who died 1861 at 10 rue de Passy; Balzac, who lived at No. 7 rue Raymond; Jules Janin, the writer, who lived at 11 rue de la Pompe; Spontini, the composer, at La Muette; Rossini, who founded the Maison Rossini for old musicians; the Institution Sainte-Perine for retired aristocrats, founded by the Empress Eugenie—it needs money to live there; Sandeau and George Sand, who lived at Passy; De Musset lived at Auteuil; Gavarni, prince of caricaturists, who died in the Villa de la Réunion; Halevy, the composer of "La Juive," whose daughter was married to Bizet; Sophie Arnould, the famous actress, friend of Gluck, who lived at No. 12 quai de Billy; and last but not least the De Goncourts, whose house I saw, No. 67 boulevard Montmorenci. If they came—as they did—to this place for absolute quiet they were deceived, as was I. The railroad is in front of their house, though the back of it flanks on the Parc Montmorenci. Here, too, is the Pool of Auteuil, a most poetic spot, with weeping willows nodding over its green waters. Hugo, Turgenev, Flaubert, De Maupassant, the Goncourts all sat on its triste borders and wondered when the dinner bell would summon them. Hélas! Ach Gott! I saw the Church of Notre Dame d'Auteuil, and I saw the famous racecourse. On the whole, I am not sorry that I visited the place, even though its frogs are of railroad iron and its stillness a poet's dream.

Naturally I went to Père-Lachaise—whose portrait is at Versailles—and to the Montmartre Cemetery. The graves of Chopin at the one place and Heinrich Heine at the other must be visited as one visits the tombs of those dearest to us. Chopin's burying place had a few rusty wreaths on it; it looked rather drear. His predecessor in Sand's affections was, on the contrary, cheerful with decorations. But then Alfred de Musset is a beloved French poet, while the other is only a Polish exile, a pianist—poor Frédèric Chopin. For the first time I felt in sympathy with Paderewski's idea that the bones of the great dead one should be transported to the Church of the Holy Cross, Warsaw, where rests his heart in a precious urn. Do the French appreciate Chopin? Certainly their pianists do not interpret his nobler music. Again I looked for the date of his birth, which certain persons claim is engraved on the ugly Clésinger memorial. There is no such date there. In other words he was born in 1809, and not 1810. Rachel, the actress, lies in the Jewish cemetery as do the family Rothschild. Everyone who goes to Père-Lachaise seeks out the graves of Abelard and Heloise; but of far more interest to me were the tombs of Talma, the tragedian; Hérold, the composer; Cherubini, now forgotten save for several of his overtures; Tamberlik, the tenor; Bellini—whose ashes have been removed to Catania, his native place; Gretry, Boieldieu, Le Seuer, Edmond About, Eugène Scribe, Lafontaine, Molière, Blanqui, Michelet, Racine, Gericault, Delveroit, Balzac, Beranger; Reber, professor at the Conservatoire; Georges Bizet, composer of "Carmen" and report hath it a suicide; the Countess d'Agoult, the mother of Liszt's children, Cosima von Bülow-Wagner and Blandina, the wife of the French Minister Ollivier; also of his only recognized son Daniel—who died young—many of his other sons (67 in number) still encumber the earth. Rossini's ashes were once here, but are now in Florence. Joker that he was, he requested that he be not buried in the Jewish cemetery. Ah, these wits! I met so many Hebrews in Germany and France who are not Jews that I have made the following conundrum:

When is a Jew not a Jew?

When he is a Roman Catholic. Sclah!

At Montmartre the tomb of Heine had been freshly decorated the day before—by a Christian I'll swear—and in the little panier which hung on the iron railing I found the following note written with a blue lead pencil on blue paper. It was dated September 29, 1901. "Hier lebt man immer in Wunderschoenen Monat Mai." It was really touching, so much sentiment in such a practical, forgetful city as Paris—for every time I visit it I find the place much changed. It is noisier, dirtier, more practical, more "hustling"—in effect, more like Chicago than the beautiful city I first knew. For one thing—remember we stopped at the cemetery last!—the infernal automobiles with their vile odor, screaming signals and hideous noises are making the city unbearable to owners of normal nerves. And every exposition, while it leaves a monument behind it—this time the beautiful bridge of Alexander III.—further vulgarizes the inhabitants. The real Paris is not the Paris of junketing Americans, the Paris that clusters about Maxim's, the Moulin Rouge and other absurd places; no, the real Paris is the Louvre, with its glorious marbles and canvases, the palaces, Luxembourg, Versailles; above all, the noble churches. If ever I should turn religious, to Paris would I flee; there alone is God worshipped artistically.

But I must not forget my dear corpses at Montmartre. There the Goncourt brothers sleep together; there lie Beyle—Henri Stendhal—Halévy; Kamienski, the Polish patriot; Horace Vernet, Ary Scheffer, Ernst Renan; Nourvit, the tenor, who made away with himself by jumping out of a window; Heine and his devoted wife Matilde; Samson, actor; Theophile Gautier, prince of prose masters; Henri Mürger, Bohemian; and Troyon, the painter. The Alexandre Dumas, Jr., memorial is very imposing in its marble splendor.

After leaving this cemetery with its many memories—I again saw the grave of Adah Isaacs Menken, the poet, actress, bareback rider, Mazeppa and lover of human nature; on her tomb is engraved "Thou Know[illegible]—I rode to the summit of Montmartre and [illegible]red the noble Byzantine-Romanesque chur[illegible] the Sacred Heart, whose beginnings I sa[illegible]1878. Here are expiated by prayer and adoration all the sins of Paris, and the washing of dirty linen must surely be enormous. Such, however, is the belief of the worshipping and faithful few—for infidel France threatens daily the very foundations of religious belief. Seen from the topmost platform of the Eiffel Tower this church dominates all Paris. With its white marble dome it hovers like a dove of peace above the muttering city, blessing it, guarding it. Religion is poetic in Europe.

There is a touch of irony in the news that the French sculptors employed in the work of repairing the Château of Chantilly went on a strike because the contractor employed foreign workmen. Ah! it is a poor rule that does not work in nineteen different ways.

I saw for a few moments Mr. Marc A. Blumberg, the editor-in-chief of THE MUSICAL COURIER, but as he was far too busy a business man—he listened when I left him to 96 pianists, 103 singers, 401 managers who wished to visit America because of its natural boodleific beauties, and 32 miscellaneous musicians who could play any instrument at a moment's notice—to go to Cluny with me, I left his company. But I suspect he suspects that I am not a practical person! Mr. Montague Chesterton, London representative of THE MUSICAL COURIER, was also here. To him I owe the important fact that I heard "Louise" without paying 12 francs for a seat, a sum that I disbursed, I am sorry to say, for "Lakmé," believing that I was to hear Chavannes's much talked of work.

I noticed in the Herald here that Jean de Reszke's horse has won the Jablony prize of 2,000 roubles at the Warsaw Course. His horse was ridden by a Mr. Sloan, the brother of Tod, and no doubt the renowned tenor pocketed a big sum, for they bet heavily in Poland—when they do bet.

I just missed Mr. and Mrs. Henry T. Finck, who sailed last week. I saw their names registered at the Hotel Terminus, and hurried there, only to learn that they had left the day previous. I hear that the Fincks visited Grieg, Paderewski and saw a lot of interesting people and places.

Vance Thompson at present is hard at work in Rambouillet with his collaborator, Morand, who translated with Marcel Schwob "Hamlet" and wrote the book of Isidor de Lara's "Messaline" on a new play for David Belasco and Mrs. Leslie Carter. Wild horses could not drag the secret from Mr. Thompson, but boulevard gossip says the piece is English and historical.

The only Sebastian Schlesinger, composer, man of the world and—shall I say millionaire?—affairs, was at Munroe's the other day, and I enjoyed making his acquaintance.

Lillian Nordica is hard at work here getting her programs for her forthcoming season with Loudon Charlton, the breeziest manager I ever met. Madame Nordica has been offered the Brünhilde for next season's Munich's Wagner season.

gust, 1902—did I tell you this before? Never mind, t's a good thing, pass it along the line.

It was with pleasure I met Robert Strakosch, the anager and son of Maurice Strakosch and Amalia atti. I told Mr. Strakosch that I once studied the iano with his cousin, Alfredo Barili, now in Atnta, and he immediately recalled many memories the Barilis. He told me that his mother, the ster of Adelina, is well, and seemed interested in y recollections of his aunt, Carlotta—a marvelous nger.

A person that signs itself "Little Willie" wrote the Paris Herald from Lucerne, September 25, otesting against the "antique and curio shops" at e new Munich Wagner theatre. I am free to mit that Munich must engage many more new d fresh voices next season—or else perish; but turally enough "Little Willie" is our dear young end Siegfried Wagner, who brushes his hair like papa, sits in the centre box at the Bayreuth eatre, as one who should say: "Oh, what a wonful son am I!"

was quite interested in a "Chanson des Rois ges," words by Henri Heine—you may recall name and the poem—music by Pierre Louys, author of that exquisite prose-poem "Aphro-." The composition is in no wise remarkable; nerely illustrates the versatility of a wonderful ng man.

ersailles on the first Sunday of October and the Sunday of the fountains was a sight fit for the s—particularly Jupiter Pluvius. It poured tors, but that did not dismay the sightseers—in instance Gallic—for they stood ten files deep it the basin where the Great Fountains sprayed t to be compared with the single magnificent f water in Lake Geneva—umbrellas over heads, to the right of them, rain to the left of them, above and below them. It was a touching tacle, and a childlike. But this devotion to r is confined to the visual sense. France, like nany, neither drinks nor bathes in water often. too cold, and also too costly.

am happy to say that there is no truth in the t that Frédérique Coméé is an aspirant to the ch throne. While in Paris M. F. B. (which ls, not for beans, but for Boston) Comèè was antly shadowed by the secret public police; in- if it had not been for the intervention of Mon- M. Fleur de Montagne, M. F. B. Comêê d have been denied admission to Maxim's—gh he had ordered lobster à la Americaine by telephone. But God is ever good to the Irish and M. Comèé was admitted. I dare him to tell the true story of that lobster!

Is there any truth in the story that Sibyl Sanderson intends to face the rigors of a North American winter without——? I cannot credit this rumor, which seems to possess the boulevards at present. This dear Paris, so interested in matters of art, of cosmopolitan politics!

I saw Camille Saint-Saëns coursing through the Place Vendome after a rehearsal of his new opera, "Les Barbares." He looked very young for his sixty odd years, young and spry.

Query: When is a Roman Catholic not a Catholic?

I have seen Charpentier's "Louise." The record of that fact will keep with the addition of plenty of ice.

J. H.

Anna Otten.

MISS ANNA OTTEN played with success at the New England festivals. The criticisms were all favorable, as the following extracts prove:

The playing of the violin by a master hand always appeals to music lovers, and in Miss Otten Portland people found an artist who, although little more than a girl, plays with a skill and mastery which would do credit to one of long years of experience. For her the career which she has chosen holds the promise of a brilliant future. She played Mendelssohn's E minor Concerto with a delicacy of touch, sympathy of expression and a command of technic which were in every way adequate, and in the "Rondo Capriccioso" of Saint-Saëns she enhanced the impression made by her first number.—Portland Daily Press, October 10, 1901.

The matinee program's principal features were the ballet music in "Faust" by the orchestra, which did the seven movements admirably, and the playing of Miss Otten, the violinist, our expectations of whom were in no degree misplaced by her work in the concert. In her E minor Concerto (Mendelssohn) she only prepared the way for what skill she displayed in her second number, the lovely "Rondo Capriccioso" (Saint-Saëns), one of the most charmingly characteristic of his compositions, and done by Miss Otten in a thoroughly artistic fashion.—Portland Daily Advertiser, Portland, Me., October 10, 1901.

Otten played the adorable andante to the Mendelssohn Concerto with exquisite feeling and perfection of tone. Her rendering of the allegro movement was something to wonder at and delight in, and her playing of the Saint-Saëns' "Rondo Capriccioso" a triumph of technic and tone.—Daily Eastern Argus, Portland, Me., October 10, 1901.

* * * She is Miss Anna E. Otten, and the book says she was born on Bertrand's Island, in Lake Hopatcong, N. J. Do the Jersey lakes, I wonder, produce many such violinists?

She played Mendelssohn's Concerto in E minor. * * * And I am glad to have an opportunity of saying that she shows more promise than any violinist of her sex I have ever heard.—The Manchester News, October 14, 1901.

Miss Otten's playing was superb. In appearance she is most attractive, and her audience was as much carried away with her as with her playing. Her music was in every way satisfactory, and was much more than a mere exhibition of dexterity, as so much concert playing is. That she is well up in technic goes without saying, when the compositions which she played are taken into consideration. Both have their difficulties, which Miss Otten conquered easily. Her tone is not particularly powerful, but for quality it leaves nothing to be desired.—Manchester Union, Manchester. Me., October 14, 1901.

GRACE G. GARDNER.—Miss Grace G. Gardner has resumed teaching at her studio, No. 36 West Twenty-fifth street, and among her pupils are a number who have very promising voices. Later in the season Miss Gardner will give a series of lectures and recitals, which are sure to be both instructive and interesting.

EUGENIE BARKER.—Miss Eugenie Barker, late of the Carl Rosa Opera, has been engaged as one of the leading sopranos of Southwell's English Opera for St. Louis, opening on November 18.

Lectures to the People.

THE course of free lectures to be given this coming season under the auspices of the School Board of these boroughs includes ten lectures on music by T. W. Surrat, Dr. Henry G. Hanchett, Mrs. H. Speke-Seeley and Miss Kate S. Chittenden. There will also be certain song illustrations by C. J. Bushnell. The whole scheme covers the first season from October 9 to December 11, and English ballads and German folk songs, Hungarian folk songs and dances, Norse folk songs and dances, materials of musical composition, methods of musical compositions, merits of musical compositions, masters of musical compositions, and lastly, the unifying influence of music. The course should prove to be very interesting to people of every kind interested in the divine art.

FROM SCHIRMER'S.

G. SCHIRMER, of New York, has published a complete score, with piano accompaniment, of Chadwick's "Judith," recently performed in Worcester. The title page says that, among others in the characters and the dramas, there are Israelites and Native Hebrews. There is quite a distinction between Israelites and Hebrews. Israelites are rich Jews; Jews are poor Israelites; but Hebrews are people who speak the Hebrew tongue. There are very few of them left, even among Jews. The publication is carefully arranged, very distinct typographically, not gorgeous, but is produced in such a manner as to be within the reach of choral singers who can afford to buy individual copies of the work. The proofreading seems to be perfect. Mr. Hale has told us what he thinks of William Chauncey Langdon's text, and we agree with him after going through it. On page 19 there is a reference to Judith's trust, "For I alone see Judith's trust is slight." This is not very apropos, considering the turn of mercantile affairs.

MANRU.

We have received from the same publishers the opera "Manru," by Paderewski, translated and adapted for performance in English by Mr. Krehbiel. The Schirmers have done very remarkable work in this new opera, appearing to have spared no expense, both in the quality of the paper and typography, in the excellence of the plates and in the care of the arrangement of the signs of the orchestral movement, as well as in all of the numerous syllabic subdivisions; every little point has been carefully looked over, so far as we can see, for it is impossible for us to go through it analytically, but it certainly has that appearance. The weak point about the opera seems to be the text. It is generally understood that the translator had a very difficult task to get this into shape in English, but then Mr. Krehbiel is a past master of this art and has devoted a great deal of time to the work, and has succeeded far beyond what could have been ordinarily expected. There are very few men in the United States who could have done this work as Mr. Krehbiel has done it. But to refer to the opera again, we would say that it is full of surprises, and that its dramatic fund is well-nigh inexhaustible. It seems to have dramatic episodes that are full of successful effects, and we withhold from further criticisms, simply relying at present on what our Mr. Floersheim said about it, and placing our dependence upon his usual excellent judgment.

We do not know whether the opera will be produced here, because we can never tell anything about the announcements published by the Metropolitan Opera Company, but Mr. Paderewski is coming over, and as he can conduct the rehearsals himself the opera will be heard here and we may be sure that Mr. Paderewski will not permit it to be heard in a slipshod manner.

H. A. GOODRICH.—Mr. Goodrich is an author, a lecturer and a teacher, and a man who is universally versed in musical lore—a man of authority and influence and of benefit to the musical community. He has recently issued a pamphlet, which can be secured by addressing him at his residence studio in the Carvel, corner 114th street West and St. Nicholas avenue.

RESUMED TEACHING.—Mrs. Clifford Elizabeth Williams, the soprano, has resumed teaching at the Gardner School for Girls, and at her residence studio, 60 West Eighty-third street. Mrs. Williams has been chosen soprano soloist of St. Luke's Episcopal Church, at Montclair, N. J.; over fifty voices were tried before Mrs. Williams was chosen.

37 AVENUE BRUGMAN, BRUSSELS, October 7, 1901.

I COME back to the city after a three months' vacation spent very agreeably in the Ardennes in a village far away from the noise and bustle of the world, where the only music was the tinkling of the cow bells, and the quiet only disturbed by the lowing of sheep.

In the middle of the village stands the quaintly simple white church, surrounded by a lonely little graveyard, whose graves, with their little wooden crosses and here and there a bunch of faded wood flowers, remind one with pity that in life as in death these poor toilers of the soil remain in poverty. The curé is here in truth the shepherd of his flock, for his power is indisputable, his orders inviolable. Woe to those who transgress and obey not implicitly the voice of this commander. An anathema is hurled upon them from the pulpit, absolution is denied, and the culprit, shamed and repentant, returns to the fold more completely subdued than ever before. The choir is composed of all the prominent people of the village—the butchers, bakers and shoemakers of the community—and a funny combination they make. The harmonium excelled in one note, which when touched would sound indefinitely, thus making charming counterpoint to the various harmonies which followed.

Almost as good a story as the one of the servant girl living in the home of an artist who comes one day to the lady of the house wishing to know whether Monsieur would not like to buy a fine violin she knows of, which is exceedingly valuable, it having once belonged to Raphael, is one which happened to me in the country. Promenading one day I was accosted by an old peasant, for the fame of the four pianos brought by the party of friends of whom I was a member had quickly spread through the surrounding country, and he asked me if we had not need of another one perhaps. I assured him to the contrary, and still he insisted upon enumerating to me its excellent qualities, good tone, fine wood, excellent preservation. When he saw that all these merits touched not my hardened heart he pulled himself together, deployed his greatest eloquence in trying to persuade, and as the summum bonum, the climax of it all, he said: "That piano is not only valuable for the qualities I have just mentioned; oh no! It has also great age. That piano was left to me by my great grandfather and has been in the family ever since!" I told him I would come and see this Rock of Ages, but I never did. I wonder why?

Albert Zimmer, the well-known young violinist, is very busily engaged arranging his plans for the winter. He reorganized his quartet, which will give six séances during the season, assisted by Arthur Dégréef, Theophile Ysaye and other artists. They will also play at one of the twenty séances of chamber music organized by Rey, in Paris, where the Ysaye, Joachim and Schörg quartets are also to be heard. Besides this Mr. Zimmer is organizing a course for violin students, which promises to be very popular. The prices are moderate, and lessons twice a week with as excellent a teacher as this young artist will doubtless be much sought after.

A week from Monday is the concours for the place of professor of violin at the Ghent Conservatory, where our Brussels violinists will be represented by Edouard Dern, violin soloist at the Ysaye and Populaires concerts, as also at the Opéra, and by Albert Zimmer, both pupils of Ysaye. There are numerous other candidates from Ghent, and there will be close competition between the Walloon and Flemish element. The concerto imposed is the Beethoven, the apogée of violinistic greatness, while the repertory comprises at least from twenty-five to thirty pieces from which the jury has the privilege to choose one or more. Besides this the candidates undergo a severe examination on things pertaining to the history of music, that of their instrument, as well as facts relating to harmony and counte point.

The Cercle Artistique has just issued its program f the season, which surpasses in excellence those of pre ous years. It commences on November 4, by a soir consecrated to Johann Sebastian Bach by Busoni, Ysa and orchestra. On November 22, an evening consecrat to Robert Schumann by Clotilde Kleeberg and Marce Pregi, while further on in the season we will hear V Rooy, Aus der Ohe, Mottl, with the assistance of Gui professor of hautbois at the Conservatoire; the Joach Quartet, Becker, Dégréef, Demest, Pugno and Marte Besides this many dates not yet definitely fixed, but wh we hope will contain as many famous names as th which have already been decided upon.

A Belgian society, the Concorde of Verviers, t part in the last international singing contest in Colog Its success was remarked, but the jury, at least the pr dent of the jury, Mr. Zöllner, director of the Leipsic C servatory of Music, thought that according to the tribution of points a German society should carry a the palm. There was a "tirage" among the members the jury and the juries of Belgium and Holland by me of open letters made their views known, which were v favorable to the singers from Verviers. These resulte calling forth very sharp controversies. The Ger juries, by means of the press of their country, have t to explain themselves and insist upon their own im tiality. But the Belgian and Holland juries have lost time in replying and energetically maintain that for votes of the "concours d'honneur" one did not re the total of the points presented by the ensemble of ju in that division. Mr. Zöllner wished to revise the when he saw that it was a Belgian society which was ca ing off the prize. The Belgian and Holland ju Messrs. Edouard BamVeus, Brussels; Mr. Brands-B of Rotterdam; Collinet, of Liege, and Richard H from The Hague, assert anew that there has been an justice committed and that the members of the Ger jury followed the injunctions of Mr. Zöllner. The r tation of the singers from Verviers, and the integrity o jury above cited, lead one to believe in a real injusti

Belgian artists abroad. Nothing daunts our brave oté, the Belgian baritone, who stops trains in motion d runaway carriages. He has done something even ore astounding than that. He sang William Tell in e open air in the immense inclosure of the Arènes de imes, where the most powerful bands sound like the usic made by a troup of children, and the 30,000 specta-rs whom his vibrant organ moved furiously acclaimed is voice of brass which nothing daunts.

A very brilliant rentrée was made by Madame Thiéry Friday last, when she came back to us in Mireille, e of her best roles from last year. The welcome which s excellent artist received after each act must have oved to her by what vivid sympathies she is here surnded. Mr. David divided her success, and the conrs of these two artists, whose talent accords so well with the character of Gounod's work, procured for it an execution of the greatest charm. The same evening "Coppelia," the eternally young ballet of Delibes, reappearcd on the bill. Grcat success for the première danseuse, Mlle. Brianza, especially remarkable for her poetically expressive mimics, by the enveloping grace of her arm movements, by the rhythmical suppleness of her dance, all qualities which for the greater pleasure of the eyes complete a silhouette whose lines are particularly harmonious.

LILLIAN.

KATHARINE FISK.—Mrs. Katharine Fisk gave another of her artistic song recitals Wednesday, October 16, at the handsome country residence of Mrs. Henry Eno, at Saugatuck, Conn. The day following Mrs. Fisk appeared in recital at Wells College, under the auspices of the Wells Philharmonic Club, where her carefully arranged program of unusual and beautiful songs was received with cordial appreciation. The group of children's songs again made a most favorable impression, and a Japanese Love Song, new, attractive and full of originality, although by a comparatively little known composer, was so well received that Mrs. Fisk has decided to give it a permanent place in her repertory. Mrs. Fisk's engagements in the South are announced by Manager Charlton to commence at Norfolk, Va., November 4, and be followed by appearances at Richmond, Va., and Baltimore, Md., on the 7th and 8th respectively.

H. WHITNEY TEW.—H. Whitney Tew, the basso, arrived here last week from Europe, and will open his American tournée, which is under the management of Henry Wolfsohn, in Boston, on Wednesday evening, November 6. On the afternoon of the 11th, in Mendelssohn Hall, he will make his New York début, and on the evening of the 13th he is to give a song recital before the Brooklyn Institute.

ELLISON VAN HOOSE.—Ellison Van Hoose, whose recent success at the Worcester Festival has established him as one of America's leading tenors, has been engaged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to sing at six of their concerts, in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Brooklyn, in a series of Wagner concerts, in which Madame Ternina will be the soprano.

NAPLES.

OCTOBER 4, 1900.

ON board the beautiful steamer Trojan Prince, which other times has taken talented artists over to America, sails to-morrow Signor Randegger, the Italian pianist, who hardly needs an introduction to Americans.

THE MUSICAL COURIER has several times had the opportunity of speaking of G. Aldo Randegger, whose Italian reputation has been increased, if possible, by the echoes of his great success in London.

It appears that Signor Randegger will not undertake a regular concert tour immediately upon his arrival in New York. Whenever that will take place, even if not this season, it is not too much to say that it will interest American music lovers. Signor Randegger's playing has always been particularly marked for its temperamental power, whether in the passionately strong or in the delicate.

Aside from his musical gifts, Signor Randegger's high social standing taken into consideration, there is no doubt that he is bound to make a success in American society, and particularly in that of New York, where he expects to fill private engagements and accept a few pupils, while plans will be perfected to bring him out in a concert tour. His appearance in New York will be greeted as a novel acquisition.

Amy Murray.

MISS AMY MURRAY has been engaged as a soloist for Clan McLeod's concert in Jersey City, November 15. She will be one of the soloists at the celebration of St. Andrew's Day, at Guelph, Ont., on November 29. Then she is to fill a return engagement at Newark, N. J., on November 1. At the forthcoming benefit concert under the auspices of the New York Woman's Philharmonic, Miss Murray is to represent Scotland. The program will be devoted to national songs. Both the Boards of Education of Manhattan and Brooklyn have engaged Miss Murray for a series of her Scottish lecture-recitals.

HENRIETTE WEBER.—Miss Henriette Weber, the pianist, and Oley Speaks, basso, gave a successful concert last week at Huntington, L. I. Miss Weber, by the way, is going on a short Western tour during the month of November.

BUFFALO, N. Y., October 24, 1901.

THE chorus of school children which sang at the Pan-American yesterday morning, under the direction of Mr. Mischka, gave great pleasure to the audience that completely filled the Stadium. The conditions were trying. The little singers were separated into two divisions, being seated on both sides of the entrance, with the Innes Band, which accompanied them, placed over the entrance. Not having rehearsed at all with the band or in such environments, the ensemble in the first song was not perfect. In the three following songs, however, it was all that could be desired. The 3,000 singers made a pretty picture, and, with their fresh, sweet voices, their singing and the waving of their tiny flags, roused the audience to great enthusiasm.

Clarence Eddy, of New York, gave three organ concerts at the Temple of Music October 13, 14 and 15.

Mr. Eddy is a thoroughly dignified musician, using only legitimate music. He is an executant whose performances are always significant, always have a clear concept behind them, though the player's ideal may be as hard to give life to as the Venus which Michael Angelo saw in fancy hidden within the marble. The principal features of his playing are a soft, pleasant touch, a smooth, glittering technic and a subtle and thoroughly intelligent use of the pedal, whereby both harmony and melody stand out tunefully, yet with admirable clearness.

The first number of the first concert was the Concert Overture in C minor, by Alfred Hollins, dedicated to Clarence Eddy. "La Cygne," Saint-Saëns, arranged by Alex. Guilmant, was a beautiful number, and by a combination of stops Mr. Eddy produced the sound of a voice in a remarkable manner. Sonata in C minor, op. 10, by Ralph L. Baldwin, and dedicated to Clarence Eddy, was also an exquisite composition. In the (1) Allegro Pathetique, (2) Adagio, (3) Recitative, Allegro Assai, passionate and glowing, every emotion from sorrow to ecstasy was excellently portrayed. "Pilgrims' Chorus" ("Tannhauser"), Richard Wagner, arranged by Clarence Eddy, was so beautifully played the applause became deafening, and Mr. Eddy was glad to comply by repeating the whole number.

CLARENCE EDDY.

In his youth Mr. Eddy studied in Berlin. The first prominent position was in the First Presbyterian Church in Chicago, where he was organist and choirmaster for seventeen years. In 1876 he became general director of the Hershey School of Musical Art, of Chicago, and gave there his famous series of 100 organ recitals without any repetitions. Mr. Eddy played at Vienna Exposition in 1889; Centennial Exposition, Philadelphia, 1876; Paris Exposition, 1889; World's Fair at Chicago, 1893; National Export Exposition at Philadelphia, 1899. He has also composed and compiled several volumes of standard organ music. Mr. Eddy devotes all of his time to giving organ concerts in America and Europe.

October 16, W. E. Fairclough, of Toronto, gave a concert at the Temple of Music. Mr. Fairclough's program contained the works of Alfred Hollins, d'Every, Alex. Guilmant, W. F. Best, Bassi, Wolstenholm, Lemare and the Overture to "Euryanthe," by C. M. Weber, and the Caprice in B flat, by Alex. Guilmant, were played so beautifully as to call forth salvos of applause.

W. E. FAIRCLOUGH.

Mr. Fairclough is a gifted musician who cherishes a high ideal of artistic endeavor, whom technic serves as a means to an end, and who with soulfulness and intelligence buries himself in his task.

Mr. Fairclough was educated at the Royal College of Music, London, England, where he studied the organ with Sir Walter Parratt, piano with Alfred J. Caldicott, a theory with Sir Frederic Bridge. He is organist and cho master of All Saints' Church, Toronto, and examiner practical music, University of Toronto. He is a Fellow the Royal College of Organists, London, England.

Mr. Fairclough was assisted by his pupil, Master Jo Challes, boy soprano, of Toronto, who sang "The Palm Faure; "When the Heart Is Young," Buck, and as an core, "Fear Ye Not, Oh Israel." The boy, scareely fo teen years of age, was a surprise to the audience. H voice is clear as a bell, always true, and he sings with fervor and spirit truly astonishing in one so you The audience cheered again and again, and John Cha was soon surrounded by an admiring crowd. He booked for several concert engagements and is open more, which he is sure to obtain.

September 1, at an organ recital given by Herve Wilk a singer of unusual promise appeared and gave several lections. He is the young tenor, G. Chrystal Brown, Toronto, who is very popular in Canada, and was thusiastically received at the Pan-American Temple Music. He has a magnificent tenor voice of excel range and quality, and sings in an artistic manner. first number was "Face to Face," Johnston, and "(Into the Garden, Maud." After both songs he rec enthusiastic recalls and sang "Crossing the Bar," Bel and "Love, the Pedlar." T. Alexander Davies, of ronto, accompanied his songs, and his accompani were of the kind that carry the voice right along. are not many who have the right idea what is req when they accompany either voice or instrument, bu Davies is superior in that line, being both an exc pianist and organist.

Mr. Davies is a very popular man, and is the org and choir director of St. James' Square Presby Church, Toronto, Canada.

Miss Victoria Carter and Ulysses Thomas, the org who were to play October 19 and 20, failed to appea usual our ever reliable, efficient, official organist, Gomph, filled their places. Among his selections, mos modern composers, he played the "Feuermarsch," C with a breadth, dignity and style that were gratifying Charlotte Tilden, contralto, and H. G. Stewart, ten Buffalo, assisted. Both singers are doing good w their respective churches.

N. J. Corey, of Detroit, gave three fine organ c October 20, 21 and 22. The program of one of his c consisted of selections from Bach, Rheinberger, Le Wagner, Krocger, Whiting, Salome and Guilmant. "Pilgrims' Chorus" from "Tannhäuser" and in the a he drew out all the music there is in that big organ.

Scene Orientale," by Kroeger, is a quaint, truly foreign composition, but the Allegro from Sonata in A minor, Whiting, was a tuneful, lovely selection. It gave Mr. Corey a chance to show off his pedal technic, which was done with lightning speed. The audience was enchanted and a shower of applause was his reward.

Mr. Corey's services as a concert organist as well as a musical lecturer are frequently called upon and his claims to artistic excellence recognized. His playing is manly, dignified and thoroughly musical, combining vigor and delicacy effectively. His playing is distinct and his tone firm and sympathetic. He commands also fluent, brilliant technic.

Mr. Corey was born January 31, 1861, in Hillsdale, Mich., and resides in Detroit, Mich. His musical education was obtained in Boston, under J. C. D. Parker, B. J. Lang, S. A. Whitney, G. W. Chadwick and W. F. Apthorp. He is the organist of the Fort Street Presbyterian Church, Detroit; director of the St. Cecilia Society; teacher of organ, theory and musical history in the Michigan Conservatory of Music, and was formerly organist of Dr. McKenzie's church, Cambridge, Mass. He is a Ph. D. of Hillsdale College and a member of the Guild of American Organists.

Mr. Corey gives his famous lecture, "The Great Man in Art," before the Cornell University, October 28, with musical illustrations: Vorspiel to "Parsifal," Valhalla music from the "Rheingold," Liebestod from "Tristan and Isolde," "Magic Fire Scene" from the "Walküre."

With facile grace art touches every soul is especially true of Mme. Abie Fridenberg, who gave two vocal concerts at the Temple of Music, October 10-12, assisted by Mme. Marie Merick, pianist. Madame Fridenberg's selection were "Thy Beaming Eyes," MacDowell; "Good-bye, Summer," Tosti; "Die Lorelei," Liszt; gavotte, "Mignon." "Spring Song," "Bavarian Dialect Song." "Figlio mio," "Prophete," Meyerbeer; "I Know That My Redeemer Liveth," "Messiah." Madame Fridenberg is noted for her literary work, has painted and drawn with success, and was a fairly well-known society woman in New York, having been president of two clubs, but she is devoting all her time now to singing and teaching. Miss Genevieve Day, of Brooklyn, and Miss Florence Hayes, of Prattsburg, who sang so successfully recently at the temple, are both her pupils.

Madame Fridenberg's voice is characterized by great breadth, sweetness, volume and elasticity. It is above all magnetic, and she sings best in dramatic roles. This combined with a fine stage presence makes her very desirable as a concert singer or in oratorio or operatic roles.

A criticism of recent date, clipped from a New York paper, says: "Madame Fridenberg's repertory runs from arias and songs written for soprano to those of contralto. She can sing both Elsa and Ortrud. Her voice is potent and richly sensuous, magnetic in timbre, full of color and capable of expressing the entire gamut of the emotions, love, joy, grief, despair and jealousy. Madame Fridenberg is also an accomplished pianist, a fact of no little importance, but too little considered usually by singers."

Want of space gives only one part of Madame Fridenberg's concert. Annotations of Mme. Marie Merick's work as the pianist will be given in the next issue.

Miss Fanny M. Spencer, of New York, gave two splendid organ recitals at the Temple of Music September 29 and 30. Her programs were admirably selected. She played compositions ranging from the ancient classics to the modern German and French schools. All her numbers were played with excellence of manual and pedal technic and most intelligent phrasing. The Adagio and Finale (from Quartet in E minor), Spohr; Overture to "Oberon," Weber; Overture to "William Tell," Rossini; four selections from Schumann, G minor Fugue, Bach; all this difficult music was played by the dainty little lady with vigor and exquisite finish. Her musical education was conducted under Samuel P. Warren, organist of Grace Church, New York. She has been organist of Pilgrims Congregational, Fourth Presbyterian, and Lexington Avenue churches, New York. Her more important compositions are a Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis in C; an anthem, "O Lord, Rebuke Me Not," a number of songs and thirty-two original hymn tunes. She is a popular and busy teacher in New York city, her amiable qualities making friends for her everywhere.

FANNY M. SPENCER.

At one of the concerts given by the Innes Band, our promising soprano of Buffalo, Miss Edith Ely, sang "Dich theure Halle" very beautifullly. After repeated recalls she sang as an encore "Ave Maria," from "Cavalleria Rusticana."

Clarence Good, a six year old boy, of Lancaster, N. Y., caused quite a ripple of surprise by singing very prettily "Lead, Kindly Light" and "Holy City."

Song Album (selected songs), published by A. P. Schmidt.

S. B. Schlesinger's compositions have had the indorsement of Robert Franz, Max Bruch and many other composers and artists of renown.

Robert Franz writes to Mr. Schlesinger: "I have received your songs, and was truly delighted with them. It is only with great pains that I am still able to take cognizance of our beautiful art through the medium of my eyes—a poor reparation indeed for what I have lost. But what my eyes can read redounds very much to the honor of your songs. Your melody is far from all triviality, and is agreeably supported by freely chosen harmonies, which are developed in interesting forms of accompaniment. Although I can fancy a slight alteration in this or that passage, this signifies little in face of the general merits of the songs. What gave me most pleasure was the naturalness of your expression, for the want of naturalness in most compositions of the period is so great as to make one almost lose all interest in music. Art must always preserve an aristocratic dignity; at least that is the principle I have always endeavored to follow earnestly with my own humble powers."

Max Bruch writes: "Your songs prove that you have an easy and happy invention, which suffices to produce refreshing lyrical pictures. When it rings and sings in one's heart, as it does with you, one does well to put on paper what one hears and feels within."

Musical Clubs.

The Chicksaw Club, of Memphis, Tenn., gave a musical on the 10th.

Miss Florence Hayes sang at W. C. Carl's recital at the Pan-American recently.

A series of concerts will be given by the Norfolk, Va., Conservatory Symphony Society Orchestra.

The Orchestral Club, for the practice of orchestra music exclusively, has begun rehearsals at Cleveland, Ohio.

The St. Cecilia Society, of Grand Rapids, Mich., will have a new building ready for occupancy in a few weeks.

Director Hugo Kalsow, of the Detroit (Mich.) Symphony Orchestra, announces four concerts during the season.

The officers of the Cleveland, Ohio, Vocal Society are much pleased and satisfied with the prospects for the coming season.

The Mozart Club gave the first of its series of concerts on the 20th, at Mozart Hall, St. Paul, Minn., with William Maenner directing.

At the first meeting of the Women's Musical Club, Columbus, Ohio, there was only a fair attendance of members, both active and associate.

The first musical event of importance in Minneapolis will be the concert given by Mme. Camilla Urso for the Ladies' Thursday Musicale.

The Ladies' Musical Club, of Bedford, Ohio, held its first program meeting of the sixth series at the home of Mrs. Robert Cowan October 4.

Mrs. Merrick, of New York, and Mrs. Friedenburg, of Baltimore, gave a recital at Salamanca, N. Y., under the auspices of the Euterpean Club.

Some of the soloists who will appear in the Women's Club concert course at Peoria, Ill., are the Spiering Quartet, Josef Hofmann and Fritz Kreisler.

The Schubert Club, of St. Paul, Minn., has issued its prospectus for the season. The programs will be devoted to the music of the nineteenth century.

The coming season of the Philharmonic Society, Nashville, Tenn., promises to surpass in every respect anything heretofore undertaken by that organization.

The Orpheus Singing Society, Omaha, Neb., under the direction of Prof. Charles Peterson, will give its usual series of concerts and recitals during the coming season.

A concert at Music Hall, Baltimore, Md., on the 7th, marked the second day of the golden jubilee celebration of the Arion Singing Society. Selma Kronold was the feature of the evening.

The Beethoven Club, of Sioux City, Ia., will issue the prospectus for the year about the middle of this week. The opening concert will be in charge of Mrs. A. Davidson and S. Scherzel.

The Chamber Music Club of the United Conservatories, consisting of the Messrs. Bruening, Jaffe, Humdhammer, Fink and Beyer, will give their first concert at Mozart Hall, Milwaukee, Wis., October 28.

At the meeting of the Women's Club, Peoria, Ill., on the 14th the chief number on the program was the paper read by Mrs. Samuel Woolner, Jr., on "The Inspiration Which the Jew Has Lent the World's Music."

Fellows, William Bauer; December 19, song recital, Gregory Hast, tenor; Mme. Katharine Fisk, contralto; February 6, Eduard Zeldenrust; April 3, song recital, Mme. Lillian Nordica.

The Apollo Club at Chicago will this season celebrate the thirtieth year of its existence by reviving in elaborate manner "The Messiah," Saint-Saëns' "Samson and Delilah," and Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust."

The first meeting of the season of the Study Music Class was held recently at Oshkosh, Wis., with the president, Mrs. Sylvanus Palmer, on Court street. The subject of "The Rise of Instrumental Music from 1550 to 1800" was taken up.

The promoters of the Milwaukee (Wis.) Symphony Orchestra have taken the initial steps toward setting the project on a business basis. E. P. Vilas was elected president and William Boeppler, director of the Wisconsin Conservatory of Music, director for one year. The first concert is to be given in the Pabst Theatre December 2. The personnel of the orchestra comprises the best musical talent that has ever been gathered together in that city. Three or four concerts, at very popular prices, will be given during the winter. The executive committee of the association consists of J. H. Frank and William H. Upmeyer. The orchestra will include forty-eight in all. Among them are Theodore Kelbe, who will be concertmaster; William Jasse, Herman Zeitz, R. Rowland and M. Wingerter, first violinists; George Bach and Ernest W. Beyer, 'cellists; Albin F. Keill, oboe; Imri Boos, second oboe; Henry Tetzner and Frederick Holtz, clarinets; C. Neudeck, French horn; Carl Heiber, contra bass; Carl Woempner, flute, and Janowski, bassoon.

The Ladies' Matinee Musicale, of Lebanon, Ind., began its year's work on September 11, when President's Day was observed. Three programs have been rendered so far this year. FRITZ KREISLER TO ARRIVE IN DECEMBER.—Fritz Kreisler will arrive in this country during the middle of December, in place of January, as previously announced by his manager, Henry Wolfsohn. Kreisler's first appearance will be at the Peabody Institute in Baltimore on December 20. Kreisler has been engaged for seven concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and also with the Thomas Orchestra in Chicago, the Pittsburg, Cincinnati, St. Louis, New York Philharmonic and Philadelphia orchestral societies. Kreisler's first appearance this season in New York, will be an orchestral concert in Carnegie Hall shortly after the Christmas holidays.

FABIAN PIANO RECITAL.

THE season of piano recitals at Mendelssohn Hall wa opened last Thursday evening by S. M. Fabian, a artist who recently removed from Baltimore to New York and who is now teacher of interpretation at the Clavie Piano School. While in a sense a new comer before th general public, Mr. Fabian is well known in musical cir cles here. Last summer he gave three recitals in connectio with the summer term of the Clavier Piano School. I was after those occasions that reports of his performance were recorded in THE MUSICAL COURIER, and the sam opinions of his playing then can but be repeated now. T be accepted as skillful and accomplished, as he truly is, b the mass of unthinking people who flock to concerts, M Fabian should have contrived to make his entrée in Ne York by the way of a European steamer. He should als have taken the vowels out of his name and inserted con sonants, and then advertised himself as a pupil of som foreign celebrity.

However, Mr. Fabian, good American and gifted Balt morean, will have no difficulty to convince the educate thinking musicians that he is a player of uncommon talent He introduced himself at the Mendelssohn Hall recital b the Bach Prelude and Fugue in A minor, and he followed with the Thirty-two Variations by Beethoven. He playe both of these compositions with unfailing skill, and in th interpretation, particularly of the Beethoven Variations, h revealed the scholarly art that belongs to Beethoven at a times. Of course, Mr. Fabian played a list of Chopin num bers, two Etudes, a Nocturne, the "Ecossais" in D majo the Waltz No. 1 in op. 70, the B minor Scherzo and th Polonaise in A flat. The "Ecossais," which is seldo played in public, and best described as a little Scotch rha sody, proved a winsome piece, and it was redemanded b the audience. The waltz, too, is one of the unfamiliar one and in this Mr. Fabian infused the true Polish coloring an also gave an illustration of his fine sense of rhythm. Th other works played by the pianist were a Waltz Caprice, b Raff; the Grieg Berceuse and Dance Caprice; a Rondo, b John Field; "Gnomenreigen," by Liszt, and Liszt's tra scription of Schubert's "Erl König." Mr. Fabian was co dially recalled at the close of his recital, and as an ext number played a dainty rondo by Bovy.

Rose Cecilia Shay.

ROSE CECILIA SHAY is the name of the newest an youngest operatic star. Miss Shay is said to posse a voice of rare sympathetic quality. Moreover, it is cle fresh, brilliant and capable of marvelous execution. O can imagine its capabilities when she has in her reperto such operas as "Faust," "Carmen," "Martha," "Il Trov tore," "Cavalleria Rusticana" and "I Pagliacci." Mi Shay is but twenty-three years old. She is a native Ohio and a handsome woman.

The Rose Cecilia Shay Grand English Opera Compan of which Col. William A. Thompson is the director, is daily rehearsal, and will be the largest, strongest and mo complete organization in the United States, artists, chor and orchestra forming an ensemble of unrivaled magn tude and merit

Colonel Thompson will begin Miss Shay's season in t South, Baltimore, Richmond, Norfolk and Cincinn being engaged for the opening weeks.

The management has also an option of a theatre in N York in the spring, when English opera will be present

MUSIC IN BROOKLYN.

F a poor beginning does makes a brilliant ending, then the music department of the Brooklyn Institute will me out of the present musical season with flying colors. ertainly the opening of the concert season ended in disap-intment and financial loss. Hungry and thirsty for mu-c after the long, hot summer, Brooklynites bought out e entire Academy of Music for the recital by Madame chumann-Heink, under Institute auspices. On the day of e recital, October 17, a telegram was received in the af-rnoon from the wilds of Vermont saying that the con-alto was ill, and therefore could not keep her engage-ent. On receipt of this news there was a rush to the In-tute printer that was worthy of Chicago, but not of con-rvative Brooklyn. However, flaring posters were ready twilight, and these were pasted on the doors and panels the Academy, notifying the people of the singer's illness. out 8 o'clock in the evening the street in front of the cient amusement hall recalled an overflow meeting in e political compaign. Since the hour of receiving the egram from Vermont the Institute managers have heard thing from the famous contralto. But this is not her lt, for at the present time she is traveling in the South th the Grau Opera Company. The Institute by this time s refunded the money for the tickets. As for the In-tute losses, amounting to several hundred dollars, noth-g remains to be done but to enter them upon the debit e of the ledger. Some day THE MUSICAL COURIER's as of a business arrangement just to both parties in the nsaction will be understood and adopted by those who nage concerts. It does not seem altogether fair for an ucational institution like the Brooklyn Institute to lose eral hundred dollars merely because a singer fails to p her engagement.

The second concert of the season by the Brooklyn Insti-e was given at Association Hall last Wednesday even-. It was advertised as the first in a series of "song and lin recitals," the singers being Mrs. Marie Zimmerman, rano; Gertrude May Stein, contralto; Mackenzie rden, tenor, and Julian Walker, baritone. Franz Wilczek s the violinist; Isidore Luckstone the pianist. The ncipal numbers on the program must have been caviar most of the people in the audience. If the Grau singers the Metropolitan Opera House murder Beethoven's delio," what can be expected of singers of the Gordon-lker type? Of the women, Mrs. Zimmerman was the t. Her voice is fresh, limpid, sweet and always true to h, but even with her assistance the quartet from Bee-ven's immortal opera went sadly. Schumann's "Span-es Liederspiel," a song cycle, which the German roman-it wrote first for one voice, and later he made an ar-gement for four voices—soprano, alto, tenor and bass. he concerted form, however, the soprano has most of the ing to do. She leads in the two quartets, and in the e duets with the alto. Mrs. Zimmerman again proved excellence as a vocal artist, and clear enunciation of the man text was another point in her favor. Each one of four singers appeared in solos. Mrs. Zimmerman sang lyrics of the Elizabethan era, by Battison Haynes—w Is My Chloris," "Adieu, Sweet Amaryllis," "Though Carriage Be But Careless" and "Heigh Ho!" As a ns of providing variety to a program such songs may ell enough, but the educated musician would probably a square out of his way to escape hearing them.

r. Walker sang songs by White, Dix and Cowen, and he them as if he were addicted to the tutti-frutti habit, and adhered to it while singing. Nobody could understand a word, although the words of the songs were English. Before Mr. Gordon made his bow as a soloist, Henry Allan Price, of the song recital committee, appeared on the stage and stated that Mr. Gordon was singing under difficulties and against the advice of his physician. Therefore the audience was asked to excuse him from singing his solos; he would, however, oblige with that elaborate novelty, "Loch Lomond," which was down on the program as "a request." It was through the singing of "Loch Lomond" that Mr. Gordon originally ingratiated himself with the Institute audiences, and the audiences ask for him annually on that account, as children cry for the things they like. With New York, not to forget the Borough of Brooklyn, overrunning with musicians who can play the violin, it seems incredible that a player like Wilczek should receive an engagement. To pass his performance over in silence is an act of charity. Mr. Luckstone did effective work at the piano.

The next recital in the series will be given Wednesday evening, November 13, by Whitney Tew, an American baritone, who has established a fine reputation in England. Miss Anna Otten, violinist, will be the other artist at this recital.

The opening sale of tickets for the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was held at Chandler's on Liszt's birthday, October 22. Boxes were purchased by Henry K. Sheldon, president of the Brooklyn Philharmonic; Lowell M. Palmer, Mrs. George Hunt Prentiss, John B. Lord, Miss Mary Benson and Mrs. Frank M. Lupton. The dates of the concerts were announced last week.

The Kaltenborn Quartet has been engaged to give a series of Sunday afternoon concerts at the Brooklyn Crescent Athletic Club.

November 3 the Brooklyn Arion will repeat the performance of "Die Fledermaus" at the Amphion Theatre on Bedford avenue.

The United Singers of Brooklyn are interesting themselves in the concert to be given on the evening of November 18, at the Academy of Music, for the benefit of the German Hospital of Brooklyn. Miss Fannie Levy, who studied in Berlin with Carreño, will be the piano soloist.

Arthur Hochman, the young Russian-American pianist, who made a successful début in Pittsburg on October 19, will play at the orchestral concert which the Brooklyn Saengerbund will give at the Academy of Music, December 9, under Brooklyn Institute auspices. Mrs. Louise Scherhey, contralto, will be the vocal soloist. A number of novelties will be presented. Mr. Koemmenich, the conductor of the Brooklyn Saengerbund, is rehearsing the new choral works. Hochman expects to play the Scharwenka Concerto.

P. S.—Since the above was written, the Brooklyn Institute has announced that Madame Schumann-Heink will give the song recital, postponed on account of illness, on Friday evening, December 27. Tickets originally purchased for October 17 will be good for December 27.

TSCHAIKOWSKY.—Tschaikowsky's biography is now being written by his brother, Modest Tschaikowsky. This important work will be published in four languages.

SAINT-SAENS' NEW OPERA.

First Performance in Paris of "Les Barbares."

PARIS, October 24, 1901.

A FASHIONABLE audience at the Opéra attended the first performance last night of Saint-Saëns' new opera, "Les Barbares," with words by Victorien Sardou and Pierre Gheusi. The music is strongly Wagnerian in style, but on the whole it was not received with enthusiasm. The libretto deals with the invasion of Italy by the barbarians, interweaving the love of Marcomin, a barbarian chief, for Floria, a vestal virgin, who sacrifices her vows and accepts his hand and heart. Marcomin saves a town from pillage and massacre, the opera closing with a superb march of the departing barbarians and antique dances expressive of the joy of the citizens at being relieved of their presence.

President Loubet and Madame Loubet were in the audience. The Parisian critics all admitted that the opera was handsomely staged and finely interpreted by MM. Vaguet and Delmas and Mmes. Hatto and Heglon in the principal roles.

Marian Van Duyn.

MARIAN VAN DUYN opened her season's work this year with three concerts in the Canadian Maritime Provinces, October 7, 8 and 9. Mrs. Van Duyn met with great success at each appearance, and won some very favorable criticisms, a few of which are reproduced herewith. Mrs. Van Duyn is under the management this season of Remington Squire:

The solos of Mrs. Van Duyn were rewarded with enthusiastic and well deserved encores. She has a rich, creamy, flexible contralto voice, of which she has perfect control, and her admirably chosen selections were pleasing in the highest degree.—Daily Sun, St. John, N. B., Canada, October 9, 1901.

The alto, Madame Van Duyn, has a voice of large compass and quite melodious and powerful. She made a good impression, and double and triple recalls attended her separate numbers.—The Gazette, St. John, N. B., October 9, 1901.

Marian Van Duyn, the contralto, is an artist of high standing, and her numbers were much enjoyed. She has a fine contralto voice, exquisitely trained, and she sang with artistic taste and fine phrasing. Her first number, the aria from Gounod's "Queen of Sheba," was beautifully sung. Her last number, "My Heart at Thy Sweet Voice," from Saint-Saëns' "Samson and Delilah," was, indeed, a gem.—St. John Globe, October 8, 1901.

Mme. Marian Van Duyn became a favorite before she had finished her first song. Her full, clear and splendidly cultivated contralto voice did justice to her selections, and she was heartily encored.—St. John Star, October 8, 1901.

Madame Van Duyn sang three numbers. Her voice is a contralto of smooth, pleasing quality and good range, and she sings with excellent expression. Her reception was very cordial, and though she did not respond to any encores she was many times recalled.—Daily Telegraph, St. John, N. B., October 8, 1901.

KATHARINE NOACK-FIQUE.—Mrs. Katharine Noack-Fiqué, a professional pupil of Mme. Evans Von Klenner, has been engaged for several important concerts this autumn. On October 24 she sang at the dedication of a new organ at a Lutheran church in Brooklyn. November 3 she will be the soloist of the Harmonie Club, of New York. November 20, at the concert by the Quartet Club, of Brooklyn, at the Park Theatre. Mrs. Fiqué also sang in the recent performance of the operetta, "Der Falsche Mufti," at Terrace Garden, and she will sing on November 20, under the auspices of the Teutonia Singing Society, of Jersey City.

JEAN GERARDY.—Jean Gérardy, the 'cellist, was the soloist at the opening of the Boston Symphony season in Boston last week. Next week he plays with this organization in Cambridge, after which he will travel with them to New York, Philadelphia, Brooklyn and Providence. Gérardy will play next Thursday evening in Lenox, Mass.

THIS week has been marked with several special musical happenings. Monday last being Verdi's birthday, the event was celebrated at the Tivoli Opera House in accordance with a time-honored custom, the program embracing acts from "Aïda," "Rigoletto," "Il Trovatore" and "Otello," with overtures from "Nabucco" and "Forza del Destino" and solos from "I Lombardi," by Giuseppe Agostini, who received five curtain calls in appreciation, and Agusto Dado, who, I think, never sang better than on this occasion, and was vociferously encored. Barbareschi's Leonora was a lovely piece of work and well suited to her strong personality. Salassa's Iago needs no comment, it is so well known as his masterpiece. The whole program was under the direction of Paul Steindorff. Apropos of Steindorff, it is said that the old Symphony Club has become animated with the desire to do something at last, and having elected Paul Steindorff to the position of director, means to give some symphony concerts this winter. The dates and plans have not yet been made public. In any case we should not have gone begging, as we have other leaders perfectly competent to direct symphony and who were only waiting for the close of the grand opera season under Grau to go ahead with their plans. Of these Fred Zech may yet be heard from, as he will now hold back only to see how the Steindorff plans materialize. Mr. Zech is thoroughly conversant with his subject, and is confident of success should he undertake it. August Rodemann is another man who wields a magic baton, and is a thorough artist-musician. He knows symphony thoroughly, and the orchestra has been his playground from a lad, and every instrument is an intimate friend. So, we will see how this new symphony movement comes out. Much hangs upon the first performance—for the Symphony Club—after that "the deluge," or another attempt by the other people. The subject is fraught with much of interest for those who are awaiting the outcome. The Zech String Quartet are to give us a series of concerts this winter, to take place on Friday afternoons, November 8, December 13, January 10 and February 14, at Century Club Hall. One of their finest numbers will be a Brahms Quintet for clarinet and strings, which will be taken by Mr. Wrba and the strings. In the second concert the quartet will be assisted in the Schumann Quintet by Miss Belle Claire Chamberlain, the pianist. The members of the quartet are W. F. Zech, first violin; E. B. Lada, second violin; C. W. Fuhrer, viola, and A. M. Lada, 'cello.

The Moroney farewell concert took place on Saturday evening last with the most fashionable audience of the season. Miss Moroney is fortunate in having for her patronesses some of our very swellest set, so the audience from a quality standpoint was assured and the costumes were very chic and up to date, though there was room and to spare for at least 250 more in the audience. It was a very good concert, however, as concerts go. Miss Moroney is not a surprising pianist, but plays Chaminade, Godard and light Schumann numbers very prettily. Donald Graham's phrasing is so delightful that it will be a treat to hear him sing as long as he can take a tone. Camille D'Arville Crellin, though now a society dame, is still a trifle stagey, and her enunciation leaves much to be desired, but she has a big voice and is always a prime favorite. Mr. Langstroth did some very acceptable work in his 'cello numbers and it must be noted that if Miss Moroney has room for improvement in her solo work, her accompanying is delightful, and she took the whole burden of the program upon herself in this respect with very satisfying results.

The first of the Pasmore Popular Concerts is to take place to-morrow evening in Maple Hall of the Palace Hotel. One of the strongest attractions in these concerts will be the appearance of the Pasmore Trio, Mary Susan and Dorothy, who will play from memory complete trios for violin, 'cello and piano from Haydn, Beethoven, Mozart, Schumann, besides several novelties from Schubert, Brahms, Wagner, &c., arranged by Mr. Pasmore for the trio. Mrs. Florence Wyman Gardner, Mrs. Edith Scott Basford, A. E. Nowlan and Mr. Pasmore will sing solos, part songs, madrigals, &c., by classic and modern composers. Liza Lehmann's setting of the popular "Rubaiyat," known as "In a Persian Garden," will be a feature of one of the concerts. Miss Elizabeth Warden, who has been studying in London with William Shakespeare, will sing at several of the concerts. She has recently sung in concert in England and successfully. Mary, Susan and Dorothy Pasmore will play solos as well as ensemble. These children are already veterans in study, though hardly more than babes in years, and their work is thoroughly artistic and exceedingly delightful to listen to. Besides the above, Misses Adelaide Birchlu, Beulah George, Anna Moore, Mrs. Charles Hughes and Messrs. Edward Cahill and Thomas Nowaln will assist in solos and ensemble. Mr. Pasmore's idea in these concerts is to give a popular program from the highest and best composers' works, such as can be enjoyed and understood by both trained musicians and those who have simply good taste and a love for the beautiful in art.

On the same evening with the Pasmore concert will take place in Sherman-Clay Hall the first of Mrs. M. E. Blanchard's song recitals. Mrs. Blanchard was contralto in Trinity Church choir two years ago before going East, where she has been studying in Boston with Len Little and in New York with Oscar Saenger and Isador Luckstone. She had a very deep, rich contralto before leaving 'Frisco, and it is with interest one looks forward to these concerts, as the constant study to which she applied herself in the East cannot but have been fraught with most salutary results. While East Mrs. Blanchard held the position of solo contralto in the North Avenue Congregational Church, a position from which the church very reluctantly released her upon her return to California. The programs for her two concerts are arranged chronologically and are taken from the best composers.

It is announced that Manager Friedlander will hand the local concerts and prospective tour of little Ern Brandt, the wonderful piano prodigy, of whom I have spoken before in these columns as being the greatest of his kind, after her creating such a sensation among musicians last year in her concerts at Sherman-Clay Hall. The past year is said to have developed her wonderfully and beyond comprehension over what she demonstrated that time, and she is now prepared to do what has never been done by a child before—to execute upon the piano with orchestral accompaniment, the famous "Concertstücke" of Weber, the entire thirty pages of which she has committed to memory and will render without note. There will be in the orchestra fifty pieces. So far the composition has been performed by the greatest artists alone, and little Enid is said to perform it in a masterly manner. The first concert takes place on November 5.

The first "Pupils' Evening" for this year was given at the studio of Percy A. R. Dow, 1511 Larkin street, the subject for the evening being "Women Composers." The evening's work was divided into the song, the topic, which to read before the evening's program, what notes to take on the work done, &c., the object being the education of each pupil individually. A very pleasant time was enjoyed by all present. Those who took active part in the program were: Mesdames Chuck, Fuller, Hunt, Mendenhall, Rilea, Robb, Stewart, Taylor; Misses Aldersley, Barrow, Churchman, Coyle, Gyle, Greninger, Hipkins, Koenig, Monges, Von Manderscheid and Robinson; Messrs. Crilton, Kent, Kincaid, Pendleton, Webb and Wood. The accompanists were Missess Levinson, Von Manderscheid and Marrack.

Hugo Mansfeldt, who is now in Berlin, states that Henry Heyman is as well known in that city as he is in San Francisco, and that his teaching is very highly spoken of by all who have heard his pupils play.

"Florodora," at the Columbia, has had a big run, as might be expected. Among the people it seemed quite natural to see the familiar faces of George Lask, the stage director, who was for many years with the Tivoli, and really considered a fixture at that house, and the prima donna, Laura Millard, who was also connected with the Tivoli for a long while and who has many friends here. In connection with Tivoli people one is reminded of the recent untimely death of Irma Fitch-Wertheimer, one time of the Tivoli company, and well known in musical circles for her sweet voice and winning personality. Since her marriage two years ago she had abandoned the profession that she might be constantly at the side of Mr. Wertheimer, who is a traveling man.

The trio which gave such delightful musicales at Miss Westgate's studio in Alameda last year are preparing, by universal request, to give another series this season. The trio is composed of Miss Westgate, piano; Alex. Stew violin, and B. Frank Howard, 'cello. It is with pleasure one hears of the coming musicales.

Miss Annie Wilson, formerly connected with Henry Krehbiehl, the music critic of the New York Tribune, in his musical lectures, is giving piano illustrations of the "Nibelungen Ring" of Wagner in a series of nine lectures at Century Club Hall. Miss Wilson is a clever speaker and a fine pianist, and it is evident knows Wagner's works intimately and well. The lectures are also being given in Oakland and Berkeley, where they obtain high favor among Wagner students. MRS. A. WEDMORE JONES.

FROM MILAN.

CORSO VENEZIA 65, MILAN, ITALY,
September 30, 1901.

OPERA at the Dal Verme, the Alessandro Manzoni and at the Fossati theatres, with operetta and comic opera at the Commenda and at the Aurora—such have been the early autumn lot and choice in Milan during the last fortnight.

September 14 the Dal Verme opened for a preliminary season of one month's duration, with Donizetti's "Poliuto." After several repetitions of this opera, Bellini's "La Sonnambula," with the Spanish singer, Señorita Maria Galvany, as the protagonista or "star," was introduced and immediately made friends with the public, and has since attracted large and deliriously enthusiastic audiences to the house. I use the word "delirious" advisedly, for many people, without taste, rhyme or reason, lost their heads and seemed for the time being to have gone wildly mad in their demonstration of delight and pleasure over the singer's agility of voice, and the dexterity with which she fairly threw her high tones aloft.

The opening night's performance of "Poliuto" at the Dal Verme left much to be desired, and only Signora Emilia Corsi, as Paolina, the one female character in the cast called for any favorable mention. The lady is an artist of experience, and is at all times thoroughly conscientious in her work.

A few evenings later a "Serata di Gala" in honor and celebration of the "20th of September" (1870, when the Italians marched into Rome) was announced, with extra illumination of the house, &c., and with a new tenor to replace the other who had become indisposed. To be frank, the theatre on that occasion was brilliantly lighted and showed off to greater advantage. The evening's opera, "Poliuto," was preceded by a spirited performance of the "Gambetti Marcia Reale," played by the orchestra, and with the public's patriotism and enthusiasm already well aroused, the curtain rose, disclosing the first scene of the opera.

The male chorus and the orchestra had been better rehearsed and drilled, and were now in good condition. The band upon the stage proved to be a lively institution. In the orchestra there was a full complement of brass, and there was a "go" to the whole performance which had been woefully lacking on the first night.

The conductor, Signor Giuseppe Dal Fiume, directed his orchestra with a nervously vigorous yet firm and decisive touch. He is rather a distinguished and elegant looking gentleman, with full beard, well kept; his musicians appear to like him, and do his bidding with a good will.

The new tenor on this Serata di Gala was Egisto Guarnati, which, to my mind, should have read "Ardente" instead, for he sang so ardently, so earnestly, that he excited wonder and surprise, and some amusement. He was of physical force, had a most powerful voice, which was not at all badly placed, but which he used all the evening with the same degree of pressure, strength, color and tone quality, and, with no shading whatever, it became monotonous and tiresome to the listener—at least to some. The audience in certain parts of the house, however, always alert for anything a little higher or stronger than the average or usual voice production, were gleeful in loud applause over this tenor's lung capacity and physical endurance. This adoration of high tones and approval of certain "effects," though vicious from a correct vocal standpoint, are met with very frequently in Italian audiences—people with bad taste and unmusical natures are encountered here quite as often as elsewhere.

This Poliuto showed such strength and force of voice throughout the opera that he seemed unable to moderate or modulate—remaining under full steam pressure the entire evening. He really worked very hard, and his apparent earnestness and intensity were recognized by the audience, and rewarded with a storm wave of bravos and cries of "Bees, becs!" (bis, bis), and the final duet, in unisono, between tenor and soprano, was vehemently redemanded, and the orchestra not permitted to proceed until a repetition of at least a part of the duet had been obtained.

Maria Galvany appeared in "La Sonnambula" last evening for the seventh time, the performance being by general request. Señorita Galvany's appearance as Amina is petite of stature, with a prettily formed and well rounded figure, light brown hair and seemingly sandy, fair complexion. Her only jewelry adornment was a pair of dangling earrings—which I wish she wouldn't wear. While the lady is small, the tenor who supported her was no larger, at least no taller, though sufficiently stout and heavy in his medium, if not undersized, appearance. Maria Galvany's vocal technic is excellent. Her high tones are clear and clean cut; her staccati notes and passages—or, to be Italian in expresion, her "picchiettati"—are brilliantly decisive in execution, and these evoked vociferous, tumultuous applause, prolonged until the clamorous spectators obtained the repetitions, bis and tris, that they wanted. The singer's middle voice, I am glad to say, is round and full; the timbre or quality of these middle tones is a blending of two colors, with the mellowness and warmth of a mezzo-soprano; there is a soft, velvety smoothness about them very pleasant and agreeable to listen to; but as the singer mounts the scale this attractive quality disappears. Beautiful as the voice undeniably is in the middle range, the notes in the centre and upper half of the staff frequently sound a trifle flat in emission, due more to the manner of attack in tone placing than to actual flatness in pitch, for they invariably assert their rights and taper up into proper position and end perfectly in tune and pitch, as well as bell-like in purity.

This same short group of medium, or middle staff tones, shows a mouth fullness, hindering an easier and more forward production of the voice, in which respect the singer differs from most Italian trained sopranos of the present day. Nevertheless, Maria Galvany certainly has a beautiful voice—good quality in the centre, with high tones brilliant and acute, yet not piercing or too penetrating—splendid technical ability and knows how to sing in a most satisfying and pleasing manner. As remarked at the beginning, she enthuses her Italian audiences to the point of delirium. There is, however, one thing about Galvany's performance of "La Sonnambula" that makes the musician hesitate in his approval, and that is the extraordinary liberties taken with some parts of Bellini's music—changing and adding thereto in such a manner that Bellini becomes unrecognizable—the purpose being, of course, to display her technic and singing ability, but disclosing at the same time a lack of musicianship and proper appreciation of the fitness of things. Still, for these incongruous alterations of the music, others than the singer may be responsible and blamable.

The scene in Act II., where Amina pleads her innocence with Elvino and tries to explain and justify her presence in a room other than her own, had to be done all over again, the audience becoming so boisterously noisy in demanding an encore that the orchestra could not possibly proceed; this same thing happened at the close of the opera, the audience clamoring for an encore until Galvany repeated her last aria—containing most of the poor variations on Bellini—in front of the curtain, when the wild, half-crazed audience, like a mob, cried again and again more loudly for "bis" and they got it, variations, courtesies and pretty smiles of the fair cantatrice all thrown in.

The Dal Verme is a good-sized building covering much ground and is almost round in form; has two tiers of boxes and an immense gallery; the stage is large and very deep.

The chorus at this theatre numbers from forty to fifty singers; the orchestra contains forty-five players and will be increased to sixty for the Rossini opera of "Guglielmo Tell."

Having written at length on the Dal Verme Theatre, the most important of those open at present, I shall have to reserve my remarks concerning the Manzoni and the Fossati theatres for next week's letter—except to say that the opera season of fifteen or sixteen nights at the Manzoni closed with last night's representation of "Lucia di Lammermoor." The Talli-Gramatica-Calabresi Combination (a dramatic company) will take possession of the theatre to-morrow, opening with Pinero's "La Seconda Moglie" ("The Second Wife"), which, no doubt means, "The Second Mrs. Tanqueray"; to be followed by Sudermann's "I Fuochi di San Giovanni" ("The Fires of St. John") and other high class plays.

The death has been announced of M. Eugène Diaz, the composer. He was best known by his "Coupe du Roi de Thule" produced at the Paris Opéra and by his "Benvenuto Cellini," which was brought out a few years ago at the Opéra Comique. The deceased composer was the son of the celebrated painter Diaz de la Pena, who was of Spanish origin, though born in Bordeaux. The son, who has now died in Normandy, was born in Paris in 1837. His first notable work was the two act comic opera, "Le Roi Candaule," produced at the Théâtre Lyrique in June, 1865, and met with a better reception than the more ambitious five act opera, "Coupe du Roi de Thule."

It is said that Mascagni and Puccini together will collaborate on a new opera, the book to be by Luigi Illica and Giuseppe Giacosa, and based on a famous sentimental French romance or novel. The story is quite unlikely, but pretty from various viewpoints. "Wer glaubt wird seelig"—oder, "zahlt einen Gulden," as Germans and Austrians would remark.

At the Sonzogno theatre, the Lirico Internazionale, the opening has been definitely announced for October 26, with the new opera "Chopin," by Giacomo Oreficc; words by Angiolo Orvieto.

The most remarkable feature of the memorial service held in Constantinople in honor of President McKinley was that on the day of the funeral the Ottoman guardship at Therapia half-masted her flags. This is quite unprecedented, as Turkish flags are never half-masted. The Turks look upon it as a bad omen and insist that their flag always be at the top of the mast.

Prof. Hatson Wright, formerly of Denver, has been engaged as organist and choirmaster at Trinity Cathedral, Omaha, Neb.

Miss Flora Marguerite Bertelle, of Louisville, Ky., appeared at a number of concerts while in the West with great success.

A testimonial concert to Mrs. Hugh Nugent Fitzgerald was given at Dallas, Tex., on the 10th. Mrs. Ellen Bright-Ray was the soloist.

The Tri-City Concert Course, under the management of Mrs. G. Rawson Wade, gave a successful concert at Davenport, Ia., early in the month.

Mrs. Jacquis Bloom, Miss Lucie Moll and Miss Harriet Brenton, three pupils of Mrs. Emma Wilkins Gutmann, played a program in an informal recital at Mrs. Gutmann's studio, Peoria, Ill., last week.

At Syracuse, N. Y., the Lund-Borch concert opened the season on the 11th; Miss Unni Lund, Miss Birgil Lund, Gaston Borch and Prof. Conrad Becker.

George B. Stevens announces a series of six concerts to be given at Scientific Hall, Gloucester, Mass., on alternate Monday afternoons beginning Monday, October 21.

The subject of the St. Cecilia meeting at Grand Rapids, Mich., on the 18th, was "French Composers"; the program was arranged by Mrs. C. H. Hollister and Mrs. A. G. Dickinson.

The first event in the conservatory artist course, at Oberlin, Ohio, for the present term was a piano recital by Alberto Jonás, of Detroit, which took place Tuesday evening, the 8th.

The song recital of Frederick W. Wallis, of Kansas City, last week at the Art League rooms, Leavenworth, Kan., was the first affair in a musical way this season in that city.

Miss Alberta Fisher and U. S. Kerr have given concerts at Fargo, N. Dak., and Graceville, Minn. The Fargo concert was arranged by Mrs. T. A. Whitworth, who was also accompanist.

The organ recital given at the Trinity Methodist Episcopal Church, Norwich, Conn., on the 14th, by Jennie Lind Green, of Baltimore, was attended by a large and appreciative audience.

Prof. Marx Oberndorfer, Prof. B. E. Riggs, Prof. R. D. Parmenter and Mrs. Ida Hubbard Riggs gave the faculty recital at the Bollinger Conservatory of Music, Fort Smith, Ark., on the 10th inst.

A new quartet has been recently organized in Omaha, Neb. It is known as the Park Quartet, and consists of Miss Helen M. Burnham, Mrs. G. I. Babcock, W. L. Stevens and Ernest Johnson.

Miss Lucy M. Lehmann was assisted by Miss Flora Marguerite Bertelle, Peter Schlicht, Thomas C. Barr, Miss Virginia Hewett Shafer and Mrs. Simon Sapinsky at her recent concert in New Albany, Ind.

Mrs. Grenside-Dobson gave a private students' piano recital October 14, at her residence, Sioux City, Ia., at which Miss Mabel Anthony assisted. Miss Margaret White, one of the junior students, also appeared.

The Wilkesbarre, Pa., College of Music (Dr. Mason director) is open for the season. A large number of students are in attendance, and every department in full working order. Recitals are to be given frequently.

Miss Mary Ada Cornish, who was graduated from the College of Fine Arts of Syracuse University, class of 1901, has been given charge of the vocal department of the Collegiate Seminary at Hackettstown, N. J., for the year.

A program that afforded pleasure to a large audience was given at the Stone Opera House, Binghamton, N. Y., recently, under the direction of Mrs. E. M. Terwilliger, of Syracuse, and Miss Kate Fowler, Miss Clara Hunt, Miss Marguerite Stilwell and Edwin Howard appeared.

Miss Lydia Stevens has been elected organist of the Reformed Church, Cohoes, N. Y. Miss Stevens was a pupil of Miss Grace Noe, the former organist, and is now studying with Miss Clara Stearns at the Musical Conservatory, Troy. Miss Stevens is not yet seventeen, but is an excellent musician.

Two recitals will be given in the Passaic, N. J., Baptist Church, Tuesday, October 29, and Friday, December 20. The first one will be an organ recital, given by Prof. C. Walter Wallace, the blind organist of Philadelphia, Pa., who is a pupil of David D. Wood. The second recital will be by Prof. C. J. Levin, the mandolin virtuoso of Baltimore, Md.

The musical department of Fredericksburg (Va.) College, gave its opening recital October 18. Solos for piano, violin and voice were given, together with selections by the college orchestra of fourteen pieces. Frederick O. Franklin is musical director of the college.

A special scholarship has been given in the department of music at Yale to Nathan Sokoloff, a Russian boy of fifteen years, from Kief, Russia. The lad was a contestant for the Morris Steinert scholarship for excellence in violin playing and theory. He showed such wonderful talent in his work that Professor Sanford, of the school, proposed a special scholarship for the little Russian.

The course of concerts at the South Unitarian Church, Worcester, Mass., under the direction of Charles E. Mayhew, opened with a performance of Liza Lehmann's "In a Persian Garden." A short miscellaneous program preceded the production of the cycle. The soloists were Miss Bertha M. Titus, Miss J. Viola King, Charles S. Stoughton and Charles E. Mayhew. Mrs. Helen L. Bassett was at the piano.

Baylor Female College, located at Belton, Tex., is striding ahead in its music department beyond the attendance of any former years. The large influx of students is composed of a higher musicianship and includes a larger number of music teachers. The improved general standing of the music department points clearly to the methodical and systematic organization of its skillful music director, Dr. Eugene E. Davis.

The faculty of the Detroit Conservatory of Music consists of J. H. Hahn, Francis L. York, Herman Belling, Charles E. Mussey, Agnes Andrus, Lena McMaster, Mrs. Louise Unsworth Cragg, Mrs. R. W. Turnbull, Kate McDonald, Elizabeth Johnson, Frances Crossette, Mrs. M. I. Bentley, Mrs. T. K. Christie, Alice L. Carpenter, Olean Doty, Carl Beutel, Mrs. Ida Norton, Wm. Yunck, Mr. Charles H. Clements, Cora Cross, Michael Lambert, Jr., Charlotte McDonald, Frederica Moebs, Marian Grahan, Henry Summerfield, Ella Schroeder, Mabel Ferry, Mrs. Emma A. Thomas, Jennie Louise Thomas, Emil Speil, Harold Todd, Ida B. Heintzen, Henry Haug, Ida Vogt, Mae Evarts, Mrs. A. E. McClintock.

STELLA PRINCE STOCKER.—Dr. Henry M. Leipziger, supervisor of lectures for the schools in the city of New York, has engaged Mrs. Stella Prince Stocker for two of her illustrated talks on American music. The dates are Monday evening, November 4, at Public School No. 14, 2 East Twenty-seventh street, and Thursday evening, November 21, at Columbus Hall, on West Sixtieth street.

In these lectures there is a section on Indian music, and several of the illustrations consist of melodies which Mrs. Stocker secured while on a visit among the Chippewa Indians. It is a difficult matter for white people to persuade the Indians to sing so that their music may be written down, and these Chippewa melodies are a valuable contribution to American folk lore.

ADAME DE WIENZKOWSKA'S WORK HERE.

MONG the teachers of piano who are making a name here in New York none has been more successful an Mme. Melanie de Wienzkowska, directress of the schetizky School of Piano Playing at Carnegie Hall. A mber of her pupils are playing in public. William Bauer, e of the most gifted, is the solo pianist of the Leonora ckson Company. Miss Marion Mitchell, Miss Ruth Lib- and the child pianist Ida Mampel are other Wienz- wska pupils who played with success at public concerts t season, and they are to be heard again this winter. adame de Wienzkowska has played with European or- estras, with such conductors as Hans Richter, Mannsted d Josef Wieniawski. Since coming to the United States e has played at concerts with the Boston Symphony Or- estra, under Emil Paur, and with the Kneisel Quartet. She s also given recitals in the principal cities of the Eastern ates. Everywhere Madame de Wienzkowska is recog- ed as an artist, and one who possesses in a marked gree the gift of teaching.

Last year Madame de Wienzkowska received the follow- , which speaks for itself:

EAR MADAME MELANIE—It would greatly please me if my name, ch you wish to bestow on your school of piano playing, would ng you good fortune. It is certain that during the years of our ted studying and our united teaching, you acquired such erience as enables you not only to be a successful concert player to instruct, according to my method, but also with ability to duct a school of music.

With talent such as you possess, artistic development is ever pro- ssing. Therefore, I feel assured that your practical and theoreti- knowledge is continually on the increase.

or your courageous enterprise accept my best wishes. They will ays follow you.

am perfectly aware that many and various persons, whose knowl- e is little or nothing, misuse my name—but you, I know and ect, will do it honor.

ith heartiest greeting from myself and wife, I am, as ever,
Yours sincerely devoted, THEODOR LESCHETIZKY.

Madame de Wienzkowska was born in Warsaw and in ldhood showed remarkable talent. As a child she played many concerts in Poland and Russia. By the advice of chetizky she remained in Vienna, where she had ac- red an enviable standing both professionally and so- ly. Then began a career as teacher which has been one nd of successes. With the children of both Leschetizky a Richter she made manifest such a talent for teaching for seven years she taught the pupils that were to pass the hands of Leschetizky. When she first came to this ntry Madame de Wienzkowska carried with her letters ntroduction from Paderewski to the late William Stein- , the late Anton Seidl and several other important peo- in the musical circles of New York and Boston. Be- s indorsements from Leschetizky, Hans Richter, Mad- de Wienzkowska possesses this one by Paderewski:

ne. de Wienzkowska is one of the very best pupils of Lesche- , a finished pianist, and possesses an extraordinary ability for nunicating to others a complete knowledge of her art.
(Signed) I. J. PADEREWSKI, Paris.

hen Anton Rubinstein visited Warsaw he attended a arsal where Saint-Saëns was expected to appear as ist. Something happened to prevent the Frenchman n keeping the engagement, and a girl pianist (Wienz- ska) became the substitute. Rubinstein, disappointed at not meeting Saint-Saëns, said he would remain for a "few moments."

"Who is that little girl at the keyboard?" inquired the great Russian pianist and composer. He was told that the girl was talented. After a few bars had been played his interest increased, and he remarked: "Ah! I will stay longer." He waited until the close, taking a position where he could closely watch the young pianist, and singing to himself the melody of the concerto, and when the last notes were played he joined heartily with the orchestra in applauding the soloist, and taking her by the hand said: "Your playing interested me greatly, my dear child; you have a career before you. This is not the last time I shall hear you."

Madame de Wienzkowska at that time not only took the place of Saint-Saëns, but played the composition he was advertised to play—his own Concerto in G minor. Even at that early age Wienzkowska had an extensive repertory.

Madame de Wienzkowska's classes in repertory and interpretation are held Mondays at Carnegie Hall. Later in the season she will give a series of pupils' recitals.

HENRY XANDER.—Henry Xander, the musical director of the Washington, D. C., Saengerbund, ushered in the fifty-first year of that organization with an excellent musical program Sunday, October 20.

ANTON KASPAR.—Anton Kaspar, the violinist, has returned from Europe, and is now booking engagements for the coming season.

"Elements of Violin Playing."

HEINRICH KLINGENFELD continues to receive testimonials from artists and teachers commending his valuable instruction book, "Elements of Violin Playing." Following are three more indorsements:

Messrs. Breitkopf & Haertel, New York:

DEAR SIRS—It affords me great pleasure in expressing my opinion on Klingenfeld's "Elements of Violin Playing." Have examined it carefully and can recommend it to all beginners. All requirements of learning the art of violin playing are expressed perfectly. The method is well graded and evidently the result of long and effective study and experience in teaching. Shall use it whenever opportunity affords. Wishing H. Klingenfeld the deserved success, I remain, Yours respectfully, HENRY FROELICH, Auditorium School of Music, Cincinnati, Ohio.

Messrs. Breitkopf & Haertel, New York:

DEAR SIRS—Have examined the "Elements of Violin Playing," by H. Klingenfeld, carefully, and find it an excellent work, which I can recommend highly to teachers and pupils, as I shall use it in my own violin school.

Thanking you for your kind attention, I remain,
Yours sincerely, ERNST H. BAUER.
NEW YORK, 130 East Fifty-sixth street.

Messrs. Breitkopf & Haertel, New York:

GENTLEMEN—Some time ago I received a copy of Klingenfeld's "Elements of Violin Playing," and after careful examination am very favorably impressed with the work. The author has shown a thorough knowledge of the requirements of both teacher and pupil. I shall be pleased to use the work, and heartily recommend it to other teachers. It is the best elementary work that has come under my observation. Pardon my delay in not writing you before, but my professional duties have prevented me from giving it earlier attention. Yours very truly, S. E. JACOBSOHN, Chicago Musical College.

GREGORY HAST.—The eminent English tenor, Gregory Hast, sailed for America October 26, on the Umbria, for a series of recital and concert appearances, under the direction of Manager Loudon G. Charlton. Mr. Hast is in such demand abroad that he can give but November and December to America. His first date is in Milwaukee, November 4, immediately after his arrival.

From a boy soloist at St. Peter's, Vauxhall, to eminence among the concert tenors of Europe is the record achieved by Mr. Hast, whose early training was under Alfred Ayres, the noted London organist. With the verteran Sims Reeves he took a special course in oratorio. Besides a voice of exceptional range, and singular beauty and purity, Mr. Hast is credited with a style notably artistic, and interpretation of marked refinement and culture.

His extensive, varied and choice repertory includes between sixty and seventy oratorios and cantatas. In the Bach Christmas music and "The Messiah" Mr. Hast has made some of his most brilliant successes. Among the song writers he has made Bach and Brahms a specialty, although he is famous, besides, for his interpretation of French and Italian songs, German lieder and old English ballads. He has achieved signal triumphs in important music festivals all over England, as well as in oratorio appearances and his own London ballad concerts.

MUSICAL COURIER OFFICES—FINE ARTS BUILDING.

CHICAGO, October 24, 1901.

THE development of music in the West, and particularly in Chicago, has been forcibly demonstrated by an interesting article which appeared in the Musical Courier Extra of last Saturday. Estimates in the treatise to which reference is made were formulated for the benefit of those whose privilege it is to promote the piano industry in this portion of the United States, but the following extracts cannot fail to claim the thoughtful attention of professional musicians in this city:

"In the East there is one permanent orchestra, and that one in Boston. What that orchestra is it is not necessary to say. The world knows it. In the West there are three permanent orchestras—one in Pittsburg, one in Cincinnati and one in Chicago. Taking this as a foundation, it is but a step to the working teacher and the pupil. * * *

"Probably no better method of estimating the number of music pupils in Chicago can be given than to take five buildings within two blocks—namely, the Fine Arts Building, the Auditorium, the Kimball, the Steinway and the College of Music. To state that over 21,000 pupils are being taught at this time in these five buildings will cause a little surprise, and yet the statement is not beyond the facts, as certain counts that have been made the past week for this paper exclusively have demonstrated.

"The thought was aroused by a statement in the Chicago department of THE MUSICAL COURIER, Wednesday edition, two weeks ago, that there were over 3,000 pupils attending the Chicago College of Music. It was an easy step to the other buildings, and then the estimate was attempted. There are between 7,000 and 8,000 in the Fine Arts Building, this estimate being made by Mr. Curtiss, who keeps a very close count of the total number of persons who enter. * * *

"This, of course, does not include the halls, &c., but only music pupils. Mr. Wise, of the Kimball Building, had a close canvass made of the pupils there, and several counts were made. His estimate is that the number of pupils are over 7,000, while Mr. Hunt, of the Auditorium Conservatory, kindly made a careful estimate of the number of pupils that enter the Auditorium, including over 1,500 pupils that attend his conservatory, and the total is over 2,000. We next take up the Steinway Building, and the estimate was made there by getting from the manager of the building the number of teachers who have studios, and it is figured that upward of 2,000 pupils receive instruction there. Now to recapitulate:

The Fine Arts Building	7,000
Chicago College of Music	3,000
Kimball Building	7,000
Auditorium Conservatory and studios	2,000
Steinway Building	2,000
Total	21,000

"Another interesting estimate can be made as to the number of music pupils in Chicago by taking a carefully corrected list of music teachers. This list numbers over 2,000 music teachers within the corporate limits of Chicago, and does not include what the trade terms the 'litte teachers.' This list does not include, either, the teachers in the large schools, like the College of Music, who number eighty-six, or the Auditorium Conservatory, who number sixty-three, and other like institutions, which would run the number over 2,000. If we, then, allow that each one of these teachers has an average of twenty pupils, it can be seen that the total number of pupils studying music runs over 40,000, based on this list, and it is not going beyond the bounds of reason to claim that over 75,000 persons are studying music in Chicago." * * *

All the world knows that in America this is an age of too much hurrying. It is the case of a fair Brünnhilde, this twentieth century, which must be rescued from the fire of intensity by the Siegfried of discriminating patience.

The process of development unceasingly is making itself felt here. Journalistic enterprises expand. Education enlightens. The child pianist becomes the matured artist.

Vocal students, would-be pianists or violinists, why thrust a life's work into one short season?

Time claims its due. Experience is the reward.

Roses must be buds before they can be roses. And they triumph in the opening.

Speaking of roses, would that the fragrance of sentiment might oftener find expression in art!

Someone was practicing Liszt's Polonaise in E the other day. Someone should be told that music is not arithmetic.

Do you remember the dramatic theme—a stately theme—entering unexpectedly in Bach's Toccata in F? Counterpoint may be blank verse occasionally. There are parallels in Bach and Shakespeare.

Lionel Parker, a brother of Gilbert Parker, the Canadian novelist, is a pupil of Mrs. Anna Graff Bryant, of the Fine Arts Building. Mr. Parker is the possessor of a beautiful baritone voice. Among other talented and promising vocalists who study with Mrs. Bryant are Louise Morgan Taylor, soprano, of Evansville, Ind., and Florence G Atkins, contralto, of Indianapolis, Ind.

William H. Sherwood's revised and annotated editio seven octave studies by Theodor Kullak is a publica which music students will find particularly valuable.

From his offices in the Fine Arts Building Charle Baker is sending out Esther Feé's new and effective c lars, which represent the young violinist in street d carrying her chosen instrument in its case; and also st ing in a concert platform attitude, which suggests th concerto is about to be played. KARLETON HACKETT.

American Conservatory, Kimball Hall, makes the ng interesting announcement concerning the career leton Hackett, whose exceptional attainments as ur and musician were referred to in these columns or two ago:

on Hackett is widely known as a master of the voice, an shed singer and a writer on subjects pertaining to the art g. His work at the Conservatory has been phenomenally l, contributing much to the present high artistic standard h the department is noted. A man of fine literary attain- being a graduate of Harvard, a pupil for years of the cele- Maestro Vannini of Florence, Italy, with whom he fitted for the opera, and of Georg Henschel, in London, who in- him in German song and oratorio, Mr. Hackett possesses nal qualifications for instructing in all departments of vocal the time of her first appearance on the platform till she the final encore on the program the audience listened with less stillness and intense interest. The first number on the was "La Mort de Jeanne d'Arc" (Bemberg). As Miss n came on the stage she was greeted with applause. Then waited in silence for the first words of the song, which lered in a faultless manner. The expression of the selection fect, and the softer tones were given with a clearness and hat few vocalists possess. In this selection Miss Thomp- showed a good strength of voice and a perfect tone. ery gratifying to hear of the steady progress which g made by the Chicago Mendelssohn Club. The l not lose any active members during the summer and no more voices will be examined for the present, as there is now a waiting list of twenty. One of the most artistic programs the organization has ever arranged is now being prepared for its first concert at Studebaker Hall, Fine Arts Building, December 17.

FAY HILL, PIANIST.

Fay Hill, pupil of the Auditorium Conservatory's director, Frederic Grant Gleason, is a young Chicago pianist whose talents, personality and educational advantages are combining to fit her admirably for the exacting requirements of the concert stage. It is evident that Miss Hill may look forward to what critics are pleased to term a "future."

Miss Daisy Dowden, soprano, who is visiting Chicago for the purpose of studying singing with the eminent soprano Helen Buckley, recently illustrated a lecture given before the High Park Travel Class. Miss Dowden comes from Kansas City, Mo. She is making admirable progress under Miss Buckley's instruction.

A successful pupil of Mme. Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler, the great pianist, is Miss Sara MacAdam, members of whose class gave a very creditable recital yesterday in the Fine Arts Building.

The clever young musicians, Vernon d'Arnalle, baritone, and Glenn Dillard Gunn, pianist, both members of the faculty of the Chicago Musical College, will give a musicale in the Recital Hall, College Building, on Tuesday evening, November 12.

It is satisfactory to learn that Miss Inez Taylor, a pupil of M. Herman Devries, of the Chicago Musical College, won success in opera in New York last week. She appeared as the Shepherd in a production of "Tannhäuser" at the Broadway Theatre.

Joseph Vilim, W. H. Bond and Master Richard Vilim, all of the American Violin School, Kimball Hall, furnished the violin solos at a concert given on October 23 by the Bohemian Club. Mr. Holub was the pianist.

The Chicago Auditorium Conservatory is fortunate in being able to offer the ensuing interesting announcement this week, in reference to its excellent faculty:

The Auditorium Conservatory has made another important addition in the person of Signor Umberto Beduschi, the celebrated tenor of the Royal Italian Opera. Signor Beduschi, who has been traveling in America for the past year, now decides to make Chicago his home. Musicians the world over are unanimous in pronouncing him one of the finest tenors of Europe. He has sung with the foremost Continental organizations, and he has appeared at the Royal Madrid Theatre, Moscow; Imperial Theatre, and Covent Garden, London, where he was commanded to sing before the Queen. He created the tenor roles in Puccini's "Nanon Lescaut," the first English performance of Verdi's "Falstaff," Leoncavallo's "La Bohème," in Venice, and Massenet's "Werthe," in Florence. Signor Beduschi will make his Chicago début very shortly.

Carl Lampert, of the Chicago Orchestra, has been engaged for the violin department of the Chicago Auditorium Conservatory.

H. Stanley Davies, the well-known stage manager and dramatic coach, who has been very successful at the University of Chicago, has been added to the teaching force of the Chicago Auditorium Conservatory's dramatic department.

The following paragraph illustrates that Helen Buckley made a successful appearance at Delaware, Ohio, on October 16:

The song recital given by Miss Helen Buckley at Monnett Hall Wednesday evening was one of great interest to all lovers of good music. Miss Buckley possesses a fine soprano voice of superior dramatic quality, with wide range and a smoothness equalled by few singers. The charming manner and style of her singing won for her a place in the hearts of all her hearers, and she will always be welcomed by an audience from the Ohio Wesleyan School of Music. The program throughout was rendered with perfect ease, and a thorough knowledge of the songs used. Any comments of her work are unnecessary, but one can hardly refrain from speaking in the highest terms of praise of the arrangement of the program and the singing of the aria by Handel, and the "Hear Ye, Oh, Israel" ("Elijah"), by Mendelssohn. The group of Schubert songs were especially well interpreted; while the songs from both French and American composers were presented in a style that only artists of Miss Buckley's ability could give.—The College Transcript, Delaware, Ohio, October 19, 1901.

What music student in this city, having read "Mozart in Munich and Salzburg" (see this week's MUSICAL COURIER), will not embrace with renewed ardor the ambition to become more familiar with the compositions of that great master?

Too often "music," which, alas! is not music, monopolizes precious hours in studio or on concert platform.

A Mozart revival is needed.

Bach, Beethoven, Mozart, where are you half the time?

When a great art critic visits a great art centre his pen irresistibly vibrates with more than the average student will ever in this world be able to discover for himself. Therefore let the student endeavor to appreciate the immeasurable value of true art criticism, which sometimes becomes art revelation. * * * "After this I looked, and behold, a door was opened in heaven, and the voice which I heard was as it were of a trumpet talking with me; which said, 'Come up hither and I will shew thee things.'"

Bernhard Listemann, of the Chicago Musical College's violin department, has just printed a valuable magazine article on Nicolo Paganini. Mr. Listemann, after giving an account of the famous violinist's predecessors, says in part:

As a man Paganini certainly had his faults, as spots in man's character will be found forever. But they were redeemed by so many good traits that naturally we willingly ignore those shortcomings. He loved his mother and his child dearly, showed a friendly and kind disposition toward people whom he liked, bothered nobody with his self-praise and self-glorification, spoke with warmth and kindness of rival violinists, and was in rapture when he heard good opera music, or when he could play a Beethoven quartet.

Paganini's compositions are full of originality, particularly the two concertos, which in parts exercise a charm which it may be difficult to find in works of far greater violin composers. Great, and a master work in every sense, are the "Twenty-four Capriccios" for violin. They are short and concise in form, but possess such a pronounced character and document, a source of such inexhaustible technical possibilities, that all that has been written since on the high grade technic plan simply pales before this work. Genius is here pure and simple.

The complete list of Paganini's works—published, manuscript, incomplete, compiled, and lost—comprises some forty compositions: solos for violin alone, or with orchestra, among them eight concertos; duos, trios and quartets, mostly for strings and guitar. None of Paganini's concert pieces indicate the interpretation they received by the composer. Some of them appear in such a meagre and soulless shape indeed that one is forced to the view, how the composer wished to leave us in his solo parts a mere skeleton, the spirit to depart with him. What a pity! But although not, in a certain sense, allowing us the full benefit, they have opened to us an infinite great horizon in the mastery of mechanical matters and requirements, which are as indispensable to a modern violinist of talent and ambition as the Wagnerian orchestra is to an ambitious composer.

In conclusion Mr. Listemann pays this glowing tribute:

Paganini's virtuosity will remain the centre around which the violin world moves. Great violinists were before him, and great ones have followed him, but none has climbed the height on which Paganini's genius is throned.

Guilmant Organ School. Many organists in the West who contemplate studying in the East will be interested in learning that William C. Carl's successful educational institution is under the patronage of such noted musicians as Guilmant, Théodore Dubois, Jules Massenet, Eugene Gigout, J. Frederick Bridge and Edmund H. Turpin.

Recitals have been resumed at the Chicago Musical College, among performers who have already appeared being Miss Tillie Rose, Miss Alma Cole Youlin, Arthur Band, Miss Grace Leach and Edwin Charles Rowdon.

Western musicians learn with sincere regret the news that the eminent organist, Frederic Archer, is dead.

THE FIRST ORCHESTRAL CONCERT.

The first concert of the Chicago Orchestra's eleventh season took place yesterday afternoon, October 25, in the Auditorium. Before a numerous and appreciative audience Theodore Thomas conducted the following program:

March, E flat, op. 40.....Schubert
Overture, Oberon.....Weber
Symphony No. 2, D major, op. 36.....Beethoven
Macbeth (first time).....Richard Strauss
Tone poem after Shakespeare's drama.
Fragments from Das Rheingold (new).....Wagner

Schubert's March in E flat was an appropriate inaugural number, neither too ponderous not yet too submissive, but full of simple dignity. The trio part always is beautiful.

Weber's Overture to "Oberon" received an animated interpretation. The exquisite opening strains were full of repose. The sudden contrast was magnificent. You were walking along Michigan avenue on a quiet, summer day. Nature enveloped you. When all in a moment's time the city's fire reels came hurrying by you in their defiant majesty. Thus was the music dramatically realistic.

The first movement of Beethoven's Symphony was polished, precise, artistic, passionless. The Larghetto became more appealing. The scherzo was charming. The allegro molto brilliant. The orchestra did some noble work.

After an intermission a bell summoning people to their seats was rung, and Richard Strauss' effective tone poem, Shakespeare's "Macbeth," claimed attention. Fragments from Wagner's "Das Rheingold," arranged during his summer holiday by Mr. Thomas, concluded the program. On this occasion Wagner seemed to be honored by a more sympathetic interpretation than that tendered to Schubert, Weber, Beethoven or Strauss.

To-night the same program was successfully repeated at the season's second orchestral concert in the Auditorium. The audience was large.

RECITAL BY MISS HOEGSBRO.—The recent recital given at the Garden City Hotel by Inga Hoegsbro consisted of the following program, which was delightfully performed:

Kammenoi-Ostrow.....Rubinstein
Mazurka.....Saint-Saens
Etude de Concert.....Neupert
Alla Menuetto.....Grieg
Rustle of Spring.....Sinding
Auf Flugeln des Gesanges.....Mendelssohn-Liszt
Hymne.....Godard

JOHN DENNIS MEHAN.—This newcomer has just located here, and thanks to exceptional support from our most prominent singers, names known all over the country, he has at one jump assumed the place which belongs to him of right. Detroit and Pittsburg have heretofore been the scene of his labors, in which he is assisted by Mrs. Mehan, and now he has possibly the most artistic and attractive suite in Carnegie Hall.

CINCINNATI, October 26, 1901.

HARRY B. TURPIN, the genial voice teacher and conductor, of Dayton, Ohio, was in the city this week and is full of enthusiasm for the chorus work which he will direct during the coming winter in the beautiful Gem City. The following circular, addressed to the finest chorus "material" in and about Dayton, explains itself:

DAYTON, Ohio, October 23, 1901.

You are cordially invited to become a member of the Dayton Festival Chorus, which is now being organized on a permanent basis, with H. B. Turpin as director, Walter S. Allen, president, and Messrs. J. K. McIntire, J. B. Thresher, J. W. Stoddard, H. H. Weakley and J. H. Friend as honorary vice-presidents.

The executive board is composed of Messrs. H. H. Bimm, H. L. Munger, J. M. Cox, B. B. Thresher, Henry A. Stout, A. LeRoy Tebbs, Harry Loy, William Hardie, F. S. Hires, F. A. Brooks Barry Kumler, A. L. Bowersox, E. S. Thomas and H. E. Wall, Mesdames W. J. Blakeney, G. N. Bierce, W. L. Caton, William Hunter, W. F. Gebhart, James Anderton and Albert Emanuel, and the Misses Maude Reher, Gertrude McKemy, Virginia M. Murray and Jeannette Turpin.

The work planned for this winter is of unique order. There will be but one public concert, which will take place during the first week in April.

It will be the director's endeavor to train the chorus as much in tone production as in the correct interpretation of the works to be studied. A part of each evening's rehearsal will be given to short talks on voice placing, breathing and the knowledge of chorus singing without over-exertion of the voice.

The fact that but one concert is to be given will obviate the necessity of haste and of extra rehearsals and will enable each member to thoroughly comprehend the works to be given and to derive considerable knowledge of vocal art.

The membership fee will be $1.

Rehearsals will be held Monday evenings of each week at the W. C. A. Auditorium. The first rehearsal will be held Monday evening, November 11, at 7:30 o'clock.

The Ladies' Musical Club will present some interesting programs during the season. Following is the plan of concerts for the season: October, miscellaneous, in charge of Mrs. Hahn; November, Mozart, in charge of Miss G. Brown; December, Christmas music, in charge of Miss F. Stone; January, modern French, in charge of Mrs. Nina Pugh Smith; February, Italian, in charge of Miss Antoinette Werner; March, Brahms, in charge of Mrs. W. D. Breed; April, Russian Slavic, in charge of Mrs. G. Weber; May, miscellaneous, in charge of Mrs. Lytle Hunter.

On next Friday, November 1, Dr. Wade Thrasher will deliver the first of a series of lectures on the anatomy, physiology and hygiene of the vocal apparatus. Dr. Thrasher and W. S. Sterling inaugurated these lectures four years ago. All members of the vocal profession, both in and out of the college, are welcome, the lectures being designed particularly for them.

Dr. Nicholas J. Elsenheimer gave the first lecture in connection with the opening of the new department for the study of the Gregorian chant last Wednesday in the Lyceum. The next lecture will be given Wednesday, October 30, at 4.30 p. m. The first lecture was well attended and it is expected that an even larger number will attend the next lecture. All organists and vocalists of Cincinnati and vicinity are invited.

"Good Health, the Creation of Good Habits," was the subject of the lecture delivered by Miss Clara M. Zunstein Saturday afternoon.

Edmund A. Jahn, the well-known baritone and member of the college faculty, has now entirely recovered from a recent illness. Mr. Jahn will be able to take part in the first faculty concert, to be given by him and Ernest W. Hale, Friday, November 8.

Signor Romeo Gorno and Dr. Nicholas J. Elsenheimer will be heard in a two piano recital in Cincinnati previous to their concert tour.

The first of the students' weekly recitals will begin next Saturday afternoon, November 2, and will continue every Saturday afternoon throughout the academic year.

Miss Kathryn Gibbons and Ralph Wetmore have just returned from Louisville, where they were soloists at the first Philharmonic Orchestra concert given in that city. Both received an ovation, and the Louisville papers are speaking of them in the highest terms. Miss Gibbons sang the aria, "O Come, My Heart's Delight," from "Le Nozze de Figaro," and as an encore repeated it. She also sang a group of three songs, namely, "Why So Pale Are the Roses," by Tschaikowsky; "Return Again," by Alberto Gorno," and "Springtide," by Becker; as an encore she gave "At Twilight," by Nevin. Mr. Wetmore played the Spohr Concerto No. 8 and a Prelude by Bach, and as an encore, "Fantaisiestucke," by Wilhelmj.

Mazie Homan, pianist, and Edna Moorman, reader, gave a musical and literary entertainment of more than passing interest on Thursday evening, October 24, in Arion Hall, Masonic Temple, Avondale. The following program was presented:

Fantaisie Impromptu, op. 66, C sharp.....Chopin
Mazie Homan.
A Union.....Katherine Junker
The Legend of Bregenz.....Proctor
Edna N. Moorman.

BALTIMORE NEWS.

BALTIMORE, October 27, 1901.

THE musical season has begun, and well. As last year, a Peabody recital was the initial event, and as then, Ernest Hutcheson was the first soloist. This was his program:

Italian Concerto.....Bach
Etudes Symphoniques, op. 13.....Schumann
Polonaise in F sharp minor, op. 44.....Chopin
Mazurka in A minor, op. 41, No. 2.....Chopin
Etude in C minor, op. 10, No. 12.....Chopin
Ballade in A flat major, op. 47.....Chopin
Andante Tranquillo, op. 10, No. 2.....Hutcheson
Scherzo, op. 10, No. 4.....Hutcheson
Gavotte, op. 1, No. 4.....D'Albert
Ride of the Valkyries (by request).....Wagner
(Transcribed for piano by E. Hutcheson.)

Mr. Hutcheson's virtuosity and musicianship delighted his hearers as before, but his playing gave a deeper pleasure, for he has grown on the poetic side.

Most of the Schumann Variations were superbly played, the last ones, however, lacking the power one feels they demand; which, after all, is almost impossible of accomplishment without forcing the instrument.

Of the Chopin group the Polonaise created the greatest interest, because of its first appearance on a program here, but the much heard Ballade gave the greatest pleasure. New tenderness was breathed into it; indeed, it was exquisitely sung.

For the first time we have been vouchsafed the privilege of hearing Mr. Hutcheson as composer-pianist. His two pieces are charming, the second bristling with difficulties and brilliantly played. The D'Albert Gavotte was enchanting.

The pianist's own transcription of the "Walkürenritt" is monstrously difficult, and its performance at the end of a peculiarly trying program was an amazing one.

There will be the usual twelve Peabody recitals, a list of which follows:

Friday, October 25—Ernest Hutcheson, pianist.
Friday, November 8—Katharine Fisk, contralto.
Friday, November 22—Edwin Farmer, pianist, and J. C. Van Hulsteyn, violinist.
Friday, December 6—Emmanuel Wad, pianist.
Friday, December 20—Fritz Kreisler, violinist.
Friday, January 10—Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler, pianist.
Friday, January 24—Jean Gerardy, 'cellist, and Clara Ascherfeld, pianist.
Friday, January 31—Charles Rabold, baritone, Margaret Cummins, soprano, and Abram Moses, violinist.
Friday, February 14—Harold Randolph, pianist.
Friday, February 28—Mrs. Morris Black, contralto, and Francis Rogers, baritone.
Friday, March 14—Harold Bauer, pianist.
Friday, April 4—Plunket Greene, baritone.
Afternoons at 4 o'clock.

The golden jubilee celebration of the Arion Singing Society was a gala three day affair.

The first day, Sunday, the 6th inst., was made the occasion of the unveiling of the Wagner bust by the Baltimore societies at Brooklyn.

The exercises included addresses and the execution of a good musical program by an orchestra and about 400 singers under the direction of David Melamet.

Monday the Arion gave an excellent concert at Music Hall, under the direction of John C. Frank.

The society sang splendidly. The soloists were Madame Koert-Kronold and Mrs. Richard Ortmann.

Tuesday a commers was held.

Before this paper goes to press, but too late for this issue, Mrs. J. E. Barkworth will have given her first concert here. She is the wife of the new teacher of organ at the Peabody and a cultivated singer. More next week.

EUTERPE.

Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler.

THERE is going to be some piano playing through various important centres on the part of one of our artists very soon, as the subjoined list of engagements shows. We refer to the playing of Mrs. Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler, and it includes her dates to December 7 already closed. The demand for this artist's playing is universal and constantly on the increase. Here is a list of some of her engagements:

October 28.....Davenport, Ia.
October 29.....Lincoln, Neb.
November 4.....Chicago, Ill
November 13.....Grand Rapids, Mich.
November 16.....New York city
November 19.....New York city
November 20.....Boston, Mass
November 23.....Boston, Mass.
November 25.....Rochester, N. Y.
November 26.....Oberlin, Ohio
November 27.....Cleveland, Ohio
November 28.....Fremont, Ohio
November 29.....Saginaw, Mich.
November 30.....Notre Dame, Ind
December 2.....Wichita, Kan.
December 4.....Minneapolis, Minn.
December 5.....St. Paul, Minn.
December 7.....Burlington, Ia
December 10.....Chicago, Ill.

Ludwig Breitner.

WE submit herewith a circular just issued by the manager of Ludwig Breitner, the eminent pianist and teacher:

Ludwig Breitner, pianist and teacher, begs to inform his friends, patrons and the public that during October he will open a school of music at No. 311 Madison avenue, New York city, where he will receive applications for lessons. Special class for teachers and students preparing for professional careers.

Mr. Breitner, who was a favorite pupil of the great masters Franz Liszt and Anton Rubinstein, has decided to make America his future home, conducting a college of music on the same order as the Breitner School of Music at Paris, France, which was under his personal supervision, and soon gained for him a wide reputation, which extended to America and found for him many Americans among his pupils, some having since appeared in public. As a welcome to this country Mr. Breitner desires to offer a free scholarship to two young Americans, male and female students, not over eighteen years and not having the means to pay for a musical education, their admission to a free scholarship to be decided by a number of New York musicians who will act as a committee.

IT will be seen by an advertisement in this issue of the paper, published by Mr. Grau, that he has decided to engage legitimate musical stars to play upon the high-class vaudeville stage. The name of Mr. Grau is known throughout the land in connection with having managed some of the best artists in this country, and he is under the impression (and he is justified by the facts as the result of severe investigation) that there is a tremendous field open in which to appeal to some of the largest audiences in the United States, through the medium of the legitimate vaudeville stage.

We have all known that the concert business has not been satisfactory for our American artists. Prices have been driven down to figures that are not sustaining. The supply is greater than the demand; discrimination is not properly exercised; many singers sing for nothing merely to have their names appear in print under the impression that they are thereby getting a valuable advertisement (a great mistake, by the way), and altogether there is a great lack of business cohesion and principle in the conduct of the concert business.

Even the festivals are not the proper places now, simply because they have not paid. The Springfield Festival is a loss; the last Worcester Festival is a severe loss, and it now appears as if there must be some change of method and management in that city to bring about remunerative results. Other Festivals are also severe losses, unless the whole community springs up and unanimously indorses them. And the musical artists who have studied hard and can sing and play satisfactorily for the average public cannot secure that public through the concert business because it is not conducted properly, and they will only be able to secure that public throughout the country in a commercial, systematic manner through the vaudeville stage. Sooner or later this had to come. In the vaudeville theatres through the United States the most intelligent kind of audiences are to be found, and it must also be remembered that the cheap artist of the vaudeville stage has run out, so to speak, and has seen his day. They are known as "fakers," and the respectable vaudeville managers are tired of them. The old style song and dance, the colloquial artist, the minstrel imitator, and the buffoon and tramp are through, and are about to be relegated to a cheap vaudeville stage show; but the vaudeville theatres, with large investments, with handsome auditoriums, with well regulated stages in good locations in all of the large cities of the United States, are anxious to secure those artists who can sing and who can play good music, for the reason that the people want to hear good music.

Through Mr. Grau this opportunity now arises, and if our singers and players will study the matter, they will find that, after all, it is a question of business, and that if they are to be heard in concerts attended by a few people only, it is better for them to go before large multitudes, secure good pay and develop their careers.

IN an article regarding American pianists recently published from Paris in this paper, it was stated that not one American piano soloist was announced for next season in the United States. A letter just received says: "One exception is before us, and that is the case of Augusta Cottlow, who is an American and who was born in Illinois, and was a pupil of Frederic Grant Gleason and Otto B. Boise, and who, although she lived for a long time in Germany, can be called an American pianist"—not only an American one, but a good one.

THE management of Mr. Paderewski's tour in the United States, which begins on February 14 at Carnegie Hall with a recital, is in the hands of Charles A. Ellis, of the Boston Symphony, assisted by John C. Fryer, the former Paderewski assistant manager. Charles A. Ellis is a splendid specimen of an American musical manager, and Mr. Paderewski will have no friction under his excellent guidance.

Mr. Adlington, the English manager, will accompany Mr. Paderewski in the United States as his personal representative, and from thirty to forty concerts will be given, but not further West than Denver, if, indeed, as far West as that. The tour is sure to be a success, and Mr. Paderewski is acting very wisely in not subjecting himself to the many personal discomforts involved in an extended detailed tour through the smaller cities. He will secure sufficient engagements in the large centres to insure for him all that he requires, and therefore it is that the tour is certain to be a success in advance—artistically and financially.

IF an American student of music desires to learn how musical literature written by native authors compares with that produced by Europeans he (or she) can reach a safe conclusion after a few years' membership in a circulating library. A canvass of the leading book stores will also help to convince the student that American authors of musical literature have been praised beyond their merits. Certainly very few native authors have written works of permanent value. The brilliant exceptions may be counted upon the fingers of one hand. Serious minded students who have carefully perused books on music in foreign languages or in the translations by foreign authors can find very little to elevate or instruct them in most of the books by native authors. This writer recalls at this moment three books by three Americans, all three published in recent years, that are almost identical in the matter and in the treatment. The three books, while published under different titles, have some things to say about the orchestra. One writer in his preface states that his book treats the subject from a different point of view. Possibly this author was able to find in his own writings what no reader has been able to discover for himself or herself. In all essentials this particular publication contains nothing that is not in the other books, and neither of the other books, for that matter, are remarkable for vigor or originality.

MUSICAL LITERATURE IN THE UNITED STATES.

If some of the native authors had a musical kindergarten in mind when they compiled their productions, then they have performed a service to the community. But no brain trained in music or literature can find in most of the musical literature by the home writers anything that suggests inspiration, deep thought, and alack and alas! not even sound musicianship. It is very evident that many of the books of this character were written to make prestige for the writer, and for no higher purpose—a low ideal indeed! It is also quite evident that those empowered with the important duty of selecting books for the public libraries have very little or no knowledge on the subject of musical literature. It is to be hoped that the individuals employed in supplying books for the sixty-five new libraries in the Carnegie chain will appoint people of authority to choose the musical literature, for it would seem a thousand pities to expend the munificent sum of five million five hundred thousand dollars and not give the people the reference and reading books they require in their efforts to secure culture. The sections in the majority of established ibraries in Greater New York devoted to music nd the fine arts are filled with the commonplace nd ephemeral rubbish that abounds in this fair and of ours as in no other country on the globe. The libraries maintained by subscriptions are often o better supplied with musical literature than the ree libraries. In music, especially in musical literature, we are a very new country, but the time seems o be at hand for a revolution in the matter, which or some hidden reason has been intrusted to a andful of commonplace authors and those friendly o them. Suppose an obscure but talented man rites a book that would prove of real value to a tudent, how is he going to make the facts known? y chance good books have been picked up in out f the way places, and books by Americans, too, at were damned with faint praise or dismissed ith a perfunctory paragraph in the book notes of a aily newspaper. The critic assigned the task of viewing the book may himself be the author of olumes of musical literature, and therefore may ave not been wholly disinterested.

The mass of intelligent readers in this country e weary of the trite essays describing the differnce in the construction of the oboe and the violin nd the tenor and the basso voice. Then the tireome classifications of piano scores, who wants to ad them?

Far more entertaining than all these cyclopædical forts and ponderous reproductions are the pretty ifles by certain American women who have had e temerity to write and add volumes to the coltion of musical literature. In these nicely bound iblications the authors relate interesting and exing anecdotes in the lives of the famous comsers with vivid enthusiasm. Writers of this sennental school depict the love affairs of the great the past, and make all that they tell so wonderlly human and ingenuous. These biographical etches are written with pens dipped in sympathy, d in the reading it is at least possible to keep ake. On the other hand, a drowsy feeling overtes us after an hour with one of the dreary ssifications. A book, any book and every book, ust do one thing or the other; it must instruct amuse the reader. When it fails to do either, it is t worth the paper upon which it was written. t the modest author may conclude that it will ke no difference a hundred years hence. While t is quite true, still the present generation needs be guided, and fortunately the people are wak up, and before many years will not be fooled accepting a treatise on music unless it be the rk of a master. To write a book on music res a duality of gifts—first the writer must be accomplished musician—not a mere theoretician nd second he must be endowed with the literary ulty. It is this blending of gifts that produced sterpieces of musical literature like Schumann's sammelte Schriften Uber Musik und Musiker," gner's "Das Judenthum in der Musik" and neker's "Chopin." The last is probably the best ical biography written by an American. Who s not delight in this author's inspired portrayal he Polish genius and his works? This is a book a soul, and in less than fifty years it will be a sic in musical literature.

HE Opera Company of the Metropolitan has been out for some time, and it is announced it will give a performance in Texas in a tent. as given performances in large hippodromes, instead of in some of the opera houses, which were not large enough, and as it carries a portable stage and scenery with it, it can patch up the thing as it goes along. We rstand that the five performances in Buffalo ght $10,400, and that the Klaw & Erlanger syne has not continued its arrangements to have company play in its theatres, because the company has refused to make certain concessions. All of these matters are of no particular public interest, but the papers seem to be filled up with them, because there is nothing else to write about, as music, science, art and literature do not amount to anything. It is only the opera and politics, and murders, embezzlements, fires, races, riots, lynchings, failures and strikes; but after a while things will change—when we are all dead.

E OPERA TOUR.

We notice, among other things, that Madame Calvé would not sing in Nashville because she was sick or well—one of those two things; or because somebody said she couldn't sing any more, or because she thought she couldn't sing any more, or because of one of those many, many reasons why opera singers that are reported to get $1,200 a night won't take the money—foreign ones particularly.

We also notice from Memphis a report that Miss Sibyl Sanderson lost her voice entirely in the performance of "Manru," which took place at New Orleans. Why the dispatch came from Memphis no one understands, except upon the conclusion that it might have been a typographical error. Maybe it never took place anyhow. Maybe it is only another kind of an advertisement, but we do not see how Miss Sanderson could have lost her voice entirely, when it was reported years ago that she had no voice any more. Excessive nervousness caused by an attachment—an attachment upon one of her trunks at a hotel—is the cause attributed to the loss of her voice. We cannot make it out. Probably she could not.

THE VIENNA "MEISTERSCHULE."

THE discussions caused by the creation of a "Meisterschule" at the Vienna Conservatory, under the management of Emil Sauer, has induced the director of the conservatory to issue a document in which he expresses his views on the subject. There is nothing particularly new in his statement. The conservatory, it is well known, has turned out many distinguished pupils, who have appeared as soloists, as capellmeisters and teachers, but there are others, pupils of ambition, with lofty aims, who are desirous, after graduating from the conservatory, to receive a more perfect training, that can only be acquired by strong individual guidance.

These pupils, therefore, on their graduation place themselves under some celebrated virtuoso, who is in a position to communicate the secret of the art in a course of instruction not limited by time or circumstances. The professors of the conservatory naturally felt dissatisfied at this practice, and undoubtedly it is not pleasant for an accomplished and esteemed teacher, who has laboriously during the brief school hours of the conservatory brought out young talent, to see them seek advice and training elsewhere, in order to develop their own individuality. Yet this is inevitable with any conservatory school system, and the new "Meisterschule" will form a course quite separate from the older professional schools. It will be open only to graduates of the conservatory who wish to adopt the profession of soloist, and to others equally well qualified for admission.

While in the conservatory the time of teaching is divided among the several pupils, and each has in succession to do his task; in the new special school it is the teacher who will be active and attract the attention of the pupils by his example. The conductor of the Meisterschule, for example, will recommend his pupils to study beforehand the first movement of some piano concerto or other piece of music. Then after a certain lapse of time, he will ask some of his pupils to play it over, and then—after general remarks—will go to the piano. He will speak of the character and form of the piece; then will follow the dissection of the chief motive and its working out. He may then think it advisable to play the piece for the first time. Then he will bring out technical details, determine the fingering, indicate the rhythmical difficulties, and place in the clearest light the moments of the greatest climaxes. In such a lesson one of the pupils may take his place at the piano, the teacher then will watch the playing, always in the presence of the other pupils, point out mistakes, recommend such a figure or such a passage to be more often repeated. The other pupils will be gradually attracted, and become familiar with the mechanical details.

The pupil, by his performance of separate periods, passages or cantilene, and then by performing the whole piece, demonstrates how far he has penetrated into the work, and what effect he produces. An attentive pupil will thus be in a position to master the work according to the teacher's ideas, or display his own individuality. Thus the most instructive works of the classical and modern piano repertory will be analyzed and studied, and the pupil gradually have a good foundation for his future concert repertory. The time when he can appear in public is the affair of the teacher alone.

To most people all this manifesto of the director of the conservatory contains nothing new, and it is strange to find it necessary to issue it in a city once the musical centre of Germany.

NOT ENGLISH OPERA.

"NEW YORK, September 30, 1901.

"Editors The Musical Courier:

"Considering the noble fight you have made for years in the columns of THE COURIER for an American opera, managed by Americans, staged by Americans, played and sung by Americans, in English, it is a surprise to me when an effort is made in this very direction that you have so little to say.

"If the Castle Square Opera Company is not all we could wish for; if it cannot, as now organized, compete with the Grau combination, still it is and has been for years an effort in the right direction. If more space was given to it in your columns it would very soon receive the consideration it really deserves.

"Many of your readers, as well as myself, will read with pleasure and profit a full, analytical criticism of the several operas as given and sung, besides stirring to greater efforts the young American artists who are striving to gain recognition.

"Surely there must be on the staff of THE MUSICAL COURIER many gentlemen eminently fitted to do this work.

"Yours very truly,

"YVONNE DE LAET."

IF the writer of the above letter will read the criticisms of the daily papers she will find that the Castle Square performances are of such a nature as to produce only ridicule. In former years, before the Castle Square Opera Company passed beyond its possible limits into a sphere to which it did not belong, we did everything possible to assist it and aid it in the cause of American singers; but the company adheres to the old traditional methods, and there has not been the slightest progress made. When the chorus singers get ten to eleven dollars a week and singers are paid at the rate of thirty-five or forty dollars a week until their voices are completely shorn of every possibility of tone there is not much to criticise, and when the orchestras are so small that they cannot play the scores as they were originally written by the composers criticism ceases. What is the use of doing anything to encourage such methods? We might as well give it up. The proper plan for THE MUSICAL COURIER hereafter is to boom the foreign artists as much as possible, until the country becomes thoroughly nauseated with them and then that will end it. It seems that our opposition is not appreciated anyway, because instead of having good English opera under proper auspices the whole thing is mutilated. Then it is called English opera, and we are told that we have no singers here and no temperament and no artistic instinct, and that THE MUSICAL COURIER position is untenable. The Castle Square opera scheme was spoiled when it allied itself with the Grau scheme, and so it was predicted in these columns at the time.

EUROPEAN FANCIES.

SOME seven years ago, after a four months' trip to Europe, I stated that unless the industrial and economical systems on the other side of the Atlantic were rapidly changed the old countries would become industrial colonies of the United States, and I said this because I observed that the machinery (where there was machinery) was clumsy and slow; that the men handling it were merely accommodating themselves to it and not urging the work forward; that men at work on public improvements were doing as little manual labor as possible; that counting room methods were antediluvian and calculated to retard rather than forward and advance business, and that banking was interlaced with red tape which interfered with commerce. Since then I have been in Europe many times, and I now see confirmed what originally impressed me—confirmed in the general opinion of awakened Europe that the United States is a dangerous competitor and a factor necessary for serious contemplation, and confirmed in what I observe as the helpless condition of old nations fortified by and cemented in old traditions from which they fear to make sorties.

When one carefully observes small details, not forgetting generalities in the contemplation of particulars, the causes at the bottom of the phenomena are readily discerned, and I believe it might interest our readers to learn how everyday occurrences differ from our routine of life. I shall not follow any plan, but tell the story as I go along.

The public conveyances in the cities of Europe are limited, and there are no more persons admitted in street cars and omnibuses than there are seats, except on the platform, where the prices are one-half a cent or a cent less for a limited standing room. The number of standees is indicated just as the seat numbers are indicated. Tickets are issued in many places. Prices range from one to four cents (and I always quote American money). The pace is slow, even where there are electric cars; the cars are heavy for their size and look like modern juggernauts. Women stand almost invariably because the men manage to get in ahead of them. When a man rises to give a seat to a woman put your money on him and gamble that he is an American. I have seen officers push women—a fashionably dressed lady in Cologne—aside to get a seat by getting in ahead.

The municipality controls the traffic; it regulates the street car and 'bus and carriage systems, and it does so wonderfully well. The whole European municipal system—as a whole and certainly individually as applied to the great cities—puts our city governments to the blush. Police corruption has been discovered in a few isolated cases and quickly ended in degradation and punishment, but the high plane upon which cities are governed, the economy of the systems, the solidity of all public constructions, the care and guardianship exercised, the purity of the administration, the incorruptibility of the bureaucracy, the quick and effective punishment of offenders and criminals, the power of the law and the respect for it make an American feel as if we have a huge task before us in converting our civic life from its present political involvement into the European economic governments that have brought about such perfect municipal paragons as Paris, London, Berlin, Leipsic, Frankfort, Manchester, Cologne, Brussels, Amsterdam, Hamburg, Dresden, Stuttgart and hundreds of smaller cities. We are in a bad way with our city governments, the very foundations of our national life, and it seems a hopeless task to bring them into line with the highly civilized communities of Western Europe.

No Hurry.

The people are not in a hurry; they do not rush, and they have a congenital aversion to a precipitate act that, in the long run, is apt to bring about paralysis. They have no 10 minute lunches standing at lunch counters eating hard boiled eggs or sandwiches, drinking milk in mid-day or cocktails early, at noon and at night or standing for miles in street cars in the morning only to do so again in the afternoon or the return trip home. They do not care to break their necks or their livers in catching ferries and suburban trains on fast rushes in great masses, crushing one another to see who can become the most uncomfortable. They do not work with feverish anxiety, watching the tickers for accounts of all kinds of events from finances to field sports and all that is possible between the two. They read their newspapers at leisure, and they do not care how fast we consider ourselves so long as we do not interfere with them.

And right here let me say that when we Americans go to Europe we go on the strength of our own invitation, for Europe does not invite us. As we voluntarily visit those countries we are not acting like well bred people when we criticise them while we enjoy ourselves in them. This is plain language. It is true that the fee system is a shame; that any system that makes those who work depend upon others for the estimate of that work is vicious, and that sooner or later Europe must pay its workers and servants and emancipate itself from this beggary. But it must also be said that the present exorbitant fees paid out to porters, carriers, servants, messengers, drivers, &c., are due to the irrepressible American traveler who has so lavishly dispensed the fees that, within my own recollection, they have been driven to three times the former rates. We Americans have no right whatever to complain of the senseless fee and overcharging "outrages," as we call them, for we are responsible for them through our annual invasion of Europe, our reckless expenditures, our indifference to sacred traditions, which we have defied particularly in the fee system, driving it into dimensions that are appalling the Europeans themselves.

Should, through any causes, the American pilgrimage to Europe cease, one-half of all the hotels of Western Europe would be compelled to close, as many now close in the cold season; hundreds of thousands of people would be thrown out of employment and great distress would ensue. Naturally this would, by reflex action, injure us, for those people are our direct and indirect customers, and it is to our own interest to see them continue in prosperity, although at present there is a serious commercial depression all over Europe—excepting possibly France, and in France the taxable basis is rapidly reaching the point of exhaustion.

Depression.

The depression in the German iron industry is causing profound anxiety, this industry being the leading one, as the case is with us. The wine crops in both Germany and France are not up to standard this year, Charles Heidsick's annual report to the London Times giving as the reason the continued damp and rainy weather. The recent Leipsic, Cassel, Stuttgart and other failures, involving 70 million American dollars, have cast gloom and apprehension among German financiers. The war in Africa has been a great, although silent, strain on the English nation. The great cost of the China expeditions, for which there can be no substantial return in years, is now felt. Add to this the standing army expense of Europe and the feverish competition in the construction of naval outfits, and it can readily be seen how we here, even without aggressive competition, are bound to win an enormous industrial victory over our friends across the seas.

Burdened as Europe is with these expenditures, it is trebly burdened with its slow and deliberate methods, during which younger nations gain the advantage by acting, while the older are considering. Before a European business man will take what we would call a business trip—say of two or three weeks—he will debate it for a month with his associates, and always with his family. I do not mean the exceptions now—I mean the general rule. A Europe is constantly amazed at the indifference we exhibit in crossing the ocean. Frenchmen rarely leave home; Parisians seldom. A Parisian editor once said to me: "I recently visited London; I am sorry I lost my time there. Why should I ever again leave Paris? The whole world comes to Paris. It must be the only place. Therefore I shall not leave it again to visit any foreign city." That is the proper conception of it. French railway trains are filled with English, German, Russian and American travelers. Considering that French railways run in France, French people are supposed to patronize them, but Frenchmen are not colonizers, and just as they are not colonizers so they are not travelers even in France.

The pneumatic tube postal system in the large cities is a great improvement on our local postal means, for the purchase of a postal card or a sheet insures its delivery at the local postal station of the district to which it is destined within about a half hour, and the message is in the hands of the receiver about an hour after posting. The difficulties of underground pneumatic service in New York could be removed now by utilizing space in the Rapid Transit Tunnel; of course I suppose this has been considered, and the benefit of such a scheme can well be imagined when we remember that with it in operation a letter could be sent from Trinity Church to the Bronx and delivered in that section within an hour after mailing. The Postal Systems of Europe are advanced, but the amount of mail handled per capita is very much less than with us, and for every 10 letters distributed during a trip by a London or Paris or Berlin letter carrier our letter carriers deliver 50 to 100. The huge packages of letters seen in the hands of our letter carriers are unknown, and the European letter carrier carries a small pouch held by a strap running around the neck, and in this satchel his letters are packed away and quietly delivered without rush or exhaustion. The same is the case with the postal collectors, who carry no such pouches of mail as ours do.

Economy.

Telegrams are sent in the majority of cases without the christened name to save charges, for they charge for every word. Thus they read: "Jones, Edgeware Road, 20," or "Smith, clothier, Worcester," whereas we would say: "J. Smith, 110 Front Street, Worcester." The telegrams are written on receival on a thin tissue paper, which is faced on one side with gum. It is pasted by closing it after writing it and then mutilated in opening. In England a brown envelope of the cheapest paper is used, the address being written in lead pencil, but the impression is so dull that it requires an effort to make it visible to the eye. In fact, cheapness is apparent in everything in the Government service, and the confusion of telegraph blanks to which we are habituated in our offices, hotels and telegraph offices is utterly unknown. Frequently there is delay because people must inquire for blanks. Blotting paper is found only in large sheets, and is not used freely as we use it here. It is in portfolios and is carefully guarded, and only when it is utterly useless a new sheet is supplied. In Southern countries sand is used in the Government and mercantile offices to "blotting" the ink. Every possible economy is exercised, and this spirit runs down into the most intimate forms of existence, such as the feeding of birds or dogs and the use of blacking on shoes or the time for the use and wear of a necktie, which lasts six months or a year, according to supply, or the time allowed for gloves to be renewed.

the years a man must devote to a stovepipe hat, which is frequently inherited by the son and put aside until he reaches manhood. Coal is counted by the piece and must last as per allowance. Twins must dress exactly alike. The bootjack dare not be used in any room except its own, where it has been doing service since the revolution of 1830. Economy and frugality are the universal laws and they are at the basis of the ability of Europe to resist, to some extent, the cancer of the Standing Army.

Trains in Europe always arrive on time; that is, they get into the depots at the time they arrive. I have been on time on short trips about once in every three trips and once in every four long trips. The toilet arrangements are abominable and barbarous and utterly devoid of the delicacy of treatment to which American ladies and gentlemen and even children are accustomed. In fact, the spirit of chivalry toward the gentle sex has departed entirely, and no wonder when one sees the field and outdoor work in Germany, Holland, Belgium, Austria, Switzerland, Italy and partly in France done by women, and when the menial service is performed by them almost entirely, and when in Germany they act as guards at the Railway Crossings. With millions of men in the Army the work must be done by the women, and that destroys, not only chivalry, but the spirit of romantic love, for such women cannot be the mothers of a romantic product. Not only is this self-apparent, but the contagion passes into the higher circles, which are also taught to disregard any function that is separated from the military—and which advances the latter caste so far as a social outpost that no other is in sight. Very naturally the woman ceases to exercise influence; in fact, the feminine influence must be entirely eliminated in those countries where the standing army represents the idea of National protection. Women are married for position and for the dot. That closes the chapter of romantic love, carrying with it all that follows the destruction of that Greek ideal realism, and for that reason we see the multitude of deformed, uncouth, crippled and hideous creatures all over Europe.

Anarchy.

These conditions naturally breed discontent and its most brutal modern manifestation, namely, modern Anarchism; for it is false to attribute Anarchism to Socialism, the two institutions being hostile and politically antagonistic. Socialism is a politico-economic creed, the outgrowth of various scientific methods projected by philosophers and specialists for the purpose of ameliorating social conditions and bringing about modus operandi for a better equalization of European caste distinctions. Anarchism, in its modern sense, is a protest against all Government, and therefore against Socialism, which is a form of Government, and the particular article of anarchistic creed is force, followed by destruction. It opposes force, as represented by Militarism, by force, which ends its argument, and this paradox is accepted by Anarchism stolidly, for it ignores argument, just as War does. Modern Anarchism is born of Militarism, which is bringing about the mental and physical deformity of the race through the degradation of the woman. The higher the female type the finer the male type—the reverse following. Out of this grows the discontent generated by defective conditions of heredity and fortified by defective and depressing environment. Modern Anarchy is thus produced and appears as the vital antagonism of its progenitor and the representatives of the same.

The assassination of McKinley, although it produced a tremendous upheaval in European sentiment which I was amazed at, but which, after reflection, I could readily understand, will not bring about any practical plan that can affect the future of Modern Anarchism. Universal law cannot be enacted against it, and law will not alter the fact. As the medical man said: "You cannot cure tuberculosis with a poultice." Anarchism is a social condition which laws cannot reach. The people themselves can reach it, but the people must first be born and educated and reared under a different environment before they can deal with it. As they are now born and bred they produce it; they therefore cannot be expected to destroy it. In fact, it is their own product and is cultivated by them constantly. It will never cease until the political conditions of Europe bring about the abandonment of the Standing Army.

Ideal Anarchism signifies the abandonment of Government through the ideal state. It is Platonic. Modern Anarchism is a direct outgrowth of prior social phenomena and is illustrated by the Aristotelian theory—ergo, modern science as applied to the Social State. The ideal Anarchist with his ideal state requires no further police control and that ends administrative force known as Government. The modern Anarchist uses the bullet and dynamite which have been placed at his disposal by the modern state of Force; it is simply the answer to the question. The modern State made the weapons for the use of the Anarchist after first producing out of itself the Anarchist. Force, national prejudices, race prejudices, universal greed, resulting in colonial robberies; Chinese bigoted Gordonism subsequently introduced into Africa, a huge continent quietly disposed of among themselves and partitioned by European nations among themselves with total disregard of the inhabitants; Railways built through deserts where the lines could not be fed by local freights or traffic, but for the purpose of securing military advantages at distant points, and therefore bankrupting in the end; fleets built at enormous cost to support land force with sea force and to uphold colonial conquest and with such effort that after a few years only the new vessels make the old types useless. National debts piled like Ossa on Pelion until the figures reach into the mists of finance, and all backed by Standing Armies, which march into the heart of an old civilization like China to impress upon it the modern causes of Anarchism.

Europe has done its best to breed the modern Anarchist, and it has educated him in the use of the weapons to attain his end. To help him along, Ibsen, Suderman, Hauptman, Tolstoi and D'Annunzio supply him with a pessimistic literature that gives him from his viewpoint every argument to defy the Gods and Man, too, and then we expect that the principle can be destroyed because one more victim has been sent to his doom. No; it cannot be done that way. Nor can it be done by driving native monks and nuns out of France.

American Travelers.

Those American travelers who do not visit Europe for business or professional reasons spend their time in a routine manner laid out, unconsciously to them, by the force of the traveling tide and arranged in accordance with plans to cover the largest field in the most rapid manner. They live in hotels and pensions where Americans are catered to, on railway trains, in museums and galleries and among the historic monuments. All the information and knowledge they can possibly gain can only be superficial and, even worse than that, artificial, and very frequently it is misleading because it is prepared for the superficiality of the itinerant and expeditious traveler. Besides this, the tours are done so rapidly that the visitor, unless he or she is a student who has made preparatory investigations, becomes confused and many an American has returned home with inverted ideas on portentous historic, artistic and other achievements and facts. This does not mean that Americans should not travel, but it does mean that our annual American hegira to Europe has become a cut and dried proposition from which romance, idealism and art have become eradicated and of which little but travel alone remains, and to travel merely for the sake of traveling is stupid unless it be for the sake of health, and then the many inconveniences of European travel must certainly militate against hygienic improvement.

The European caravansaries are all on the alert for the American; the railway depots swarm with them. London, Paris, Berlin, Switzerland, Bayreuth and Oberammergau in season are overflowing with them and everywhere we find crude preparations calculated to make them appear at home. When we leave for foreign parts we do so first to see foreign lands as they are; second, to get away from home and home manners, and third, to get time to digest what we see and hear in order that when we get back home we will know why we left it. When the American traveler gets to Europe English greets him everywhere; he hears no foreign tongue; the hostelries are Americanized as far as possible; the guides understand how to treat and explain to Americans as Americans are accustomed to these things in America. America is flatteringly brought to the foreground, and the whole foreign flavor is as much as possible eliminated from the environment of the American. There must be 150,000 to 200,000 Americans in Europe every year, including those who stop over. Allow them $10 apiece a day for their total expenses, including passage money, &c.—a very low average—and that means $2,000,000 or ten million francs paid to Europe daily by Americans. This does not include purchases, and Americans are ravenous buyers in Europe, certain firms and dressmakers, milliners and other establishments existing purely on American trade.

I am used to figuring. My occupation has compelled me to study financing, and I find figures generally bringing the truth forward before one's countenance with certainty. When I base my calculation of 200,000 Americans in Europe every year I mean that that body of people from America is in Europe every year, but not every day of every year. Nor do I include the return to Europe of steerage passengers, constituting an enormous multitude, as witness merely the half dozen Italian steamship lines with their cargoes of returning sons of the Sunny South. Dresden has a foreign English speaking community of 30,000 souls. Berlin, Munich, Florence, Rome, Paris, England, Switzerland hold thousands of permanent Americans who reside abroad for years. I conclude, then, judging from the annual transatlantic tourists' figures, that 200,000 Americans reside in Europe 100 days, including the permanent residents. At ten million francs a day this represents an annual tribute to Europe of $200,000,000, or one thousand million francs, and it is this money that enables Europe to remain a healthy customer of ours. It constitutes the kind of reciprocity to which the late President McKinley alluded in his speech at Buffalo the day before he was shot.

The traveling system to Europe will not only continue but it will increase perceptibly on the basis of the constantly enlarging community of interests that has gradually become manifest. But the rapid advance of culture in America due to the accumulation of wealth and the parallel possibility of art culture will change the methods and emancipate us from the tour of the beaten path. The culture of languages, now progressing so rapidly with us, will aid in making the American independent of the guide, and then the true value of travel will be felt and the best results obtained.

Art and Music.

We have no independent judgment of art, and for the best reasons; we are too young. There has been no time for American art, although Europe has in its fold prominent among its own artists some Americans who are in the very front rank. Their names are familiar. Our own judgment of art can only become free from European influence after we have elaborated what art means with us, and until we develop an art of our own we must depend upon Europe, which is not only filled with examples of ancient and modern art, but which is continuing to offer stupendous examples of what the human mind is capable of at the end of the past and on the threshold of the moving century. Mr. Huneker's letters from Munich tell us what that one community is doing, and other cities are pushing forward original productions of intense vitality. The Emperor is making Berlin artistic; the modern Milan school of sculpture is evoking constant attention, and Russia as well as Scandinavia is in a fever heat of artistic workmanship, both sections being lavishly prolific. We have no such phenomena yet, because we are still in spirit colonial, and so long as the trend of travel is in one direction we will continue colonial, and until we have something more to offer to allure Europeans to our country than natural scenery and commercialism we will remain colonial, and there is nothing to offer to remove colonialism except art, and we have, as yet, no American art. Can we ever attain an American art if we continue to cultivate foreign models? I am sure I cannot say, and I can find no one to offer a solution. Some of the ancient artists traveled, so far as we know, but did Myron, Phidias, Praxiteles, Parrhesius get their inspiration in Assyria or Egypt? Or at home or from Homer?

And so with music. We are in composition European from wig to sole. Mr. MacDowell will forgive me, for it is nothing ungracious, and it is candid, which is the soul of criticism, and it is complimentary, but Mr. MacDowell is German as a composer. His is German music. So is Chadwick's. Chadwick has a dash of Scotch rhyme and rhythm and here and there a suffusion of the light American fantastic spirit, sometimes commonplace, just as Mr. Hale tells us of his "Judith," but Chadwick (Leipsic school, I believe) is in composition German. Mr. Foote is not original, and he does not claim it, modest and forbearing as he always is. Gifted composers everywhere write songs and pleasing orchestral phrases just as academically as Mr. Foote, and some are Americans and some not. Mr. Parker is to return to Munich to cultivate music on broader lines, but Mr. Parker is German and Händelian, the latter rather forced, and wanting in spontaneity because he is German, and has not yet secured a grip on the English Händel. His mass choruses want sonority, masculine force, that herculean power that Händel got out of voice massing and that we hear in Brahms.

And, talking about Brahms, the latter's music is a fixture in Europe to-day. While enthusiasm and appetite exist for Tschaikowsky, for Brahms there is a deep seated, profound reverence, and he stands without the question mark. One can feel the universal silent consent of veneration for genius in the Brahms cult. Rubinstein has vanished like the river in the desert, and programs by the thousand are performed without his name. Ten years ago his songs were still abundant. The chamber music, the two Trios, ops. 18 and 36, and the "Ocean Symphony" were yet incorpore; now all is silent except the D minor Concerto, and that is also on the wane. In fact, the virtuoso-composer is becoming an epithet read only on the title of dead works. For that reason European musical folk shake their heads when Liszt is mentioned, although he towered far above the virtuoso as we know him in composition. But the Liszt piano passage work has lost its force, the chromatic configurations and the tickling trills sounding somewhat vulgar already. It seems as if he was simply played to death. The orchestral compositions of Liszt are not as freely used, comparatively speaking, as we use them here. The new composer is forcing them aside.

Our Solution.

If we wish Europe to come here to listen to music we must acquire, secure, give birth to or hire an American musical art. This we shall never do on this Earth as long as we continue to import European opera and opera singers who will never cultivate our American songs and under whose control no American opera can ever be produced. There is no reason why we should have American composers when it is a foregone conclusion that no American opera can secure a hearing. With the perennial visitation of the European opera virtually under European auspices American music will always remain as it is, and we know what that means.

All this is naturally our own American fault. We erect a high protective wall to keep competition out, and we make millions and we make millionaires galore, and we get so rich that our millionaires, in order to avoid a national calamity, must give millions away to keep money circulating. And yet with this fact staring us directly under our eyes, apparent to the whole earth in the result of an industrial condition that now virtually also forces the nation to adopt reciprocity to maintain our own customers so that they can live and remain customers—I say with all this before us we have admitted foreign musical schemes free from all tax to stifle the American spirit, which has grown and prospered through the very opposite policy; we have not protected music, which needed protection more than any other pursuit, and now, after years of free trade in it, Europe controls us in music, and, outside of Sousa, not an American note is heard on the other side—and Sousa was protected because he protected himself.

One of these days the whole musical profession will arise in a body to indorse my position. I do not believe in Chauvinism, but when the whole world opposes our policy with its protected Chauvinism we are bound to end as we are to-day ending in music—without an original American musical art, without an American recognition abroad and without recognition of American talent at home because it is forced aside by Europe. Every visit to Europe confirms me in these principles, and I reaffirm them with a stronger conviction of their salutary justice now than ever before.

If men like MacDowell, Chadwick, Parker, Gleason, Huss, Klein, Van der Stucken, Busch, Brockway, and the many others, could look for support at home; if we would cease to treat them as academicians by giving to them as much play as even unknown foreigners receive; if we were to put a firm protest upon the system that paralyzed English composition, which has resulted in a submerging of the national spirit by a foreign wave so that Purcell—great a man as he was—is comparatively unknown; if we wish to avert such disasters we must first of all stop the periodical invasion of an organized band of foreign singers, not one of whom will ever cultivate or sing one American song. This is the one great cancer in our musical life—the foreign opera scheme under foreign, unsympathetic control, and until we abolish it we will go along lackadaisically and finally end in music as England has—England, which has not produced in over a century one great composer, and never a first-class conductor, pianist, violinist or vocalist. That is as sure as the G minor fugue of John Sebastian Bach.

At Sea, October 17, 1901. Blumenberg.

THE Metropolitan Opera Company, of this city, will begin its annual sessions in this city on the 23d of December—Christmas week. All of those foreign opera singers and the American girls who have lost their voices in Europe will participate as usual, and the daily papers will be filled with all the reports on this subject, to the gratification of the numerous readers, &c.

MR. DUNKL, of Pesth, Hungary, the former manager of the violinist Kubelik, has withdrawn all suits in consideration of receiving the benefit of an interest in eight farewell concerts that Kubelik has been giving in Prague and Budapest. Matters will go along pleasantly now, everything having been satisfactorily adjusted.

LONDON NOTES.

Hotel Cecil, October 18, 1901.

Signs of reviving musical life are once again making themselves manifest in London, and patrons of concerts are evidently finding their way back to town from seaside and country houses. On Saturday Mr. Vert gives his annual concert, and the program contains all the usual array of stars. On Monday the first of the Richter concerts takes place at St. James' Hall, and though the program contains no startling novelty, it is certainly unimpeachably orthodox, including as it does Dvorák's "New World" Symphony and Beethoven's "Leonora No. 3" Overture. The most interesting number is a portion of Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony.

The most interesting concert that has been given so far has been Mark Hambourg's first piano recital, which took place at the Queen's Hall on October 5.

Mr. Hambourg's career up to the present may be divided into three stages. He first appeared some years ago as a prodigy and then he created a considerable sensation. In a year or two he grew out of the prodigy stage and appeared as a youth with a technic that proved a great advance upon that which he had displayed in earlier days, and also with no small amount of promise. He now appears as a full blown pianist, and the promise which he showed before has been fulfilled, contrary to the usual custom of prodigies.

One of the most striking features of Mr. Hambourg's playing is his marvelous technic, which he has developed to an extent almost unknown among pianists. Pabst's concert paraphrase of Tschaikowsky's "Eugen Onegin" is not a great piece of music, but its difficulties are abnormal. Mr. Hambourg, however, seemed to consider it a mere bagatelle, and its difficulties faded away into nothing.

The second movement of Chopin's B flat minor Sonata brought out some of the best characteristics of his playing and in it he displayed a beautiful touch.

One of the most successful performances that he has given took place at his first appearance at Mr. Newman's Promenade Concerts. He is pre-eminently successful in Rubinstein's compositions, and he played that composer's D minor Concerto with a fire that positively brought the house down.

On October 12 Mme. Clara Butt (Mrs. Kennerley Rumford) and Kennerley Rumford gave their first concert in London since their marriage. Madame Butt has improved considerably of late, both in her choice of songs and in her interpretations of them.

It is true that in classical music she is not yet quite perfect, and her singing of Schubert's "Aufenthalt" and "An der Warser zu Singen" was not all that could be desired. She was far better in Franz's "Im Herbst," and she was at her best in Chaminade's "Chanson Slav," which she sang with rare beauty of tone.

Mr. Rumford produced a new and interesting song cycle by G. H. Chitsau called "Songs From the Turkish Hills." They are well written and interesting, but rather dismal, and the local color, though quaint, is a little overdone.

The programs of the Queen's Hall Promenade Concerts have lately been full of interest. Among the novelties may be noted a very attractive suite by Herr Otto Floersheim, which found great favor. It is called "Liebesnovelle" and sets out with the object of telling a love story, which it does in six very pleasing movements.

Less interesting was Herr Josef Bloch's "Suite Poetique." Most of the music contained in this suite has been heard before in the works of other and more skilful composers.

Herr Volbach's symphonic poem, "Es waren zwei Königskinder," is, however, a very interesting work. It has plenty of melody, it is dramatic, clinaxes are well handled and the scoring shows the hand of a very skilful writer. It is well worth the notice of orchestral conductors.

Mr. Wood has also been delving with great success among less known works of great composers. One recent program included a Bach Suite, a Händel Concerto and a Mozart Sonata for organ and orchestra, while a Beethoven program contained twenty-four dances by the composer and two pieces for woodwind, the march in E flat and the Rondino in E flat.

On Tuesday a concert was given by Herbert Brown at Bechstein Hall. Mr. Brown has a baritone voice of pleasant quality, but he makes too free a use of vibrato. At present his singing lacks variety, a fault, however, which may be mended by careful attention.

On the same day a recital was given at Steinway Hall by Miss Edith Henderson, a soprano; Miss Winifred Jones, a pianist and composer, and Miss Mary Warlow, a reciter.

The Crystal Palace concerts, so long conducted by Dr. Manns, are now in the hands of Mr. Wood and his orchestra. The programs have nothing to distinguish them from those which the same orchestra gives with such success at Queen's Hall.

THE BERTHOLDT,
128 MARYLAND AVENUE S. W.,
WASHINGTON, October 25, 1901.

I NOTICE that you never make an effort to advertise your business," said a representative of a usical paper, as he grasped the hand of a well-known usic teacher in town, upon entering his cozy studio. have looked through musical papers, newspapers, thea- and concert programs, but never have I seen your me in an advertisement. I believe also that it is not ur custom to issue circulars or any other advertising terial."

That is quite true," replied the music teacher in a norous, well-satisfied tone. "In fact" (drawing himself to an imposing height), "you see, I do not need to vertise. I have more pupils now than I can handle, d it would be a waste of time and money for me to vertise for new pupils when I already have a large mber on the waiting list, who are anxious to start now, t cannot, as I have no hours which are unengaged."

How many pupils can you accommodate, may I ask?"

Certainly. I teach from 9 to 12 in the morning and m 1 to 5 in the afternoon. That makes seven hours a y. Now, as my lessons are each an hour long, you I see that I can teach seven pupils a day, and as there six teaching days per week you will find it no diffi- t matter to count the number of my pupils. I teach months in the year and have all I can do. During summer I have numerous requests for vacation les- is from pupils, which, however, I am obliged to re- e."

Were you always so successful here, may I ask?"

No, I cannot say that I was, but I have been here for een years now, and I think I am not boasting when I that I have a large following and a big reputation."

Now, Mr. Musician, if you will not take offense, I am ng to try to show you that your idea about the useless- s of advertising is all wrong. You say that your busi- s is so fine that it cannot be improved. You say, in ct, that you are already such an important person . everyone or nearly everyone knows you, and that are so successful that you can afford to do away with advertising schemes whatsoever.

In the first place your position must be wrong, as it is ays the most successful and prosperous business ses which spend the greatest amount of money in ad- ising. Surely these large mercantile concerns would waste their money by putting it into something which not pay."

Yes," assented Mr. Musician, "you are right about ; but then, you know, music is different from the dry ds business."

"That is just where you are wrong. You musicians consider yourselves on a different plane from the rest of the world and that is why most of you grow so very conceited and narrow minded. I believe that musicians are more jealous of each other than are the heads of the large competitive business firms, and they have much more money at stake than you have in your business. Just tell me this? Is it any more honorable or praiseworthy to teach people to play the piano for a living than it is to—well, say to measure cloth behind the counter, or to lay carpets?"

"I do not think I would care to lay carpets."

"No, of course not. It is well, for you wouldn't be able to do the business very satisfactorily I fear. Now I want to prove to you, Mr. Musician, that the music business is, after all, run on the same principles as any other business, and that the more successful you are the more advertising you should do. Now you have forty-two pupils, you say. How much do you charge each of those pupils, if I may be so bold as to inquire?"

"My price is $3 an hour."

"Then your income is $126 per week. Why do you not raise the price?"

"My dear sir, I do not teach for money. I am satisfied with $3 an hour and do not need any more. I am interested in my pupils and it is my principal aim to turn out as many artists as I can. I am not a money grabber, as you seem to think."

"Excuse me for the suggestion. If, then, you are not anxious for money, I suppose you are anxious for talent. Is it not difficult to find pupils with the talent and ambition to make the best use of your instruction?"

"Ah, you are right there. I'll tell you frankly that if I could find a Paderewski or an Aus der Ohe in embryo I'd teach that pupil for nothing and cheerfully devote years to his training and advancement."

"Ha! Ha! You are certainly very amusing, Mr. Musician. Why has it not occurred to you that the very way to attract a future Paderewski to your studio is to advertise? If you had kept advertising steadily all the fifteen years you have been plodding along here you could now afford to turn away every one of those forty-two mediocre pupils of yours and fill up your studio with talented students. Besides, if you had a good outside reputation pupils would come to you from New York for their 'finishing' lessons instead of leaving you just when they are ready to do you credit, in order to become the pupils of some New York teacher who has advertised extensively, and who therefore has a larger reputation."

The Washington Saengerbund opened its season last Sunday evening with an interesting musical program at the club rooms. Among the attractions of the concert were the performance of the "Semiramide Overture" without a rehearsal by Donch's Orchestra and a difficult flute solo by Henry Jaeger. Fred Seibold, a pupil of Herndon Morsell, who sang a tenor solo, is said to be the possessor of a fine voice. Henry Xander, the musical director of the Saengerbund, has composed two beautiful little piano pieces, which he is about to publish. One is a Romance and the other has not yet been named. It is hoped that Mr. Xander will overcome his modesty and will perform these at the next Saengerbund concert. They should certainly be heard.

H. H. Freeman, organist of St. John's Church, is privileged to allow his organ pupils the free use of the church organ for practice. The organ is run by water and the church is obliged to pay a heavy water tax for the water consumed by the pupils when they practice on the organ. This is a new idea for the temperance cause and I should advise the W. C. T. U. to use their influence in recommending other churches to supply water for a similar purpose.

Miss H. Theodora Wight has been engaged to sing in Baltimore next week and will also be heard in several songs in the third of the Koehle-McReynolds lecture recitals to be given during the coming season.

BERENICE THOMPSON.

Anderson-Baernstein Joint Recitals.

LAST evening the first of these interesting recitals was given at the Lyceum in Englewood, N. J. The house was crowded to overflowing and standing room only was to be had. The enthusiasm was intense, and after each number the applause was spontaneous and genuine. No two vocalists within our present recollection, with the exception of the Henschels, have ever presented a program so well balanced; and from a vocal standpoint the performance was far ahead of anything presented in recent years. The second recital will be held at Memorial Hall, Brooklyn, to-morrow (Thursday) evening, October 31, when the following program will be given:

Duet, Night Hymn at Sea.....Thomas
Sara Anderson and Joseph Baernstein.
Recitative and air, from Hérodiade.....Massenet

CARBONE.—The reputation of Signor Carbone as a prominent voice specialist becomes every day more popular. Many vocal teachers call at his studio, 240 Fifth avenue, for lessons and advice on the placement of the voice. Recently the well-known teacher, Theodor Björksten, before leaving New York for Paris, called at the studio of Signor Carbone with his pupil, Miss Martha Strickland, to sing for him and get Mr. Carbone's advice. Mr. Björksten sent Signor Carbone the following letter:

NEW YORK, October 18, 1901.

MY DEAR CARBONE—Only a line before I sail for Paris to bid you "Au revoir." I had hoped to be able to run in and see you once more, but!—so I have to tell you in writing what I wanted to say to you in person. I have closely studied your way of teaching and found it admirable, and I have for you the most high esteem as an artist and instructor in the most difficult of arts—singing. With best wishes. Yours faithfully, THEODOR BJÖRKSTEN.

BOSTON, October 27, 1901.

An agreeable gentleman named Paul d'Estrées is writing a series of articles which are published in the Ménestrel. The articles are under the general and dignified head "L'Art Musical et ses Interprètes," but there is much more about the queer habits and the irregular lives of the interpreters than about Art. He is filling the gaps in a manner wholly admirable. Take the lives of Rossini, for instance, by Azevedo, Sutherland Edwards, Escudier, Pougin. These biographers give you the facts, the statistics; they are generous in eulogy—but they do not show you Rossini in dressing gown and slippers, in the flesh, without his wig and approved facial expression for the Boulevard.

The ideal biography can be written only by an enemy. He is inclined toward fairness, because he knows that he will be suspected. The very fact that he dislikes the human subject is his excuse for judicial treatment.

Now several gossipers have spoken of the avarice of Rossini's second wife, Olympe Pélissier, but Mr. d'Estrées shows her in a clear light. Her mother, a prudent woman, found a protector for her, one that might guard her from the temptations of the great city apostrophized so often by Gustave Charpentier. This protector was an Englishman, who gave the girl 25,000 francs a year, and when the Englishman lost his money—with his hair—the noble girl gave back to him a fourth of the amount. Then she turned her attention to art and lived with Horace Vernet, who painted several acres of canvas. She was a hot tempered girl, and conversation was often in italics. One night the painter awoke with a start and saw Olympe by the bedside. She was in her night gown, her hair was disheveled, and a dagger was in her hand. Vernet said: "Quit your fooling, Olympe!" (She had been the model for her lover's Judith.) But when she bombarded him with pillows as he walked under his window he determined to draw the line; so one day he said to a Mr Shickler, a rich man of the Place Vendome, "There she is; I make you a present of her." Mr. Shickler was simply delighted, but Olympe would not listen to him. He slipped a roll of 60,000 francs under the clock on one occasion when she had been as inflexible as any Roman Vestal. She saw him, shrieked with rage, went through the catalogue of insults. And he, too, lost his temper and threw the roll into the fire. Olympe succeeded in rescuing 40,000 francs, which she forced upon him.

This accomplished creature was also the friend of Eugène Sue. Was she intimate with Auber? She wrote letters to him. She was intimate with Rossini before he married her. And why did this man of the world take such a woman as his wife, a woman of violent temper and avaricious nature? She knew how to feed his vanity, she looked after his comfort, she was a sumptuous creature—and if she was a cat with claws, she was also a woman. And as Fielding says, in his comments on the old fable, "though some have remarked that cats are subject to ingratitude, yet women and cats, too, will be pleased and purr on certain occasions."

Mr. d'Estrées does not mention some singular stories about Olympe told by Felix Moscheles in his "Fragments of an Autobiography." The son of the pianist pays tribute to her beauty.

"She struck me as every inch a queen—a tragedy queen, off duty. The upper part of her classical figure was more or less concealed beneath a loose white garment, which I have since learned to associate with hair combing. Her lower limbs showed off to great advantage under a heavy striped petticoat. * * * As far as I could judge, she made that illustrious husband of hers an excellent wife."

Moscheles heard from a Signora Baldazi that Rossini grew tired of la Colbrand, his first wife, and said he wanted a change. "She did not mind the change, but she would not leave the house for him or anybody else; so she lived in one apartment, while la Pellisier and Rossini occupied another; but they all took their meals together, and la Colbrand did the housekeeping."

It used to be the fashion to speak of Rossini's Olympian indifference, but he was not Olympian toward Olympe.

But I did not propose to tell here the story of this woman; I began with the intention of mentioning a singular habit of Auber, who would not be separated from his hat. He breakfasted in it, composed in it, dined in it. If he went to the opera—and he went there only under compulsion—he sat in a box where he was not obliged to uncover. Some facetious friends accused him of being a Jew. He had never read "Leaves of Grass," but his motto might have been Walt Whitman's declaration:

"I wear my hat as I please, in doors or out."

Now in Berlin in the early eighties Joachim persuaded himself that he could conduct an orchestra, and there were flatterers who encouraged him and said: "Go on, Master, and show them how things should be done." I think he began with the Ninth Symphony. Perhaps it was his intention to work backward, so that when he came to the First experience would aid him in achieving a tolerable performance. But this is mere idle speculation. I remember distinctly his entrance. He bore ostentatiously aloft a superb specimen of a plug hat, silk, chimney pot, stove pipe, bell topper. He walked in a stately manner as a warden going up the broad aisle. When he reached the conductor's stand he put it carefully down, in such a position that neither violinist nor 'cellist could warm his foot in it, and where he could put one eye on it while the other covered the score—or at least the first violin part. At each recess he bore the hat through the orchestra to the orchestra door, and when time was called he returned with the same solemn carriage. It was whispered about that this was the custom in London.

I have thought that our own conductors would do well to wear a hat symbolical of the piece performed under their direction. A large, flamboyant soft hat would do with works of the romantic period. Gluck, Rameau and Cherubini demand a helmet, for the first two were enamored of classic subjects, and Cherubini was at heart a pagan. To make up with wig, powder and court dress for Haydn and Mozart might be irksome, especially if the orchestra were on the road, so a plug hat of the most conventional pattern might be accepted as a substitute.

There are signs of an eventful season. B. J. Lang and the Cecilia propose, I hear, to perform Bach's great Mass. I have wondered for some time why Mr. Lang did not add this work to his repertory. He has conducted in a manner of things—"Parsifal" and "Hiawatha" and the best English part songs. He has conducted Palestrina and used simultaneously all the conflicting traditions. And now that, like Alexander, he seeks new worlds to conquer, he naturally and gayly picks up Bach's Mass and with his one, two, three, ladies and gentlemen; likewise one, two, three, four, the Cecilia will add another triumph to its list—it will be able to say "We have sung Bach's Mass." And it will undoubtedly be done—in brown. The Cecilia is an excellent chorus, a most admirable chorus; but Bach's Mass needs something more than the enthusiastic devotion of an uncertain time before.

The Cecilia will also give Massenet's "Promised Land," which in pornographic interest falls far below his "Thais." The work is also noticeable in this: It contains no part for Sibyl Sanderson.

The Handel and Haydn proposes to have a building of its own, and two extra concerts will be given November 7 (Verdi's "Requiem"), and November 11 ("Elijah"), for the purpose of forming the beginning of a building fund. The president of the society has issued a trumpet call in which he says many things. It is the ambition of the society to own a building with "a hall suitable for rehearsals, with facilities for a large musical library, a reading room, committee rooms and rooms which our members can use for the study and practice of music."

In other words they wish a species of clubhouse where he elderly members from Everett, Somerville and Saugus an find safe amusement of an evening after a scene of arassing domesticity. A bowling alley, a billiard room, ossibly a card room might be added with profit, and of ourse the building should be thoroughly equipped with anitary plumbing. All these things cost money.

A building is also needed, the president assures us, for he establishment of a class of "beginners in the study of ratorio." Would that he were more precise. Does he ean that these beginners should learn notes, or that they hould begin with "Nearer, My God, to Thee," "Aurelia" nd "Dennis"—I choose at random; there are other tunes ear to some through association—and then work through he Chevalier Neukomm's "David," formerly a war horse n which the society rode proudly, and Mr. Butterfield's Esther, the Beautiful Queen," until they are ready for the asier choruses of "The Messiah?" By the way, did Mr. Butterfield write "Esther, &c.?" Never mind, if he did not rite it. The name goes sonorously with the title of the ork.

And now Boston enters. "With such facilities for mu- cal improvement a membership in our society will be- me extremely desirable to every student of music, will rry with it decided educational advantages, and we shall ver be at a loss for good voices." "Educational advan- ges." There you have it. Art must always be educa- nal. As though art had anything to do with education the ordinary meaning of the word. Educate and edu- te—and will the great crowd ever appreciate or under- and art? A thousand persons, male and female, after eir kind, roaring out an oratorio chorus, are not engaged educational work. Indeed, they do a grievous wrong to usic.

And have the officers of the Händel and Haydn stopped consider how they will gain the money to run the ll after it has risen, "like an exhalation, with the sound dulcet symphonies and voices sweet," from the fens of e Back Bay?

I say these things not from any spirit of wanton mis- ief, but because it would be a pity to see this venerable ciety entangled in financial difficulties through laudable t o'er-vaulting ambition. The society is reported to in sound condition at present, and there is a fund which ves with its income as a guarantee against assessment years of pecuniary loss. No singer likes to be assessed, t even if he thereby serves an educational purpose.

Furthermore the society led by Mr. Mollenhauer de- ves the respect of musicians, for under his drill the gers and players last season gave really musical per- mances. In former years the performances were chief- of the go as you please order. When the singers knew ir notes they bawled; when they were shy they were ed from actual breakdown only by a few of iron will l jaw. To-day the members realize the fact that there phrases as well as notes; that effects may be gained observance of dynamic gradations indicated carefully the fussy composer; the players from the Symphony hestra recognize quickly Mr. Mollenhauer as a con- tor of orchestral routine, experience and temperament, they are docile and zealous. This great and surpris- change is due wholly to the work done in rehearsals Mr. Mollenhauer; and he that works such a change is er than he that taketh a city.

he list of concerts and recitals—for I believe the purist inguishes between these terms—threatens to be one of alling length. There are also lecturers—indeed Mr. Armbruster begins again this week to tell the story of Wagner and his music-dramas. How dull persons are in the comprehension of Wagner's intents and purposes! Lecturers have been banging and boring away for sev- eral years with the assistance of pianists and singers; essay after essay has been published; there are books in three or four languages with all the leit-motive neatly icketed—and yet here in Boston, where Mr. Krehbiel and Walter Damrosch labored faithfully, there is need of a German-Englishman to tell again the sad, sad story—with the assistance of Miss Pauline Cramer. Mr. Armbruster is not easily discouraged. He gave these lectures in a double course at the Lowell Institute last season. The hall was crowded; hundreds were turned away; for the lectures were free. And yet Mr. Armbruster with all his learning, his personal acquaintance with Wagner, his power of persuasion, his skill in simple statement, was un- able to acquaint them thoroughly with the scheme of "The Ring," the esoteric significance of "Lohengrin," the beau- tiful lesson of "Parsifal," and he is now obliged to cross the Atlantic to make a final attempt. Let us hope that he will remain patient; that he will not be tempted to ex- claim "They have ears, but they hear not."

Count Baldesar Castiglione's "Il Cortegiano" (1528) is hardly of bearing on questions of musical behavior and etiquette in 1901—and yet there are passages that might be pondered with profit—as this addressed to the lagging and superfluous veteran of the operatic stage (I quote from Sir Thomas Hoby's brave translation):

"He shall knowe his age, for (to saie the trueth) it were no meete matter, but an yee sight to see a man of eny estimation being olde, horeheaded and toothlesse, full of wrinckles, with a lute in his armes playing upon it and singing in the middes of a company of women, although he coulde doe it reasonablye well. And that, because suche songes conteine in them woordes of love, and in olde men love is a thing to bee jested at; although other- while he seemeth amonge other miracles of his to take delite in spite of yeres to set a fier frosen herts."

And listen to Syr Fridericke's remarks: "And in case olde men wil sing to the lute, let them doe it secretly, and onely to ridde their mindes of those troublesome cares and grevous disquietinges that oure life is full off; and to taste of that excellency which I beleve Pythagoras and Socrates favoured in musike. And set case they exer- cise it not at all: for that thei have gotten a certain habit and custome of it, they shall savour it much better in hearing, than he that hath no knowledge in it."

The Count did not favor female orchestras:

"Imagine with your selfe what an unsightly matter it were to see a woman play upon a tabour or drumm, or blowe in a flute or trompet, or anye like instrumente; and this bicause the boisterousnesse of them doeth both cover and take away that sweete mildenes which setteth so furth everie deede that a woman doeth."

The program of the second Symphony concert given last night in Symphony Hall was as follows:

Overture, Richard III.....Volkmann
Concerto Pathétique.....Liszt
(Arranged and orchestrated from the original for two pianos by Richard Burmeister.)
Mr. Burmeister, pianist.
Symphonic Variations on a Choral (first time).....Georg Schumann
Symphony in F major.....Götz

It is a well attested fact that Georg Schumann, of Bremen, once gave eight piano recitals on eight consecu- tive evenings and played thirty-two sonatas by one Bee- thoven, four sonatas at each concert. You infer at once from this that he is a serious man; nor would you sus- pect him of giving way to sudden and uncontrollable bursts of humor. He is of the type known to the appre- ciative Berliner as "Ein ganz solider Kere."

That he should write choral variations is not surprising, but I was surprised to find Tristan by the side of good old Georg Neumark, who over two centuries ago sang sweetly—for he sang and played the viol da gamba:

Leave God to order all thy ways,
And hope in him whate'er betide.

Ah, if Tristan had only followed the spirit of this hymn, had only read attentively the Psalms! But Georg Schu- mann brings him in groaning and whining with his chromatics and his cor anglais the moment there is any hint of a choral.

It may not be paradoxical to say that the better made a set of choral variations the worse they are. The better made the less the incongruous but effective display of imagination. Now if a man has studied faithfully under Messrs. Jadassohn & Co., written symphonies, piano quintets, piano trios, sonatas and things before he reaches twenty-five, taken a solemn prize in a solemn way, and conducted a Gesangverein in Danzig, the hearer has a reasonable expectation in choral variations of a brave show of augmentation, diminution, canonic leading, organ points in all voices, inversion, fugue, &c. He also an- ticipates in prelude in which the theme is shy and re- veals itself in portions. He knows full well that the finale will end with a thundering row, with the brass and wood- wind belching forth the choral, while the strings are add- ing to the excitement and the fiddlers are sawing until sweat stands on the forehead and trickles beneath the left ear. But all this, men and brethren, is not necessarily music. The spirit of the choral is not thus enlarged or brought home to the hearer. Mr. Schumann's piece is well made—I speak of the manufacture—long, and at times boresome. Twelve variations are a tax on ordinary flesh and blood. After five or six they begin to resemble the coons in the once popular song. There is no variation that stands out by its grace, sweetness, mournfulness, grandeur—in fact, by any emotional quality. You see Jadassohn looking over the manuscript and saying: "Good boy, Georg! Why don't you make twenty-four of them?" And then the Finale is so easily anticipated. The long organ point and then the thundering out of "Wer nun den lieben Gott lässt walten"—the wind players cracking their cheeks—the full power of the organ—and the fid- dlers with set jaws, firmly braced, a little pale, fiddling wildly. No, the loan from "Tristan" and a few bold and ultra modern harmonies, as in cadences, will not save the piece, I fear. It was played here for the first time, but Mr. Thomas brought it out in Chicago, October 20, 1900.

Mr. Burmeister's arrangement of Liszt's Concerto Pa- thétique was also heard here for the first time. I spoke of it when it was played by him with the orchestra at the Worcester Festival in September. Last evening he was heartily applauded. His arrangement was evidently a labor of love; but, although the speech may seem ungra- cious, it seems a pity that his devotion to Liszt should have carried him so far. The Pathétique in any of its forms, as piano solo, as Liszt's Concerto for two pianos and as Von Bülow thought Liszt's Concerto for two pianos should go, is not one of the great works of the Abbé. It is not to be named with the two famous concertos. Mr. Burmeister has made an ingenious setting; he has taken great pains in the proper presentation, and yet the music belies the title. There is the old see-saw so dear to Liszt—bombast and sentimentalism. The feature of the performance was Mr. Burmeister's delightful playing of the Andante Sostenuto.

An elaborate explanation of Volkmann's overture, "Richard III.," has been made by Friedrich Brandes, of Dresden. He claims that the overture deals chiefly with scenes 3 and 4 of the fifth act of Shakespeare's tragedy, and that the first calm and soothing strain pictures the ghosts smiling on the sleeping Richmond. I am unable to find out whether Volkmann himself, like Smetana, made a deliberate program; but it is my conviction that he thought only of music which in a general way would be appropriate to Shakespeare's tragedy, for this overture forms a part of music for performances on the stage. The most impressive portion of the work is the opening, sombre, dismal and with the spectral ghost theme (clarinets, bassoons, trombones, with stroke of gong). This theme whenever it appears is handled in a masterly manner, although it does not redeem the platitudinous battle music. Louis Ehrlert asserts that Volkmann's real domain is "the lyric-instrumental"; but in this overture the purely lyric passages are conventional, and the finale is naïve. The overture to "Richard III.," the great bogy of English tradition and the old Bowery, is yet to be written. It should be more in the vein of Rubinstein's "Ivan IV." It should be in music what Barry Sullivan was on the stage. In the life of this man "steeped in crime"—I refer to Richard, not to Mr. Sullivan—there was no idyl, and in the overture there should be no contrasts of moods, although the ironic wooing of the Lady Anne might suggest a second theme.

Götz's symphony suffers alternately from extravagant eulogy and unnecessary neglect. It is an amiable work and the intermezzo is pretty, but it seems incredible that the critic of the World (London) as late as 1893 could say the symphony is "the only real symphony that has been composed since Beethoven died. * * * He (Götz) had the charm of Schubert without his brainlessness"—&c. To me the first movement is graceful, Mendelssohnian and a little tiresome from thematic repetition. Götz probably gained in fame by dying young. Would Bizet have surpassed his "Carmen"? And if Schubert had studied assiduously counterpoint and lived to be fifty might he not have written symphonic variations on a choral?

The new "Choir Collection of Anthems, Hymns and Response compiled from the works of Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, Arthur Foo Frank Lynes, G. W. Chadwick, E. W. Hanscom, G. W. Mars and others, is a practical collection of choir anthems, not too d cult. Some of the pieces are very effective. Many composers represented, the most prominent being those mentioned ab The work has been done by that extremely competent editor compiler, P. A. Schnecker, several of whose own compositions also in the list. Commended to the attention of choirs.

Charles Dennée's success as a teacher is exemplified by his m compositions for instructive purposes. His new songs, op. 29, " Sandman," "Love's Argument," "The Thought of You," "I L Thee" and "The Tryst," are of a bright and cheerful nature. T are melodious, of only moderate difficulty and are from every sta point well written. The accompaniments to all the songs are q easy.

Teachers have found "The Pupil's Library," First and Sec Series, valuable additions to their repertory. It is a difficult t to find and choose appropriate pieces for pupils, especially younger ones. Compositions are not so easily found which both instruct and interest, have technical value and are harmon and pleasing as well. The pieces contained in this collection h been carefully selected from the best of many easy sets wr especially for children's use.

Nevada's Opening Postponed.

THE opening of Mme. Emma Nevada's tour has b postponed until November 26, when the songst will be heard at the Colonial Theatre, Boston. This rangement was made in order that Madame Nevada c have a week's rest after her voyage across the ocean, it also enables Pablo Casals to appear in Paris be sailing.

Messrs. Stevens and Sutherland are in high feather the manner in which offers for special recitals and c certs have been pouring in. Every mail brings temp offers from musical societies and clubs. The tour is coming well booked up, however, and there are few ni now open.

Heathe Gregory, the popular basso, has been adde the list of artists surrounding Madame Nevada, and much to an already strong organization. Pablo Casa receiving much attention prior to his departure for country. Many requests for recitals have been rece from Continental cities, and the offers made have very flattering. The young 'cellist, however, looks ward with much pleasurable anticipation to his tou the United States, and it is doubtful if he will be h much in Europe until after his visit here.

Moreau, the pianist, is a good artist. Success is tain to crown his work in this country. His compato Maquarre, the flutist, is also a prime favorite in mu circles. Although still a mere lad, he is a fine perfo on his instrument.

One of the features of Madame Nevada's performa this year will be her singing of the various operatic costumed as the character in the opera. "Lak "Mignon," "La Traviata" and other favorite works o prima donna will be drawn on for her programs.

STEINWAYS IN 1901.

By Otto Floersheim.

ONE of my first acquaintances of value in this country, after I had arrived here in 1875, was the late William Steinway. I had the pleasure of being introduced to him at the old Liederkranz Hall, in Fourth Street, and an invitation to the famous masquerade ball of the German Singing Society was his first kind attention to me. It was not, however, until the year 1876, when at the Philadelphia exhibition the house of Steinway had carried off its high honors and I had made the acquaintance of their wonderful instruments at this very exhibition, that I first entered the awe inspiring precincts of Steinway Hall, the beautiful and noble architecture of which had long before attracted my attention and invited my admiration. Once introduced I soon made friends of all the members of the firm, the heads of which, Messrs. William and Theodore Steinway, remained so for the rest of their lives; hence their memory is and will ever be kept sacred to me.

With the younger generation now controlling the destinies of the house of Steinway & Sons, and whom I saw grow up during the seventeen years of my stay in New York, I always was on equally good terms, and among the courteous staff of directors and employees of the world famous firm I had none but friends. Almost daily I spent some hours at the warerooms, and hence I had uncommon and well utilized opportunities of watching the progress the Steinways were making in the manufacture of their instruments. It interested me to watch the gradual disappearance of the old square pianos and to notice how people began to take kindly to the upright instruments, which had been the style in Europe long before they were generally manufactured in the United States. It was not at first easy to convince intending purchasers of the fact that in quantity and quality of tone the upright pianos could be made just as potent and pleasing as the old square pianos; that the actions could be constructed to act as accurately and easy working and as responsive to the touch and quick for repetition as was the case in the squares; while the form of the upright instrument, although like everything new it was not at first to everybody's taste, soon commended itself to the American public through its saving of space and the fact that as a piece of furniture it looked much handsomer, especially in the artistic cases designed by the Steinways, than did the old square boxes. This change of taste took place and dates back from the time of Anna Mehlig's first successful tour through the United States, as Charles F. Tretbar, who was then, as he continues to be to this day, the most amiable and courteous of intermediators between the visiting artists and the other members of the firm, as well as the musical world of America generally, told me.

From that epoch on also dates the gradual development into an instrument used by the public, and not as before merely or almost exclusively by the artists, of the modern grand piano. In the early seventies the production of grand pianos built by the house, which alone then constructed more concert grands than all of the other American piano manufacturers, was perhaps not one-sixth of the whole of their production. Nowadays Steinways make more grands than upright pianos, and this fact through the very numbers speaks more convincingly of their excellency and merits than columns of articles of eulogy could express. Personally I became more and more convinced of the superiority of these American pianos, to which the world's greatest musical artists, not pianists alone, but the highest musical authorities and immortal composers also, had already attested—and I found my judgment corroborated during my annual trips to Europe.

None of the German pianos, let alone the English or French, which in their turn are inferior to the German instruments, could even approximately compare to the Steinway. If you told this to people abroad, however, they smiled incredulously, and they would probably have continued to do so to this very day if the Steinways with their tremendous enterprise had not "carried the war into Africa." Their trade in England and its colonies, as well as in South America, had begun to assert itself to such an extent that more for mercantile purposes for these countries than for the sale in Germany, they built their extensive factories in Hamburg, which are conducted by the genial director, Arthur von Holwede, once Theodore Steinway's right hand. But the Steinway pianos have also forced their way into Germany, and in an artistic way they play to-day a part in the musical life of the world's most music cultured country which could not have been foreseen even by the Steinways themselves.

When I settled in Berlin, a little over nine years ago, there seemed almost no possibility of anybody's playing another piano in public than the principal concert grand constructed in the capital of Germany. The first one to venture out upon the concert platform of the venerable Singakademie with a Steinway was the late Franz Rummel, who throughout life was always a plucky fellow, who had the courage of his convictions and acted accordingly. He had learned the value of a Steinway grand as the noblest of instruments upon which to realize his artistic intentions, and as the trusty assistant in all of his successes during his sojourn of several years in this country, and hence he was confident of what he was doing when he started out in the face of some managerial and other kindly meant advice, and placed the Steinway concert grands before the public of Berlin. Since then many other artists have followed his example, and by no means to their detriment, so that what at first seemed an impossibility has now become a regular event, and the name of Steinway is fast becoming a household word in Germany, such as it has been in the United States for many decades. Paderewski uses the Steinway exclusively in Germany as he does in this country, and at this very moment is scoring the same stirring, nay, unparalleled successes among the sturdy Teutons which have marked his career in this country. Ferruccio Busoni, the thinker, the philosopher, the brain-carrying-it-over-the-heart pianist, found the Steinway grand the best adapted to demonstrate his wonderful musical analytical powers and his equally great technical virtuosity. Sophie Menter, Sapellnikoff; Josef Hofmann, and, neither last nor least, Eugen d'Albert, who in Germany is considered the greatest of all pianists, uses the Steinway concert grand exclusively in Germany. What such a victory for the American instrument means from a material viewpoint in a country which is not overblessed with riches to make it a good market place for costly pianos, I am of course at a loss to gauge, but one thing I know, and that is, that æsthetically it is one of the greatest, if not the absolutely grandest triumph ever scored by the house of Steinway & Sons, and the greatest commercial victory ever achieved by an American manufacturing house abroad.

Now that I have returned to God's own country for a visit one of my first calls was of course at Steinway Hall, where I had spent innumerable pleasant and profitable hours before I left New York in order to settle down in Berlin. Hearty grips of the hand and genial smiles greeted me from all sides, and I was quickly made welcome in the old quarters. Sorrowfully, however, I missed also some of the old familiar faces. Old man Petri has, of course, long since joined the silent majority; William Steinway's former glad and hearty "Come in!" and his invariable good natured: "Da kommt der Floersheim, froh und feist, der glaubet nicht an Jesus Christ" (the last two words pronounced in English, to make them rhyme with the German epiteton scarcely ornans) was missing; Louis Geilfuss and both of the Rathgeber boys are absent from the ranks, which otherwise, however, seem to me almost unchanged. It speaks well for a house, its spirit of liberality, and causes through this a feeling of general satisfaction all around, if there are so few changes in the staff of employees as I found at Steinway Hall.

Of course, I had to try the latest styles of pianos, among the number a new miniature grand, yclept "Henry Ziegler's baby," which I found wonderful. For the size of the instrument it has a perfectly astounding volume of tone. More pianos were gone over, uprights, parlor and finally concert grands, the latter of such overwhelming power and beauty of tone that I had to be called to lunch twice—a thing which very rarely happened to me before—ere I could tear myself away from dear old Steinway Hall.

After lunch, accompanied by Charles H. Steinway, the head of the house, and N. Stetson, I visited the new Fifth avenue branch retail wareroom, where I found an additional number of remarkable Steinway art pianos, such as are not to be seen in any European piano house, particularly when the large quantity of art pianos is considered that are constantly kept on hand by the Steinways. It can readily be understood how profoundly impressed I am by the enormous strides taken by the Steinways during the period of my residence in Europe, a progress which must help to stimulate every true lover of the divine art, which through the Steinway piano has secured its chief modern single medium of expression.

TOTTEN CONCERT.—There was a concert by Madame Totten at Knights of Pythias Hall, Tottenville, S. I., last week in which Madame Totten appeared as soprano soloist four times, singing secular and sacred music. She was assisted by Anna Louise White, elocutionist, and Carl Tollefson, violinist. The concert was well patronized, the artists highly pleasing and most successful.

And January.

The London Press says of Mr. Tew's singing:

The Stage—"Mr. Whitney Tew proved himself a singer of excellent capabilities. His voice, which is a bass of great compass, is delightfully sympathetic—now full of tenderness, now instinct with passion and joy. He could not have been surpassed in his rendering of Schumann's 'Der Knabe mit dem Wunderhorn' and Liza Lehmann's curiously weird 'Myself when Young.'"—July 4, 1901.

London Musical Courier—"Mr. Whitney Tew's singing was marked by a high order of intelligence. He is one of the few singers now before the public who possesses the many qualifications that mean success. Besides a voice powerful and sympathetic he has a remarkable memory, and he never fails to display an intuitive knowledge of the poetic and dramatic significance of the text. In four songs by Bach, Brahms, Schubert and Schumann he exhibited great powers of vocalization and expression, and a style in singing German so thoroughly Teutonic that it was hard at times to realize his American origin . . . Three songs in English were equally impressive."—July 5, 1901.

Ladies' Field—"That fine bass singer, Mr. Whitney Tew, gave the first of his recitals in Steinway Hall. Madame Lehmann's 'In Memoriam' was a great test of Mr. Tew's manner and inflection, and he sustained the interest of his audience well throughout it; and it is a supremely hard work for a single voice—fragmentary, passionate, moody, with its pedal-note of acute sorrow. . . . Mr. Tew is fortunate in possessing a powerful voice of fine quality, and he has both the voice and brains for success."—May 25, 1901.

Daily Telegraph—"Mr. Tew is an artist who commands attention and deserves praise Especially has he the gift of feeling and the power of conveying it to others, while in point of intelligence he leaves but little to desire. Mr. Tew essayed last evening songs of widely contrasting kinds and of various countres, but the manner and spirit proper to each were easily revealed, and the result was a conspicuous success."—May 23 1901

BERLIN, W., LINKSTRASSE17.

October 16, 1901.

LAST week I wrote in a local paper: "Miss Farrar, daughter of a former baseball player, is shortly to make her début at the Royal Opera here. If there is anything in heredity, she should make a hit."

Assuredly there seems to be a great deal in heredity, for as Margarethe, in "Faust," Miss Farrar made a decided hit, a safe hit, and scored heavily.

We were all there, we Americans. We had recently heard and read much about anti-American feeling in the hallowed halls of the Berlin Royal Opera. We had been told of cabals and cliques, of plots and perseeutions, of jealousies and jousts, and we were there to smooth the path for our young countrywoman, to howl down opposition, if need be, and to see, before all things, that justice were done her, and she be given a fair, free and full chance.

Miss Farrar needed neither our presence nor our applause. From the first she established herself as a singer and actress so gifted that she could hardly fail to conquer her audience; and as an artist so independent that no degree of trickery on the stage could have shaken her confidence and repose.

Miss Farrar, about whose vocal future Melba is said to have been uncommonly optimistic, possesses a soprano voice of unusual richness and fullness in the middle and lower registers. The high tones sounded a trifle strained. This may have been due to the tension of a début, but I am inclined to doubt it. Indeed, I should almost call Miss Farrar a mezzo-soprano. It was in the middle voice that she had her best moments, when her singing was of purest [illegible] and its timbre most convincing. Her voice reminds [illegible] tly of Eames. But the older artist has neither the temperament nor the artistic tact of Miss Farrar. A faulty trill and a tendency toward hurrying climaxes in the ensemble numbers were the only blemishes on a performance really remarkable for a débutante.

Opinions as to her voice might differ, but on the subject of her acting there can be but one verdict. She has dramatic talent of the highest order. And, rarest gift of all, she has individuality. She did not walk through her part with the accustomed somnambulism of singers who tread operatic boards for the first time. She was a living, loving, suffering Margarethe, not merely a singing automaton. A number of original touches in the most hackneyed situations testified eloquently to Miss Farrar's histrionic gifts. If these came from her teacher, then all honor to the receptive pupil. I wish that the singer had displayed in her costumes the same taste that marked her stage deportment.

As has been stated, the success was unequivocal. Curtain calls and resounding "bravos" mean much in a city that is overfed with music. The newspapers find fault with Miss Farrar's high tones, and they advise the Royal Opera not to make her engagement permanent until she has mastered some roles in German.

Miss Farrar sang in Italian, the chorus in German, and the principals, with one exception, in execrable style. The exception was Frau Gradl, who did Siebel. Herr Gruening, the tenor, is always a strutting Lohengrin. His use of the falsetto voice was a pitiable performance for so bold a hero. Poor old Mödlinger was a tottering but painstaking Mephistopheles.

Arthur Friedheim has developed surprisingly since his visit to Berlin some four years ago. Then he was a pianist whose ambitions were greater than his technic; now he is grown into a splendid virtuoso, a master of finger mechanics, who has but few rivals. An extraordinary musician he was always. Friedheim does not belong to the morbid school of pianists—if there is such a school. He leaves pathological pianism to others, to those less well balanced and conscientious than himself. There is nothing subtle in his playing. He does not love esoteric moods, and he does not bare his soul to our frivolous gaze. He is sincere, sometimes almost to the point of rudeness. From all of which you could guess that in his playing, intellect dominates sentiment, and will (or intention might be the better word) takes the place of spontaneous emotion. He reminds me irresistibly of Hans von Bülow, and I believe that Friedheim himself would approve the comparison.

As a program maker he is not eminent. He commenced his concert, at Beethoven Hall, with Liszt's B minor Ballade, and followed this with Beethoven's thirty-three variations on a waltz by Diabelli. Personally, I am sorry that Diabelli wrote the waltz. Otherwise Beethoven might have spared us the variations. Even with Friedheim's clear exposition of the theme in all its twistings and turning, the fatal dullness of the number was not lessened, nor its inordinate length rendered more bearable. The flash and fire of the Liszt ballade but emphasized this dreariness. Even Von Bülow must have felt something of what I have just written, for he went to the trouble of coining a name for each one of the thirty and three variations. These names, by the way, are more picturesque than appropriate.

Weber's familiar "Moto Perpetuo" and Rubinstein's brilliant "Etude on False Notes" gave Friedheim ample opportunity for a full display of finger pyrotechnics. Both numbers dazzled, even though they lacked at moments moderation. A certain robustness of grasp marked all Friedheim's performances.

Five preludes by Chopin were among the best things the evening. The famous G sharp minor Study of Chopin, in its infernally clever Godowsky garb, revealed Friedheim as the possessor of a phenomenal left hand.

Three scintillating Liszt pieces enabled the pianist end his program in a blaze of glory, and to respond demonstrative applause, with two encores, Chopin's "Tr by" impromptu, and Schubert-Liszt's "Erlkönig."

Jacques Weintraub, amply noticed last year in the columns by Mr. Floersheim, created a most disappointi impression at his Singakademie concert this season. lacks technic, temperament, tone and style. In other spects he was exeellent. Weintraub could well give second concert, consisting of the notes that he missed the first.

At last Berlin's musical public is to possess what l long been a prominent feature of eoncert life in Paris a London. Five sterling musicians have formed a pern nent organization for the regular production of cham music written for wind instruments. This very wort band modestly calls itself "Association for Cham Music" (Vereinigung für Kammermusik) and eons of flute, oboe, clarinet, fagotte and horn. They gave th first concert last week at Bechstein Hall, and I am g to be able to record the complete success of this ini venture. There were works by Klughardt, Beethov Mozart and Taubert. Lack of space prevents a detai discussion of the performances, but it is hardly necess for unqualified praise can justly be accorded each every number. If anything stood out from the fram general excellence it was perhaps Mozart's E flat Q tet, a beautiful work, beautifully played.

Gottfried Galston evidently wished to be considere pianist of serious endeavor. Didacticism is a poor c with which to cover lack of inspiration. Galston's p gram, at Beethoven Hall, was made up of Brahms' C certo in B flat, a group of five Bach solos and Beethov Concerto in C minor. This scheme was too long the diet too heavy. It gave one musical indiges Concert givers should remember that brevity is the of several other things beside wit. Galston is ble with firm rhythm, correct memory and supreme co dence. He is handicapped by weak arms and wrists anæmic tone and utter lack of individuality. He is g also to attitudinizing at the piano, a bad habit, and a less one. Some persons called Galston musical. Te meant his program, I think.

Eugenie Argiewicz, aged about fifteen, from War on Sunday night interrupted the Sabbath reflections o pious Berlin critics with a violin recital at Beeth Saal. Her advisers might well have postponed the d until next year. Miss Argiewicz is decidedly a tale little lady, but falls just short of that absolute finish w we demand to-day from artists of any pretensions. things might reasonably be expected of her for the fu Arthur Speed, an English pianist, rendered a villai accompaniment in the Saint-Saëns B minor Con At no moment was he in touch with the temperame intention of the violinist. In some solos by Scarlat played very rapidly.

no concerto. Nor is it sufficient to cast the mixture the mode of B flat minor, a key in which Scharwenka Tschaikowsky gained renown. Such trifling details idea, purpose and content are not unessential. So ch in the ear of Felix vom Rath, a Munich composer, ose concerto, in one movement, was played by Anna genhan-Hirzel, at her Beethoven Hall concert last rsday. The player stood above the work. Frau Hir- revealed musicianship of the most thorough order, able technical mastery and temperament in abundance. se same qualities were evident in Tschaikowsky's Fan- ie de Concert, op. 56, with orchestra. The pianist ht have made a better choice. The public really de- ed some concession after that blatant Vom Rath con- o. The Philharmonic Orchestra tore into tatters a ty little orchestral bit, "Au Village," by Godard. ir work so far this season has been exceedingly rough.

illy Koenen, a well-known Dutch singer, who has been eving some success in Germany, gave a song recital at thoven Hall on Wednesday. In a comprehensive pro- n embracing mostly modern lyrics, including several Richard Strauss and Hugo Wolff, Miss Koenen proved elf possessed of much musical intelligence and a splen- knowledge of vocal management. She should apply knowledge to her mezza voce, which is thin and poor uality, and not free from a very audible tremolo. Her o is delightful, her forte free and sonorous. Rarely there been heard better enunciation and phrasing. delivery did not quite convince me. I doubt her mu- sincerity. It was all very clever, though, even to the trical posing at the piano.

enri Marteau is one of the most interesting figures in violin world of to-day, and it is small wonder that his ert at Beethoven Hall last Friday attracted a large au- e of Berlin's most representative music lovers. I well mber the blonde Frenchman as a lad of about twenty, handsome, very vivacious, very French, and amazing- lented. His talent is still in evidence, but it seems to ndergoing a process of transition. Somebody has con- d him that a tenuous tone, a matchlessly brilliant tech- nd a dashing temperament are not the most desirable ties for a great violinist. He has become a disciple at hrine of Joachim. He has eliminated self from his ng. He is objective. I deplore all this exceedingly. Marteau's endeavor has temporarily robbed us of one e most admirable exponents of the admirable French ol of violin playing. A man who plays Bach unlike rman, a French concerto unlike a Frenchman, and the lelssohn Concerto unlike either, is neither fish, flesh owl. We must await his complete development before n fix his rank. At present he seems a better musician formerly, but a poorer technician. It is not necessary w Bach's A minor Concerto in order to be classical, or the same reason it is not necessary to rob the two movements of the Mendelssohn Concerto of all sen- suousness, and to amble through the last part in a comfortable family allegro tempo. Marteau's bowing, his cleanness of intonation, particularly his crossing of the strings, and his unshakable rhythm were all as perfect as of yore. The Concerto in C minor, by Jaques-Dalcroze, displeased me, but seemed to be vastly appreciated by the audience. That is the beauty of music. It causes so many differences of opinion. A certain historical character might have said: "You hears the music and you takes your choice." I took mine adversely because I heard a great deal of bombastic preluding in the orchestra, including bells and harp; because I heard an attempt at learnedness, in the shape of a short fughetta; several melodious episodes of a saccharine sweetness, and greatly reminiscent of Gounod and Delibes; and because of a last movement very cheap and clap-trap. At the extreme end there is a promising bit. It seems that just about when Dalcroze was to say something he had arrived at the end of his concerto. The composer conducted his work with precision and swing. He received an ovation.

Regine Mach (singer) and Hans Hayn (pianist) entertained a few friends at Bechstein Hall with a concert of well-known compositions. Not being a friend I left early, after establishing that Regine has no ability and Hans less.

Ernest Schelling, an American, is a piano virtuoso in the most approved modern sense of the word. He has equipped himself with a technical outfit that is equal to any and all demands. Strength, fluency, clearness, accuracy—I had almost said infallibility—and extreme brilliancy are the dominating characteristics of his playing. Of course, these qualities do not allow an adequate performance of the romantic Schumann Concerto, for here we seek poetry, lyricism, sensibility. And in Chopin's F minor Concerto, too, there was wanting frequently a deeper note, a truer tone, a more vital pathos. Evidently Mr. Schelling has not learned the secret of rubato; a singular lack in a Paderewski pupil. His best work was done in his illustrious teacher's "Polish Fantaisie," undoubtedly one of the most effective works in the literature of the piano. Some of the Berlin papers found Paderewski's orchestration too heavy. The fault lay with the orchestra; their accompaniment was vulgarly loud. Mr. Schelling pleased his hearers so greatly that they forced him to add to the regular program the D flat Valse by Chopin and Paderewski's B flat Nocturne. Mention of the concert were incomplete without a word of praise for the artist's best assistant, an unusually full toned and sonorous Steinway grand piano.

The enterprising Theater des Westens produced Heinrich Zoellner's two act opera, "Der Ueberfall" (The Attack). From the Allgemeine Musik Zeitung I glean the information that the work is by no means a novelty for Berlin. It was produced in Charlottenburg, a suburb, some five years ago. History has it that the "Attack" was at that time successfully repulsed by the Berlin critics.

At the Theater des Westens it fared more favorably. The public liked the opera and said so unmistakably. And after all, is not the public the real and enduring critic?

Zoellner, a skillful dramatist, had his eye on the public when he adapted his libretto from a novel by Von Wildenbruch. The scene is laid in France, during the Franco-Prussian war of 1870. There are soldiers, drums, trumpets, sergeants and uniforms. There is a detachment of Uhlans quartered in a little village. The inhabitants plan a mock engagement feast, at which the Germans are to be made drunk and then assassinated. There is Reine Guoyon, a widow, who is to pretend the blushing bride. Then, of course, there is Wilhelm, a German volunteer, who is quartered on Reine's farm, and who wins her heart by talking feelingly of his mother and sister at home. After some love passages, Wilhelm, like a true German, falls sound asleep, and is rather rudely awakened by the knocking and shouting of the villagers, who have missed the volunteer at the massacre in the inn. Suddenly Reine rushes in, reveals all, and leads Wilhelm to a side door and safety. Act II. shows the lovers wandering aimlessly about a forest deep in snow. Just as they are about to find a haven of rest and security, Reine is overcome with patriotic remorse for her treachery in revealing the plot of her countrymen and drawing her dagger, kills herself before the astonished eyes of her Wilhelm.

Zoellner has dressed this skeleton plot with all the art that he so deftly revealed in the books of his other operas, "Faust," "The Sunken Bell" and "The Wooden Sword." There are an abundance of moments dramatic, sentimental and lachrymose.

The music is not on a par with the libretto. There is no distinctive style in Zoellner's score, no logic, no characterization. The melodies are tuneful, but inconsequential. The orchestration is of the conventional pattern, very correct, rarely descriptive, and always lacking in color and variety. He made rather characteristic use in one instance of some old military songs. If Zoellner has put nothing of himself in his music, at least he has not stolen from others. That is high praise in these days of the Wagner infection.

The staging and performance of the opera were as perfect as intelligent rehearsing and careful attention to every detail could make them. The Theater des Westens is an ideal house for a première. Composers are beginning to appreciate this fact. Of the women in the cast Mesdames Goetzl and Doninger deserve particular mention. Messrs. Steffens, Otto and Conrad, in the chief male roles, were all excellent. Conductor Sänger, who does more than simply beat time, is the right man in the right place.

Ruth Harlfinger and Frieda Hodapp gave a joint concert at Beethoven Hall on Tuesday last. Miss Harlfinger, a pupil of Stern's Conservatorium, has a most agreeable mezzo soprano voice, of good range and extreme flexibility. As a singer of Lieder it would be hard to find her equal among the younger Berlin vocalists. Her piano seemed to give especial pleasure to a large and enthusiastic audience. Also she possesses rare taste and artistic discretion. The pianist, Miss Hodapp, played Chopin's B flat minor Sonata, with almost masculine authority and bravura. She is a most promising artist.

Albert Geloso, who appeared at Bechstein Hall, is an excellent violinist, with a finished technic, sweet tone, and plenty of musical understanding. In the Bach numbers there might have been more breadth and dignity. He was assisted in the Brahms Sonata, A major, for piano and violin, by José Vianna da Motta, a painstaking pianist.

Other concerts last week were given by Hanna Raimond, a singer whose work was spoiled by nervousness; Waldemar Lütschg, an excellent pianist of classical tendencies; Marie von Beekum, a vocalist who cannot sing; August Schmid-Lindner, a pianist of some promise; Mathilde Haas, a talented singer who had great success with her audience; Margarethe Petersen, another singer, who had more, and Martha Cunningham, a third singer, who had none.

Next week I shall be able to give you accounts of the first Nikisch concert, the first Weingartner concert and the first Richard Strauss concert, with the newly reorganized Tonkünstler Orchestra; also of Godowsky's piano recital, Sauer's playing of the Sgambati Concerto, Marteau's second concert, the Halir Quartet soirée, Hugo Kaun's concert and Schelling's recital.

BERLIN GOSSIP.

There were thirty-nine concerts here last week. "Thank heavens the figures were not reversed!" writes a local scribe. Strange consolation!

Herrmann Wolff, the well-known manager, is seriously ill with an attack of appendicitis. An operation was performed several days ago, of which the result is still doubtful.

Fräulein Ida Hiedler, of our Royal Opera, has been engaged to appear at Covent Garden, London, during the next summer season. She will sing Sieglinde in the "Walküre," Elsa in "Lohengrin," Elizabeth in "Tannhäuser," Eva in "Meistersinger," and "Fidelio."

Berlin is inexpressibly shocked at the sad news of the death of young Mrs. Howard Brockway, who was extremely well known here and deservedly popular in society. Much sympathy is expressed for the unhappy husband.

The death of Miss Maude Jennings, in Chicago, also cast a gloom over our American colony here, many of its members being Chicagoans who had known the young pianist intimately.

Godowsky has been engaged for one of the Philharmonic concerts in Warsaw. Following the urgent request of press and public, he has chosen as his numbers Liszt's A major Piano Concerto and several of the wonderful Chopin-Godowsky transcriptions.

The annual competition for the Mendelssohn violin prize of 1,500 marks took place last week at the Hochschule. The successful candidate was Alfred Wittenberg, a pupil of Joachim. The competition is supposed to be an open one, but by some strange chance the prize always goes to a Joachim pupil. The fact that the venerable violinist chooses the jury and serves as one of its members is a mere detail, hardly worth the mention.

"Herbert and Hilde," a new opera in three acts, libretto by Eberhard König and music by Waldemar von Baussnern, has just been accepted for production at the Dresden Royal Opera.

Ferdinand Schütz, the well-known comic opera tenor, has decided to go in for grand opera. He will study tenor buffo parts.

August Anna, the gifted Danish composer, can chronicle another success. Last week his newest opera, called "Shepherdess and Chimney Sweep," after an Anderson fairy tale, achieved a brilliant success at the Royal Opera in Copenhagen.

Here is a Wagner joke out of date by several years. A Scotch mechanic heard the "Meistersinger" at the opera. "Didn't the glorious volume of sound affect you?" he was asked by a Wagnerite. "Not in the least," replied the phlegmatic Scot; "I'm a boiler maker by trade."

Moriz Rosenthal opened his season last week in Carlsruhe with the utmost possible success. Press and public showered adulation upon him. There is not a shadow of doubt that Rosenthal is one of the biggest names among pianists in Germany—and in some other countries too.

Ernst Mahr, an accomplished violoncellist, who lived in the United States for twelve years, has just settled in Berlin, where he intends to devote himself to concert playing and teaching.

In a recent issue of a New York paper I read that Grau excuses himself for not engaging American artists by saying that none of those now studying in Europe are ready to go on the stage. Not ready, forsooth. What twaddle, what rot! Where, in the name of all that is vocal, does the good Grau seek his singers? Has he been in Berlin? Has he hunted his young compatriots here? Has he given them a chance to prove their ability? All this occurred to me while attending an audizione recently, where I heard S. E. Hartmann, the Chicago baritone, sing through a seemingly endless repertory of roles—Verdi, Puccini, Ponchielli, Mozart, Gounod, Massenet, Meyerbeer and Wagner. Here is a young man, of imposing figure and appearance; with a voice of surpassing sweetness, power and range, a limitless repertory, and five years constant experience on the most important operatic stages of Italy. What is the trouble? Where is the hitch? Is Grau bigoted or myopic? Are the New Yorkers never to hear anything and anybody new. Really, this thing is most discouraging for the young artists of unusual ability.

Last week a man was sued by his wife for arrears f[illegible] maintenance. He told the judge that he was a sc[illegible] writer. "Stop that nonsense and seek a more reputa[illegible] employment" his honor is said to have suggested.

Professor Dr. Joachim will be the soloist (Bach C[illegible] certo for violin) at the concert of the Meiningen C[illegible] Orchestra, October 22.

The tenor Rothmühl, who was sued for libel and g[illegible] insult, has compromised the case with the young lad[illegible] question. Rothmühl agreed to present 1,000 marks to [illegible] poor of Stuttgart, and the suit was dropped.

Mr. Baughan says in the London Musical Record: "[illegible] were a composer I would rather write a single song w[illegible] said something, and said it beautifully, than half the s[illegible] phonic poems of to-day." Why not apply that prin[illegible] to your lengthy writings, Mr. Baughan?

His health has improved, and he is almost well. He has just finished a play with the euphonious title of "Sseny wdonije Bessemjonowa" (Scenes in the House of Bessemenov). There is said to be little plot in the drama, hence its title, "Scenes." It is a psychological study of Russian middle class life.

SAAR'S COMPOSITION RECITAL.—Louis V. Saar will give a recital of his own compositions at Carnegie Lyceum on Friday evening, November 8, at which he will be assisted by Miss Edith Chapman. The Variations and Fugue for piano, which won for the composer the first prize in Boston two years ago, will be played by the composer as the opening number. This will be its first public performance, as well as the first public hearing, of some of his songs and other piano works. The program for the evening follows:

Variations and Fugue, op. 29.
First prize, Boston, 1899.

Songs—
Thränen (MS.).
Sternlein, op. 19, No. 1.
Der Schwur (MS.).
Liebesfahrt (MS.).

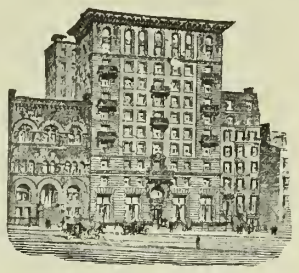
Boston Music Notes.



HOTEL BELLEVUE,
17 BEACON STREET,
BOSTON, October 26, 1901.

At the Æolian and Pianola recital this afternoon in Steinert Hall, Albert Kranich and Leon Van Vliet were the soloists. These concerts are always attended by a large and fashionable audience who show much enthusiasm for the music given. Well-known Boston soloists appear each week.

Announcement is made of a chamber music concert on Thursday evening, November 14, at Steinert Hall, when Ernest Perabo, Kneisel and Schroeder will appear for the benefit of the Elizabeth Peabody House.

Mrs. Thomas Tapper announces a recital for the afternoon of November 21 at Steinert Hall. Emil Mahr and Hermann Heberlein will be the assisting artists.

At the Faelten Pianoforte School recital on Tuesday evening the following pupils took part. Karl Becker, Cambridge; Anna Pumphrey, Jamaica Plain; Alice Vogel, Brookline; Ina A. Johnson, Gloucester; Ina Langworthy, San Francisco, Cal.; Alice E. Parker, Boston; Annie F. Brady, Grovelend, and Helen L. Masten, Boston. The recital included a very interesting illustration of class instruction by nine members of the juvenile department.

The Orpheus Club, of Somerville, under the musical direction of H. Carleton Slack, has started upon its third year with a large membership, both active and associate. It is the intention of the club to give three concerts with the assistance of the very best talent.

H. Whitney Tew's first recital in this city takes place Wednesday evening, November 6.

All the artists have volunteered their services for the two extra concerts that will be given by the Handel and Haydn Society in November. Included among them are Emma Juch, Clara Poole King, Gertrude Miller, Glenn Hall, Gwilym Miles, Evan Williams and Joseph Baernstein. H. G. Tucker will preside at the organ. Verdi's Requiem and "Elijah" are to be given.

Miss Anna Miller Wood, who has been abroad all summer, spending most of the time in London, has returned to the city and resumed teaching.

Pauline Woltman will give a song recital at Chickering Hall November 20.

On Wednesday evening, the third in the faculty course at the New England Conservatory of Music, the recital will be by Miss Gertrude I. McQuesten.

The Longy Club will give their second season of recitals at Chickering Hall. The club is composed of Messrs. Longy, Lenon, Lebailly, Debuchy, Hackebarth, Maquarre and Gebhard.

Miss Clara Drew has been appointed head of the musical and vocal department of the Acadia Seminary and College, of Wolfville, N. S.

An informal meeting of the Salem Oratorio Society took place on Thursday evening. The society will give the oratorio of "Elijah" this autumn.

A reception will be given by Miss Sarah A. Perkins, preceptress of the New England Conservatory of Music, on the evening of October 31, from 8 to 10 o'clock.

Miss Edith L. Winn is located at Trinity Court for the season.

Miss Bernardine Parker, pupil of Mme. Etta Edwards, will sing at Winthrop November 15.

Miss May B. Dadmun, soprano of the Second Universalist Church, will be the soloist at the rehearsal of the Handel and Haydn Society on Sunday evening.

The Schubert Male Quartet, of which Frederic Martin is a member, will sing at a banquet in Quincy House on Tuesday evening.

A Successful Choir Exchange.

THE original and liberal manner in which Townsend H. Fellows conducts his church choir exchange, and the facility with which those who become members secure positions, probably accounts for the exceptionally large enrolment of members for the last two months. Among those who secured positions through his exchange last week were Mrs. Elizabeth Williams, appointed soprano soloist St. Luke's Church, Montclair; Dr. John Rothwell, bass soloist, to the Washington Heights Presbyterian Church, and Harold O. Smith, who began his new duties as organist at the French Episcopal Church last Sunday.

This exchange is the only institution of its kind that exacts no commissions from members securing positions through its efforts, the first membership fee of $6 being the only charge, for which sum they enjoy the facilities of the exchange for one year from entrance.

BROUNOFF PUPIL IN LEIPSIC.—From Frederic H. Watson, now studying at the famous Leipsic Conservatory, comes a letter of grateful thanks for thorough preparation, in part as follows:

DEAR MR. BROUNOFF—I have thought of you many times since coming here, and at last write you. I am here at the Conservatory, studying piano with Herr Beving and counterpoint with Herr Schreck. I get THE MUSICAL COURIER here, as do many of the students, for that is the only paper in which we can read musical news of Berlin (only 100 miles distant), Dresden, etc. The examination in harmony was easy for me, thanks to your good training. I was told that Mr. Schad developed quite a fair technic, thanks to you again.

Again I thank you for all you have done for me; the teachers say there is nothing to relearn—thanks to you once more. F. H. W.

Brounoff gave his first lecture on Russian music at the school on East Fifth street, and such a crowd gathered that there was standing room only, 300 people going without seats. His soprano pupil, Miss Clara Gorn, sang songs by Tschaikowsky, Rubinstein, Brounoff, &c., and the lecture was further amplified with stereopticon views. Brounoff gives a series of four lectures in Brooklyn.

FREDERIC ARCHER.

IT is with sincere regret that we have to record the death of Frederic Archer. He was a sterling musician, and he commanded the respect of his fellow-men. The musical world is poorer by his death.

Frederic Archer died at his home in Pittsburg, Pa., Tuesday, October 22, from cancer of the stomach. He was sixty-three years old.

In reviewing the life of Mr. Archer we can do no better that reprint the following from THE MUSICAL COURIER National Edition of July 4, 1898.

FREDERIC ARCHER,

Music Director of Carnegie Music Hall and City Organist Pittsburg, Pa.

Frederic Archer was born in the famous old university city of Oxford, England, where he received his literary education. In his early youth he manifested indications of musical precocity and in his ninth year could play at first sight any composition within the scope of his childish fingers with unerring accuracy, a gift that has ever since rendered his repertory practically exhaustless. In 1847 he became a chorister at Margaret Chapel, now All Saints' Church), London, and about five years later, on his return to Oxford, was appointed organist of St. Clement's Church and Merton College Chapel, holding both appointments. Here he remained for some years, pursuing his studies, and then, after a short sojourn in London, traveled in Europe. On his return he was appointed organist of the Royal Panopticon, London, which then contained the largest and first distinctively concert organ in England. In 1862 he gave daily recitals at the Albert Hall and Crystal Palace, and in the chief cities of Europe. In 1863 he became joint conductor with Sir Julius Benedict of the London Vocal Association (an important organization of 400 picked voices), and under their auspices a number of important musical works were given for the first time in England. At this time he also accepted the musical lectureship at the Royal Polytechnic Institution.

In 1865 he was appointed organist and choirmaster of Christ Church, Lancaster Gate, which speedily became noted for the excellence of its choral service, performed by an unusually large surpliced choir of men and boys. Later he assumed a similar position at the church of the Jesu Fathers, remaining there until 1873, when he accepted th appointment of organist at the Alexandria Palace, whic was shortly afterward destroyed by fire. In 1875, when t new palace was completed, he resumed his duties, a gave, without once repeating a program, more than 2,0 recitals on the great organ, one of the finest and large concert instruments in the world. Here he frequent played to audiences of 20,000 people. He afterward a cepted the entire musical direction of that gigantic esta lishment, conducting the daily classical and popula chestral concerts, monthly musical festivals (with orch and chorus of 2,000) and weekly operatic performa he also superintended the art school and continued his organ recitals, besides fulfilling his duties as music aminer in Glasgow University, an honor conferred in 1879. He also, from 1878 to 1880, conducted th certs of the celebrated Glasgow Select Choir, and co and arranged a series of part songs for its use. close of 1880, when the palace closed its doors, h America, played in many of the leading cities, and short return to London was induced to take up his ent residence here. He took charge of the music at Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, at the solicitation of the late Henry Ward Beecher, and then became organist of the Church of the Incarnation, New York. While in that city e gave ninety-two organ concerts in Chickering Hall, asisted by the most eminent of living artists then in Amera. He has also inaugurated nearly every large organ of nportance in this country and Canada since his arrival ere, and with such success that his services are in conant requisition in all parts of the country. Moreover, his normous experience and thorough knowledge of the techical details of organ building render his advice and asstance in the preparation of specifications for new instruents and the supervision of their construction especially aluable. In 1883 he founded and edited in New York a gh-class critical musical journal. In 1887 he accepted the nductorship of the Boston Oratorio Society, and the rst performance of Gounod's "Redemption" ever heard in is country was given by this organization, assisted by the ston Symphony Orchestra, under Frederic Archer's dirction, in the following year, followed by other important velties. Milwaukee and Chicago have since claimed his rvices, until the Carnegie Library Commission, of Pittsrg, Pa., opened negotiations with him to permanently asme the duties of city organist, and undertake other imrtant musical duties. In June, 1895, he accepted the rms offered, commencing his new duties in the following vember.

Since his residence in that city the formation and growth real musical taste, both in society circles and among the ople at large, have been remarkable. The indefatigable ture of his labors there is proved by the record of his hievements.

During three seasons he has given 223 organ recitals on fine concert instrument in Carnegie Hall, and during s period has played no less than 1,365 important works, organ compositions and 742 orchestral and other carely selected works, representative of all nationalities and hools, both ancient and modern, transcribed by himself. The total number of persons present at these performe (a large number of them being regular attendants) exceeded 195,000.

He has also delivered a series of thirty lectures on mual subjects, illustrated by himself on both organ and no, which have proved of the highest educational value. n the spring of 1896 he founded the Pittsburg Symny Orchestra, a finely equipped organization of fifty efully selected native and foreign players, and at thirty certs (preceded by an equal number of public rehears), given under his direction, no less than 218 works e given, including twenty-five symphonies, thirty-one sical or concert overtures, sixteen orchestral suites, six phonic poems and sixteen concertos of the highest type widest possible scope. The remainder consisted of miscaneous compositions, including many important novel, some of which were then heard for the first time in erica. A large number of fine vocal productions were introduced by singers of the highest repute.

hese concerts were of such notable excellence that they the most flattering comments, not only from the emit solo artists who appeared, but have also attracted espread attention and elicited eulogistic comment ughout the length and breadth of this country, as well n the prominent music centres of Europe. In May last Archer accepted the post of musical examiner in the versity of Toronto (Canada) offered to him by the ite, as the duties of the position will in no way interwith his Pittsburg engagements.

is conceded everywhere that he has revolutionized the of organ playing on this continent, and ranks among foremost of living organists.

is chief characteristics as a virtuoso are great technical ty, a careful observance of the composer's inner meanand a regard for the production of legitimate effects in nterpretation of orchestral works. He is, moreover, an mplished orchestral and choral conductor, and a pianist he highest merit.

ne of the prime causes of Frederic Archer's celebrity in the fact that he has always recognized the impore of popularizing the instrument of his predilection. He lly aware that programs made up exclusively of heavy lastic works prove wearisome and uninteresting to the general public and musicians alike, and has therefore emancipated the instrument from its thraldom and fully developed its resources. He has elevated it to the rank of a concert instrument and adapted it to the requirements of orchestral compositions of a more generally intelligible character, freely introducing those familiar to a mixed audience. At the same time he is one of the finest living exponents of classical organ music, but judiciously intersperses it with lighter productions.

Mr. Archer's unique method of registration, aided by unusually long and flexible fingers and a thorough practical knowledge of every species of orchestral device, enables him to produce effects never yet equaled by any other organist. Another advantage he enjoys is an extraordinary facility for manipulating without previous examination the manifold complications of the largest instruments, and developing their resources in the most exhaustive manner. As the plan and structure of every organ differ so widely, the seeming impossibility of such a feat must be at once apparent even to the uninitiated.

Mr. Archer has also won for himself an accepted position both as an author and composer, his musical essays and compositions enjoying a wide reputation. His "Organ School," published some years since, is perhaps the most exhaustive and comprehensive work on the subject ever written, and has gone through several editions; see Grove's Dictionary of Music, Scribner's Cyclopedia of Music and Musicians, Brown's Musical Dictionary, Batiste's Musical Biography, Riemann's Musical Dictionary.

Samuel V. Owen.

Samuel V. Owen, formerly tenor soloist of the Greenwood Baptist Church, Brooklyn, died at his home in Brooklyn, Monday evening, October 21. He was born in Brooklyn fifty-six years ago. Mr. Owen joined the Forty-eighth Regiment of New York Volunteers in the Civil War. Later he organized Thatford Post, G. A. R. The deceased was a member of the American Legion of Honor, and he was also a Knight of Honor.

American School of Opera.

THE American School of Opera gives its first public performance this season in the Herald Square Theatre, Thursday afternoon, November 7, at 2:15. The bill will be "The Marriage of Jeannette," an opera in one act, by Victor Massé; scenes from "Aïda" and the whole of "Cavalleria Rusticana." The school has a good cast of performers, and expects to give an entertainment that will rival the best opera companies. "The Marriage of Jeannette" is a little operetta which has never been given in this country, but which is deserving of considerable attention from the operagoing public. The music is very fascinating, and the dialogue is bright and witty. The school is in possession of the only English translation in existence. Maurice Hageman, director of light opera at the school, will stage the production. The scenes from "Aïda" and Mascagni's "musical melodrama" will be staged by Theodore Habelman, the school's grand opera director. A good many of the well-known operatic managers are expected to be present, and this performance will come very near deciding the question as to whether the school will turn out really first-class opera singers or not. In these performances the school will use its own chorus class, which has a membership of over thirty.

Tickets are on sale at Tyson's agencies, at Charles Ditson's, Pease Piano Company, Herald Square Theatre and the offices of the school in Berkeley Lyceum, No. 23 West Forty-fourth street.

GEORGE TOLLMAN.—George Tollman, who is the possessor of a beautiful tenor voice, and who has been studying for the past few months in William G. Stewart's American School of Opera, has secured, through the school, a prominent position with a new Boston stock opera company.

OLIVE MEAD'S "STRAD."—Miss Olive Mead, the well-known violinist, has just purchased from John Friedrich & Brother, of this city, a magnificent Stradivarius, which she will play in all her concerts hereafter. The price paid is said to be $6,000.

PRESS WOMEN HEAR MUSIC.

THE musical numbers at the first monthly meeting of the season of the New York Woman's Press Club were presented, under the direction of Mme. Evans von Klenner, chairman of entertainment. The musicians who appeared were Charles Russell, 'cellist; Mrs. Antonia Sawyer, contralto, and Hugh E. Williams, basso. Piano accompaniments were played by Miss Rosetta Wiener, for Mr. Russell; Mrs. James T. Patrick for Mr. Williams, and Miss Fenton for Mrs. Sawyer. Mr. Russell, who is a member of the faculty at Clavier Piano School, played particularly well the graceful "Swan," by Saint-Saëns, and later showed his technical finish in Popper's "Vito." Mrs. Sawyer sang extremely well, "Pensée d'Automne," by Massenet, and "If I Were Loved," by Stahlschmidt. Mr. Williams, who is making rapid progress under the instruction of Dudley Buck, Jr., sang first the English version of a tender and effective Welsh serenade, "All Through the Night." For his second number Mr. Williams sang "Daphne's Love," by Ronald, and on being recalled added an extra song.

The other features of the afternoon included an address by Mrs. Edward Addison Greeley on "The King Alfred Memorial"; a paper by Dorothy Dix on "The Newspaper Woman As I Have Found Her"; a recitation from "The Bonnie Brier Brush," by Mrs. Olivia Hall, and Edward Markham, who read a number of his own short poems, and then called upon Mrs. Coffin to declaim one of his more dramatic pieces, written by the poet when peace was expected between the British and the Boers. Grace Greenwood, the venerable newspaper woman, was introduced by Mrs. Croly, president of the Press Club, and several other guests of the afternoon were formally presented.

CLAVIER PIANO SCHOOL.

MRS. RAYMOND BROWN gave an "Illustrated Talk" on Wagner's "Parsifal" in Clavier Hall, Tuesday evening, October 22.

Mrs. Brown's intelligent study of Wagner's work and her inimitable style of lecturing hold her audience interested. Particularly noticeable was the religious spirit which seemed to pervade the opera through her eyes, although she evidently recognized that this spirit of reverence was due perhaps more to Wagner's artistic thought than to any deep rooted conviction on his part.

Mrs. Brown will probably deliver her talk on "Tristan and Isolde"; also repeat the series of talks on the "Ring" later in the season at this school, after her New England tour.

Owing to the recital by S. M. Fabian, given at Mendelssohn Hall, October 24, the regular recital of the school was omitted this week.

The second recital of the Clavier Piano School for this season will be given Friday evening, November 1, by Charles Russell, director of the ensemble class, assisted by Miss Mary J. Lansing, contralto; Harry Stewart Briggs, pianist, and George Stehl, violinist. The program for the evening follows:

Sonata, C major.....Bocherini (1700)
Morire ('cello obligato).....Guido Papini
Miss Lansing.
Air.....Bach
Moments Musical.....Schubert
Le Cygne.....Saint-Saëns
Vito.....Popper
Song of a Heart.....Louise Tunison
A Memory.....Edna R. Park
Miss Lansing.
Trio, op. 42.....Neils W. Gade

CHURCH MUSIC.—On Sunday night last the quartet of the Church of the Divine Paternity sang excerpts from the "Elijah." Miss Harris sang "Hear Ye, Israel"; Mr. Quesnel, "If With All Your Hearts" and "Then Shall the Righteous"; Miss Marvin, "Woe Unto Him" and "O Rest in the Lord," and Gwilym Miles sang "Lord God of Abraham," "Is Not His Word Like a Fire" and "It Is Enough."

Mr. Miles' singing was the feature of the evening. His deep, sonorous voice and the depth of feeling with which he sang made a decided impression. Mr. Miles is rapidly winning the recognition he deserves.

FROM PARIS.

PARIS, OCTOBER 3, 1901.

A VERY interesting discussion has taken place recently in the Paris journals on the utility of the Conservatoire as an institution, and the value of the instruction received there. As readers of THE MUSICAL COURIER are probably aware, the Conservatoire of Paris is a national, not a private, affair, being supported by the Government, and no fees paid by those who are accepted as pupils.

As a rule the results obtained by the instrumental classes are really excellent, a practical demonstration being given by the pupils, many of whom execute the different numbers selected by the jury in advance, and read at sight on the platform, before the audience, in a remarkably efficient and in some cases exceptionally able manner. The singing classes are not nearly so successful, and the dramatic instruction given nearly always shows signs of care and efficiency on the part of the different professors. It is the classes of tragedy and comedy which have recently furnished the material for the discussion referred to. Of course, like all other public institutions, the Conservatoire has its enemies as well as its friends. Many there are who affirm that it would be infinitely better to close its doors, as the results obtained are by no means commensurate with the expense of its maintenance.

There is certainly no getting away from the facts that the great artists before the public, whether instrumentalists, singers or actors, do not, as a rule, go through a Conservatory ordeal. The reason of this I cannot tell. It may be that the hard and fast rules, the set routine, and frequently slavish copying of the professor, restrain and kill that element of individuality absolutely necessary to the making of a great artist. It has long been a favorite "gag" in Paris in speaking of any public performer: "What! he has not been through the Conservatoire; then he must have talent."

Gemier, who is at present director of the Renaissance Theatre and an actor of merit, besides being a great favorite of the public—not always the same thing—is violently opposed to the Conservatoire and advocates its discontinuance. I believe that Gemier, now so successful, was refused admission as a student. Sarah Bernhardt, who was accepted as a pupil—where, I believe, she only remained a year—has registered her reasons for its continuance. She says it would be a distinct loss were the Conservatoire to be abolished, as she considers it necessary to the preservation of dramatic art.

"The pupils of the Conservatoire learn the old traditions from those authorized to convey them; the traditions which come in a direct line from Racine, Corneille, Beaumarchais; and, above all, from Molière. Tradition, which seems an old worn-out rag to many modernists, is a many-colored flag under which have rallied many of our best and greatest artists." Mme. Sarah Bernhardt is also of the opinion—like many others—that the Conservatoire is much to blame in many things, but she claims it is the fault of its heads. She would have its teachers more in earnest, greater discipline among the pupils, classes better kept, that is, with more authority; more frequented, and an education broader and more varied. But the necessity of improving the institution does not, Madame Bernhardt adds, prove that it should be suppressed.

The concerts of Chevillard (Lamoureux) and Colonne have not yet commenced, the latter conductor being at Prague, where he recently gave a concert, of which the program was made up exclusively of French composers—Berlioz, Bizet, Lalo, Franck, Saint-Saëns, Massenet and Bruneau. The last was represented by the fine prelude to his opera, "Messidor," a work which had not a great success at the Paris Opéra Comique. The concert was, it appears, a great success, and Colonne was induced to add this city to the list of places included in the tour which he undertakes next season, and which already counts among the towns to be visited—Metz, Carlsruhe, Wiesbaden, Leipsic, Berlin, Dresden, Vienna and Munich. Art—that is, musical art—in Europe does not seem to recognize nationality, as the welcome accorded to the most distinguished conductors and virtuosi from other countries and the success with which French composers, conductors, &c., meet in foreign countries conclusively proves.

Paris is at present an extraordinarily cosmopolitan city. To be convinced of this one has only to glance at the amusement programs. At the Opéra one sees constantly the name of Madame Acté, who is from Finland. At the Opéra Comique three foreign singers are filling leading parts—Miss Courtenay, American; Miss Mary Garden, Scotch, and Miss Nerville (Chapman), Irish. At the different music halls the posters seem to bear the names of English or American acrobats, pantomimists and gymnasts more frequently than any other nationality. Wagner's operas figure largely at the Opéra, and the Antoine Theatre delights in producing the translated works of Hauptmann and Sudermann, while at the Athénée Theatre we have a troupe of Japanese performers playing (in Japanese) the trial scene from Shakespeare's "Merchant of Venice" and "The Knight and the Geisha." Madame Sadi Yacco, the leading actress of the company, is a marvel of daintiness, intelligence, charm and vivacity.

At the Gaité Theatre is being rehearsed the "Abbé Vincent," an operetta composed by the late Audran. The music of this piece is of a much more elaborate character than his previous works, with recitatives and a more complicated orchestration. It is possible that an interesting little lawsuit may arise from the refusal of Mr. Perrin, who is a baritone, having refused to accept the part assigned to him, which he claims to be too low for his voice, the role having been written for a bass.

At the Opéra Comique they are preparing a revival of Victor Masse's charming opera of "Galatéa." The title role will be sung by Miss Courtenay, and Pygmalion by Mlle. Gerville-Réache. This latter role was originally created by Faure, the famous baritone, but was relinquished by him, and afterward sung by Mlle. Wertheimber, contralto.

Miss Marie Barna, well known to the public of the United States, where she has sung in concerts, and subsequently as first dramatic soprano in the Melba-Ellis-Damrosch Company, is married and living in Paris, Avenue du Bois de Boulogne. Miss Barna—or Mrs. Russak—has recently finished a very successful operatic season at Coburg, Germany.

A musical innovation has been made at the Odéon Theatre, which has been a great success, and which I heartily commend to American theatrical managers. Everyone who visits a theatre where drama is performed knows and has felt the tedium of the waits between the acts. Mr. Ginisty, of the Odéon, has engaged a good orchestra, with competent conductor, who instead of remaining in front of the stage, the ordinary place for the orchestra, go to what is called the foyer in the French theatres—that is, the promenade or crush room, as it is sometimes called—and there perform a very enjoyable program of varied music. I send you a specimen, which will serve as a contrast to the tire some selections ordinarily performed, consisting generally of a weak overture, a waltz with inevitable cornet solo operatic selection, often "Traviata" or "Trovatore," wit "Ah che la morte," also for the cornet, &c.:

First Entr'acte.—"Souvenir of the Ball" (Gounod); "Le Timbr d'Argent," romance for oboe and violin (Saint-Saëns); Minu (Emile Pessard).

Second Entr'acte.—"Marionettes" (Braga); old air, sung by Mll Antoinette Combe; "Doll Minuet" (Lausse).

Third Entr'acte.—"Folies Amoureuses" (Emile Pessard); "Inte mede" (Lacombe); "Premier Menuet" (Maquaire).

The managers of theatres where drama is performed a notoriously stingy, so far as the orchestra is concerne considering the expense of this item a necessary but u profitable outlay. One such director was in former yea manager of the Porte St. Martin Theatre, where a lar and efficient orchestra was a necessity, owing to the natu of the pieces performed there—melodrama, requiring mu claborate scenery and incidental music. The expense this large orchestra, which he dared not diminish, was source of constant annoyance to our director, when turni over his account books and seeing what a serious item maintenance became in his yearly expenditure. He h arranged with a certain author to produce an elabor spectacle, in which the great sensation scene was a lar jungle in the island of Java by sunset, with tigers leapi about among the trees and tropical plants. The setting this scene was very clever and complicated, the stage bei entirely inclosed, front, sides and back with somewhat t but very strong iron network, forming a complete cage which the animals were seen disporting themselves. lurid orange and red lights only were turned on dur this scene, this network of iron was invisible to the au ence. At the dress rehearsal the effect was remarka good, and gave great satisfaction to the manager, who w the author was in front. The latter, however, feelin a little nervous at seeing these savage animals disport themselves in the mimic jungle on the stage with but, a seemed, such a slight protection between them and public, said to the manager at his side: "Very good, markable; but don't you think the cage is very thin? W a dreadful thing it would be if the beasts should br down the iron partition in front and get among the a ence." "Oh! that's all right," was the calm rejoinder o director, "the public would have time to escape while animals were eating the orchestra!"

"Les Barbares," Saint-Saëns' last work, is being acti rehearsed at the Opéra, and I am able to send you a details prior to its first presentation. The roles are b studied three deep, so that no interruption may take in the performances, owing to indisposition, &c., on the of the singers. The following is the complete cast:

Marconair	Messrs. Vaguet, Rousselière,
Scaurus, the Reciter	Messrs. Delmas, Noté,
The Watcher	Messrs. Rousselière, C
Hildibrath	Messrs. Riddez, Doua
Floria	Mmes. Hath, Bosman, Chretien, V
Livie	Mmes. Higlon, Flahant,

The mise-en-scène of "Les Barbares," as I have alr said, is very elaborate and complicated. It require certain scenes a number of cattle, for which special hearsals" have been held. The chariots of war are d by superb oxen and not pasteboard animals manufac by the property master; war horses managed by the baric chiefs and fawns, lambs, &c., are also requir propitiatory sacrifices to the tutelary deities of Orang would be very unjust to speak of a work before its pr ion, but sometimes one wonders if all this pomp and ageant of modern opera does not conceal a paucity of dea, as elaboration of treatment may sometimes hide a ery weak melody and poor bass.

As the symphonic prelude to "Les Barbares" lasts a uarter of an hour, and as Saint-Saëns seems to have writ- n this introduction with a view to its ultimately forming part of future concert programs, the doors of the Opéra ill be closed as soon as the performance commences, a easure which cannot fail to delight a number of music overs. The dress rehearsal of this work is fixed for Oc- ber 21 and the first performance two days later.

A somewhat large tempest in matters theatrical has isen the last few days at the Comédie-Française, which as resulted in some radical changes in that Government stitution. At this subventioned theatre exists what is nown as the "reading committee." That is, a committee f five members of the company, whose duty it is to read l new plays, decide upon their merits and with co- peration accept or refuse them. Hence arises the ever- curring question: Is a good actor necessarily a good dge of a play? The serious mistakes made by the read- g committee for some time past would argue not, at l events so far as the Comédie-Française at present is ncerned. Plays have been recently accepted for pro- uction which after being put into rehearsal and an- unced for performance have been found to be so de- id of merit as to compel their withdrawal at the last oment. Other works again have been refused which e managers of other important theatres, such as the déon, Gymnase, &c., have willingly accepted and pro- ced with, in some cases, a successful run of a hun- ed nights. Among other rights possessed by this com- ittee is that of accepting a work by an author for cor- ction. An author, like a painter, conceives his work as complete whole, and if it is subjected to the mutilations d changes of half a dozen other people it is no longer s work at all.

Several bad mistakes recently made by this reading mmittee have resulted in such an outcry in the best ris journals that its abolishment has been loudly called , and with such success that as soon as the necessary rmalities can be complied with it will cease to exist. e director of the Théâtre Français will then have the ht to refuse or accept new works and be responsible the Minister of Fine Arts for the judgment he shows the discharge of his office. A piece called "Chérubin," Francis de Croisset, had been accepted at the Comédie d the roles distributed. But after many alterations, ts and changes of cast the work was found to be so weak t it was never produced. Another play called "Le i," by Schéfer, was condensed from five acts to three, name altered twice and then the original title decided . The dénoumcnt was entirely changed at the request Le Bargy, who was entrusted with the production of work, and so many alterations made that the poor hor, like the proverbial worm, at last turned, with results spoken of above. It is believed a better state things will ensue. The Figaro publishes the replies of ny dramatic authors to its question as to the usefulness the Comédie-Française as an institution. These re- es are all conceived in a serious vein, as befits the im- tance of the subject. One only—Albin Valabiègne—ays" the situation in these terms: "As they have never epted any piece of mine at the Comédie-Française I sider it a perfectly useless institution."

As I mentioned last week, now is the period of débuts the Opéra and Opéra Comique. How many aspirants lyric fame—and fortune—are anxiously awaiting the dict of the public—that jury from whose final decision re is no appeal! Certainly one of the most interesting and successful first appearances made in Paris for some time was that of Mlle. Nerville at the Opéra Comique as Lakmé. This young singer (Miss Chapman), to whom the good fairies have been most gencrous in their gifts—physical and vocal—is of Irish birth and parentage. Possessed of a good natural voice, of excellent quality and remarkable compass, and vocalizing neatly and fluently, Mlle. Nerville has all the attributes necessary for the very successful embodiment of the first roles in such operas as "Lakmé," "Manon," &c., in which her talent will naturally have to be employed during her engagement at the Opéra Comique. As the voice, however, has more warmth and breadth than is usually possessed by light sopranos, qualities which will certainly develop with time, the singer being very young. Mlle. Nerville will be warranted later on in attempting with undoubted success the florid roles of grand opera. In appearance Mlle. Nerville is tall and fair, with a very mobile, expressive face, and one of those well shaped, finely molded throats from which one expects instinctively a beautiful voice to issue. The very excellent impression made by the young artist on her début was fully confirmed on her second appearance in the same role.

Miss Della Rogers, the American opera singer, is engaged for the theatre of Elberfeldt. I am told she met with good success as Senta in "The Flying Dutchman," in the duet of which she showed great dramatic power.

Van Dyck, the tenor, has signed his contract with Artot & Schultz for the performances of "Die Götterdämmerung," to be given here next spring. Alfred Artot who plays Wagner's scores on the piano in a masterly fashion, is at present at Berlaer Hof, with the tenor, who is studying Siegfried before leaving to fulfill his engagement in the States.

Jean de Reszké is also working away at the other Siegfried at his estate in Poland, and it is understood that the production of this work at the Grand Opéra will be of a special character.

I notice that Mancinelli wil not occupy the conductor's chair at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, this season. As he has many friends in the United States, they may be interested in learning that he is engaged as first conductor for the season of Italian opera at the Theatre Royal, Lisbon, where the director, Pacini, will produce "Les Barbares."

DE VALMOUR.

Francis Rogers.

FRANCIS ROGERS, the baritone, was a close friend of the late Ethelbert Nevin, who wrote the famous song, "The Rosary," for him, and who chose him on many occasions to interpret at his public concerts the songs he had written for male voice. Mr. Rogers has in his possession the following letter written to him by Mr. Nevin from his home at Sewickley, Pa., December 5, 1898.

MY DEAR ROGERS—You can have no idea of the pleasure I have had in hearing such good things about your singing, and from musicians. I knew you could not help but have a success when I heard you sing in Italy and Paris, and particularly was I delighted when you sang my songs in concert work last season in the United States. Surely no composer could have had a better interpreter, and naturally a "maker of tunes" is grateful.

I trust we shall have you here this season, as Pittsburg is still thinking of you. With hearty greetings, Faithfully yours,

ETHELBERT NEVIN.

Mr. Rogers sings at Tuxedo November 9. On November 19 he is to give a public recital in Milwaukee and early in December will give recitals at Mendelssohn Hall, New York, and Steinert Hall, Boston. He is to appear as soloist during the winter at one of the Friday afternoon concerts at the Peabody Conservatory, Baltimore.

FERDINAND CARRI'S RECITALS.—Ferdinand Carri, of the New York Institute for Violin Playing and School for Piano and Vocal Culture, announces that he will this season gave a series of violin recitals in Knabe Hall. He purposes to revive a number of classic works by Corelli, Nardini, Paganini, Locatelli, Verancini, Le Clair, Bach, Ries, Vieuxtemps and Wieniawski—works which are seldom heard nowadays.

These recitals promise to be of great interest to the violinists of New York, for they will serve an educational purpose. The first recital will take place Thursday, November 12, when the following program will be given:

Sonata ..... Le Clair
The Language of Flowers ..... Carri
Canzonetta ..... Godard
Larghetto ..... Nardini
Le Labyrinthe de l'Harmonie ..... Locatelli
Concerto No. 1 (cadenza by Ferdinand Carri) ..... Paganini
Air on the G String ..... Bach-Wilhelmj
Dance of the Elfs (etude in thirds) ..... Carri
Menuetto ..... Veracini
Legende ..... Bohm
God Save the King ..... Paganini

HAMLIN AT YALE'S BI-CENTENNIAL.—George Hamlin sang with great success before a distinguished audience in New Haven on October 22, the occasion being the production of Horatio W. Parker's great oratorio, "Hora Novissima," at the bi-centennial celebration of Yale University. The New Haven Palladium, after giving a list of several distinguished guests who were in attendance, included in which were the names of Bishop Potter, Chauncey Depew, Samuel Clemens ("Mark Twain"), Donald G. Mitchell ("Ik Marvel"), &c., spoke of Mr. Hamlin as follows: "Mr. Hamlin's tenor was a surprise and a revelation. He sang gloriously, and fairly electrified the audience." The New Haven Journal and Courier said: "Tenors are indeed scarce who can with success sing the role assigned. George Hamlin has appeared here before, but never with quite so marked success. He stands alone when power and at the same time brilliancy of tone are demanded. His closing climax was remarkable."

LILLIE D'ANGELO BERGH.—Many professional singers have already booked for special study with Lillie d'Angelo Bergh this season, among them several favorites of the Broadway theatres, who are taking that part of the professional course which is of special advantage for the speaking voice. The synthetic course for singers and teachers includes training for oratorio, concert and full stage preparation for opera. Competition classes for full and partial scholarships are now being formed. Those interested should register at once. Reception hours, 9 to 11; sight reading classes, Saturday mornings at 10. Pupils booked for the vocal course for the season are entitled to all the classes free of charge. The d'Angelo Bergh School of Singing is at "The Albany," Broadway and Fifty-second street.

GEORG KRÜGER

And Some of His Pupils.

THE cover of this issue presents a picture of Georg Krüger, the well-known teacher and composer, of Cincinnati, and some of his pupils. Mr. Krüger is one of the foremost teachers in the country, and the following will be read with interest:

Georg Krüger is a native of Lübeck, in North Germany, and is a man of liberal education, having graduated at the Catharineum of Lübeck.

Mr. Krüger's first lessons on the piano were secured from the court capellmeister of Prince Sondershausen, Gottfried Herrmann. Later he continued his studies under Prof. Hermann Genss, honorary member of the University of Bologna.

Having reached the High School of Music at Berlin, his studies took a wider range. In piano he had instruction from the court pianist to the German Emperor, Prof. Heinrich Barth; in composition, from Prof. Waldemar Bargiel.

At the Austrian capital Mr. Krüger further pursued the study of the piano, under the Russian master, Theodor Leschetizky. Leschetizky, whose marvelous pupils, Essipoff and Paderewski, have carried his renown throughout the world, is famous for the romantic emotional fervor of his style, as is Barth for classic solidity and masculine firmness of his interpretations, so that Mr. Krüger has received the benefit of a well-rounded pianistic training.

Mr. Krüger appeared frequently in concerts at Berlin, and afterward made an important concert tour through Russia, where he was received with the highest favor; later also in Germany and Sweden, receiving everywhere the noblest encomiums of the art critics in the leading cities of Europe.

While en tour Mr. Krüger was received in the most exclusive circles of society, as is evidenced by letters from various diplomatic representatives of the United States resident abroad, as well as from the great court preacher, Dr. Emil Frommel, chaplain to Emperor William, and bore away with him distinguished marks of favors from persons of rank, learning and skill.

Mr. Krüger for several years past has been one of the most valued members of the piano faculty of the Cincinnati Conservatory of Music. He has had most exceptional success with his pupils. As a virtuoso pianist he takes conspicuous rank among the musicians of the present day. His brilliant and impassioned playing is certain to make his recitals events of moment in every community which he may visit.

The following are some of Mr. Krüger's press notices:

The pianist Krüger has taken rank among the greatest celebrities of our epoch. He gave us yesterday a delightful recital. If ever an artist deserved the name of virtuoso it is he. The piano has no more secrets for him. He has passed all his artist's life in communion with the great masters Schumann, Chopin, Liszt, Schubert, Rubinstein, &c. But we owe to him the pleasure of having heard yesterday a delightful composition of Leschetizky, a composer of the first rank, of whom he is the pupil and whose work he has undertaken to popularize. The romance, "Consolation," one of the best inspirations of this master, produced a brilliant effect upon the audience, which entirely filled the hall. It is useless to sing the praises of Mr. Krüger's execution. What pianist of the present time is not capable of overcoming all technical difficulties with ease and facility? To-day it is the A B C of the profession. Artistic sentiment dominates the virtuoso we have just heard. There is nothing more interesting than Mr. Krüger's performance of a melody of Chopin beside a long inspiration of Beethoven or Liszt. We hope that it is not the last time we shall have an opportunity of applauding Mr. Krüger. He resides at Cincinnati and from that city to New Orleans is but a step.—L'Abeille de la Nouvelle-Orleans, New Orleans paper.

Georg Krüger, the renowned pianist, played Wednesday before a crowded house. He appeared under the auspices of the Lyceum Bureau, and played in the University Pavilion. Each selection was greeted with stormy applause, and Mr. Krüger convinced his audience that he is an undisputed master of the piano. He plays with great ease and unaffectedness, and his renditions seem to be the outbreathings of a soul in love with his art. Magnetism, temperament, finish and rare interpretative skill marked the playing of each number.—The Evening Truth, Baton Rouge, La., February 23, 1900.

Mr. Krüger held them to their seats until the last note had died away. It was pure and full enjoyment that the audience imbibed, for the tones dropped like pearls from the hands of the master and were strung together in a chain of glory for the artist.

Our German countryman may be measured by the highest criterion, for he need not fear criticism, but may rather challenge the same. Mr. Krüger, in respect of brilliant technic and fine characterization, towers a veritable giant among the host of pianists; he takes position on the commanding bridge and one may only determine the degree of rank which belongs to him.—New Orleanser Deutsche Zeitung.

Mr. Van Cleve writes: "Mr. Krüger has proved himself a masterly teacher of the piano. He possesses some magnetic charm by which he can extract music from minds but poorly endowed with the divine fire. In a country like America, where there are people of such infinite variety, where there are so many thousands who plant a big rose bush of ambition in a small flower pot of talent, a man who can put the most nourishing soil into the small receptacle is of incalculable value as an educator. Mr. Krüger is such a man, and any earnest student, whether by nature richly or meagrely endowed, will, under his training, attain creditable proficiency."

Mr. Krüger played at the North German Exposition, before over 5,000 people, with the orchestra of the noted Conductor Anderson, and the press passed the following encomiums:

Mr. Krüger's art showed itself again as a purely balanced one, carried with excellent understanding and supported by splendid technical resources, for which the term virtuosity is hardly adapted. He has too much of an artistic soul for that. The spontaneous and hearty applause showed how powerfully Mr. Krüger had impressed the hearts of the hearers by his masterly playing, and he was induced to extend his program.—Lübeckischer Anzeiger, Lübeck.

Besides this, he was chosen soloist for the Symphony concerts under Frank Van der Stucken in Cincinnati, and played the Bach Concerto in D minor. It is a fact—although this was a strictly classical composition—that it attracted a larger audience than any of the Symphony concerts of the season. This certainly speaks of itself, for the popularity and recognition of Mr. Krüger as an artist of the first rank.

The critic of the Times-Democrat, New Orleans, calls him a poet among pianists, and continues with the following:

He is an artist of the first rank, and his performance is made unique and beautiful by his simple and unaffected style of playing. His chief aim seems to be to give pleasure to his audience in the noblest sense of the word. When he touches the keys one forgets the piano and listens to a poem in music. To criticise such an artistic performance as Mr. Krüger gives is almost a vain effort. Each selection is so masterfully rendered that it seems better than the last.

Mr. Krüger played Bach and Beethoven in a masterly, skillful and expressive manner. His touch is melodious and powerful, and his conception manly.—Professor Bussler, in National Zeitung, Berlin.

Mrs. Georg Krüger.

Mrs. Georg Krüger, née Elizabeth Daniels, is a graduate of the Cincinnati Conservatory of Music, and one of the brightest and most promising pupils Mr. Krüger ever had in his class. Kindred spirits in artistic sense and inclination they developed the gentler feelings of love for each other, which resulted in their marriage last season. Mrs. Krüger has a fine, clean technic, and her playing is endowed with unusual intelligence. The following encomiums speak for themselves:

At the close of the program Miss Elizabeth Daniels, another of this city's most talented pianists, and who also gives promise of a brilliant future, played the Hungarian Fantaisie, by Liszt. Miss Daniels' execution was regarded as extremely fine, and the ease with which she mastered the most difficult parts of the Fantaisie showed her to be possessed of unusual skill.—Evansville Journal, Evansville, Ind.

Miss Daniels, who received a double welcome, that of an artist and that of a friend, displayed a rapidly matured talent, of which her playing of a year or so ago at the Friets recital gave promising evidence. Her technic is deliberate and exact, and her melody magnetic, and her touch and interpretation roseate and inspiring. What more can be said? Her solo, the most distinctive and certainly to the audience the most personally interesting on the program, lacked none of the taste exhibited by Mr. Krüger, of whom, as far as music is concerned, she is a devoted disciple.—Evansville Courier, Evansville, Ind.

Miss Elizabeth Daniels played the Hungarian Fantaisie, by Liszt, at the German Literary Club in an exquisite manner. She knew how to put much fire and character into this composition, and held the audience spellbound until the last note died away and received enthusiastic applause.—German Volksblatt, Cincinnati.

Miss Elizabeth Daniels was heard last evening at the Conservatory of Music in a taxing program, and the manner in which she played it gave assurance that she is well rounded out and much matured. She has left the pupils' class behind her and is reaching out for art in her ideals. She played the Mendelssohn A minor Concerto with grasp and intelligence, and a clear, well poised technic. Her solo numbers were difficult, but well played. They embraced the Wagner-Liszt transcription of the "Evening Star," the Schubert-Liszt transcription of "Hark, Hark, the Lark!" Leschetizky's "Roman Consolation" and the Chopin Etude, op. 10, No. 7. The poetic si was much in evidence in the "Tannhäuser" Romance. The Hu garian Fantaisie of Liszt is tremendously difficult, but she gave a clean, terse reading. Both in the Mendelssohn Concerto and t Hungarian Fantaisie Mr. Krüger supplied the orchestral acco paniments.—Commercial Tribune, Cincinnati.

Miss Elizabeth Daniels played the Mendelssohn Concerto in minor last evening in Scottish Rite Hall. Of the three movemen Miss Daniels put the greatest grace, sentiment and execution i the andante. The sustained melodies rang out beautifully, and rapid passages in the third movement were clearly played. She v recalled four times and made a great impression on the audience Cincinnati Enquirer.

Bessie Taylor Mellor.

Bessie Taylor Mellor developed musical talent at a ve early age. It seemed to be the only thing she ever liv for—the cultivation of the art divine. She placed hers under the training of Georg Krüger at the Conservato of Music, of whom she became a most devoted and assiduous pupil. A little more than a year ago she graduat with high honors at the conservatory, and since that ti has frequently appeared with ever increasing success public recitals. She also has a very large class of pup A few criticisms will suffice:

Miss Bessie Taylor Mellor in the first movement from Moza Concerto, C major, corroborated all the impressions already rende about her playing. Her execution was remarkably clear, her t was strong and her intelligence of a decided character.—Cincin Enquirer.

Mr. Krüger pays equal attention to the compositions of the n ern and classic school, acquainting his pupils with a wide ra of subjects. His most talented pupil, who has just passed fift is Miss Bessie Taylor Mellor. She played Heller's transcriptio Schubert's "Forelle" with marvelous clearness and maturity. combination of strength and delicacy in her playing is notewor and she succeeds in bringing out the melody with repose and art control.—Cincinnati Enquirer.

Miss Bessie Mellor may be ranked among the very talented Her reading of Hartmann's "Novelletten" showed musical bent development. Emphasis and contrast were well placed, and e thing was in a precise mold.—Cincinnati Commercial Tribune.

Most striking of all was the talent of Miss Bessie Taylor Me who played Weber's "Invitation to the Dance" with force, char and brilliancy.—Cincinnati Enquirer.

Miss Mellor's taste was an exacting one, especially in the Ch Concerto. She has broadened intellectually, and her playing evidence of finish and maturity. Like all of Mr. Krüger's p she has a vibrating, vigorous touch, and the singing quality is brought out. The Chopin Concerto is a difficult undertaking, she is to be congratulated upon having accomplished so much it. Rhythmic clearness and good contrasts were not wanting. the Weber-Liszt "Invitation to the Dance" she imparted con able grace and a degree of brilliancy. Much character was pressed in the "Spinning Song," from "The Flying Dutchm (Wagner-Liszt). Miss Mellor is conscientious and has a sen the artistic.—Cincinnati Enquirer.

eans so much in the building up of true success. For everal years she studied under Georg Krüger of the iculty, to whose instruction she owes much of her clean chnic, singing tone and what is generally known among ll Krügerites as the Leschetizky touch. She graduated nder Mr. Krüger with distinction and, continuing a ost-graduate course, established a successful studio of er own, having a very large class of pupils to teach at er home in Fairfax avenue, East Walnut Hills. This ass is constantly growing.

Recently Miss Ulmer played at the first concert of the incinnati Quintet in Smith & Nixon Hall, giving Mendelssohn's Concerto No. 1, G minor, assisted by Mr. rüger. The Enquirer critic wrote: "Miss Ulmer's rendiion was faultless and artistically interpreted. The 'Faust' alse from Gounod, arranged by Liszt, was beautifully ven."

A criticism of her earlier work is as follows:

Miss Ida B. Ulmer, an advanced pupil of George Krüger, of the nservatory of Music, gave an enjoyable piano recital at that instiion last night. Miss Ulmer's playing was not a simple exhibition technic, nor yet apparently the outgrowth of any particularly selfopted style; there was evidently originality coupled with artistic iception that comes only from scholarly application under conentious training.

he first number, Mendelssohn's Concerto, No. 1, in G minor, op. was given with a careful regard for the difficult and different thms. The orchestral part of the Mendelssohn Concerto, as well the last, by Schumann, was played by Mr. Krüger on a second no.

n all her work of the evening Miss Ulmer showed an intelligent iception; her reading was intelligent, masterly and entirely iseworthy.

Jennie Moore.

ennie Moore, pianist, is one of those painstaking, conentious musicians who are bound to succeed by force of aracter and will. At an early age she developed a taste musical art and was fond of attending the best she uld hear in music at concerts and recitals. As she grew er this taste declared itself in a more positive way, and sought the instruction of the best teachers. Un- Mr. Krüger's training she has made remarkable progs, not only from a technical standpoint, but from the peramental side as well. From him she has acquired much rness of expression and that singing tone which is deoped in all of Mr. Krüger's pupils. At the last June certs in the Scottish Rite Hall she scored a very decided cess. The intelligence back of her playing is never in bt. Miss Moore has a very attractive personality and e presence, and this lends another charm to her play- She is preparing herself for a concert career, for ch her talent fits her, and in which she is already ting with success. Under Mr. Krüger's direction her stic future seems well assured.

Marie Ross.

arie Ross, another pupil of Georg Krüger, is maturing a pianist of marked ability. She is an intelligent and pathetic performer. She recently played in Chillicothe marked success. The following notices of her work speak for themselves:

grand concert given Wednesday evening at the Masonic Opera e attracted a large and representative audience of music lovers, e high anticipations were fully realized, for it proved to be an tionally delightful musical entertainment. * * * Miss Marie whose charming personality combines with her rare musical y to make her a favorite wherever heard, was the pianist. Her ig is characterized by a hrilliancy of technic and delicacy of . The legato parts were beautifully rendered and her selections interpreted with fine musical discrimination. Her accompani- were sympathetically rendered.—Chillicothe News-Advertiser, er 10, 1901.

of the artists was Miss Marie Ross, whose expression and retation on the piano were fine. Miss Ross is young yet and l, with the force that comes with age, make a hrilliant player. egato movements last night were exceptionally good. Miss gave Godard's Second Mazurka, Schumann's "Romanze," Schütt's "Etude Mignon" and Schubert-Liszt's "Sei Mir Gegrüsst."—(Chillicothe, Ohio) Daily Scioto Gazette, October 10, 1901.

Julia Anderson.

Julia Anderson is one of the brightest and at the same time one of the most serious of Mr. Krüger's pupils. She is a resident of Sidney (Ohio), where her art influence is felt far beyond the local limits. A few public encomiums will suffice:

Miss Julia Anderson is quite talented and showed considerable temperament in her playing of two nocturnes by Kirchner.—Cincinnati Enquirer, June 24, 1898.

Miss Julia Anderson is a young woman with a dignified appreciation of technical requirements. She plays with a vigor and intensity that will one day win her professional laurels.—Cincinnati Commercial Tribune, June 24, 1898.

Miss Julia Anderson gave a brilliant, well accentuated reading of the Rhapsodie Hongroise, No. 2, of Liszt.—Cincinnati Enquirer, June, 1901.

Miss Julia Anderson's brilliant rendition of Chopin's Impromptu in A flat showed her to be an artist. She was heartily encored and responded with a number equally as well given.

Cosby Dansby.

Miss Cosby Dansby is a gifted pupil of Georg Krüger. She studied with only one teacher other than Mr. Krüger—her sister, Miss Hallie Dansby, who herself is a graduate of the Cincinnati Conservatory of Music from Mr. Krüger's class, and who is at present directress of the Terrell School of Fine Arts, at Terrell, Tex.

Miss Dansby came as a graduate of this school to Mr. Krüger, and is continuing her studies under him with the most flattering prospects of success and a future career. She comes of a very musical family, and anticipates fitting herself for concert work, for which her natural gifts seem to have endowed her.

Mazie Homan.

Mazie Homan is marvelously gifted and is generally considered a prodigy. When she was not yet nine years old she composed an etude of classic conception. Her faculty of invention has been expanding ever since. She has a repertory embracing the most difficult works of Beethoven, Chopin, Mozart, &c., which she plays from memory. She will play at this recital two of her own compositions—one of these a funeral march. "In Memoriam, William McKinley." Miss Homan, who had her fifteenth birthday last June, is a child of the Conservatory of Music, and a pupil of Georg Krüger. Her playing from memory of the difficult movement from the Beethoven Concerto in C minor, with the Liszt cadenza, at a recital last June was regarded in the nature of an achievement. Said one of the critical musicians in the audience:

I noticed that there was color and expression—a nuance in every phrase. The staccato in the left and legato in the right she played beautifully. I was astonished at the great tone she produced in the cadenza, which she played with positive fire. Yet her delicacy of touch is the best part of her playing. Surely she played with a maturity far beyond her years. I do not believe in wonder children—but Mazie is a prodigy, and the world may yet hear of her.

Mazie Homan is extraordinarily gifted, pianistically.—Frank Van der Stucken.

I have had many talented pupils, but did not hear one with so much abandon.—Albino Gorno.

J. A. Homan.

Bacheller Popular.—Willis E. Bacheller is very popular as a teacher at the College of Music and a Musical Courier representative recently saw a letter to Director Alexander Lambert from Miss Mabel Gerry, daughter of Commodore Gerry, in which she expresses the hope that she may be able to sing at a College of Music concert this season, and pays high tribute to Mr. Bacheller as her teacher.

YALE BI-CENTENNIAL.

New Haven, Conn., October 24, 1901.

THE two hundredth anniversary of the founding of Yale College was gloriously celebrated here this week. Delegates from all quarters of the globe were present and many while here had degrees conferred upon them. Among this number was President Roosevelt.

Music dominated all the festivities and it is to this particular feature that I shall devote my time.

The first event of importance was an organ recital by Harry B. Jepson Sunday evening at Battell Chapel. Mr. Jepson is assistant professor in the University School of Music and his playing is always an attraction. He performed a Scherzo by Enrico Bossi, which proved to be a novelty in construction, and in the andante movement of the Elgar Sonata he displayed some strong technic, as well as virtuosity, with the difficult registration. The Widor Fifth Organ Symphony, which was remarkably well played, concluded the program.

A very remarkable performance of Horatio Parker's "Hora Novissima" was given by the Gounod Society before an audience which literally packed the Hyperion to its utmost limits. The gathering was a most distinguished one, the body of the house having been filled by the numerous guests from various parts of the world. Professor Parker, who returned from Munich especially to conduct the work, received an ovation.

The singing of the chorus was fine and much in advance of that of last spring, when this work was given its first rendition in this city. The New Haven Symphony Orchestra played the score and did it well.

The soloists were all favorites here. Ericsson Bushnell sang the opening aria in large, noble style, with fine tone delivery. His light and shade effects were nicely contrasted. The audience was very demonstrative when he finished.

Shanna Cumming possesses just the voice for this work, being adequate at all times. Her tone is powerful under climax and truly sweet and sympathetic in the lighter passages. She is an artist with it all.

There are few tenors indeed with the free, open delivery of tone displayed by George Hamlin, to whom the important tenor role was assigned. His former success was certainly eclipsed by his temperamental and artistic interpretation this time. He stands alone when a great dramatic climax is demanded.

The Gounod Society has in times past achieved much, but never quite so marked a success as with this excellent work of one of New Haven's townsmen.

Tuesday night was turned over to the students for their dramatic performance, which consisted of a series of tableaux depicting college life from its earliest days to the present time. The great feature of the entertainment was the singing of a chorus of students, numbering upward of a thousand. They were conducted and had been drilled by Yale's popular professor of applied music, Samuel S. Sanford. The boys sang with a vim to do the heart good, and only as students can.

The central function, the commemoration exercises, Wednesday morning, brought together an aggregation of great men, the equal of which has probably never been witnessed in America. Degrees were conferred on some fifty or more, among the number being President Roosevelt, Secretary John Hay, Ambassador Joseph H. Choate, Chief Justice Fuller, Archbishop Ireland, Marquis Ito, Mark Twain, Seth Low and Rear Admiral Sampson, all of whom received ovations.

A Greek Festival Hymn, by Thomas Dwight Goodell, the music to which was composed by Horatio Parker, was the musical feature of the occasion, and was conducted by the author. It was its initial performance.

The choruses are for men's voices, and were by no means the minor part of the production. The last chorus was sung with great spirit and majesty, and was accorded, together with its honored conductor, Professor Parker, a genuine ovation. At this point President Roosevelt turned and congratulated the latter.

The opening bass aria was taken by Dr. Carl Dufft, of the Marble Collegiate Church, New York. His voice is one of the finest of the kind heard here for some considerable time. His work is that of a sincere artist. The Greek language is not particularly adapted to the freest delivery of tone, but this seemed to interfere but little with the singer, for his tonal effects in climax were superb, while the lighter passages were full of exquisite coloring.

Wallace Moyle, a local singer, sang the tenor role, which he did with rare intelligence and finish, achieving a flattering success.

One of the musical treats it has been our good fortune to enjoy, was the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Hyperion, Wednesday afternoon. The participation of this orchestra in the bicentennial exercises was due to the generosity of Henry Lee Higginson, of Boston.

William Gericke, its conductor, possesses good control over his men. The violins play as one man. Particularly was this noticeable in the staccato and pizzicato motives in the presto movement of the Beethoven Symphony.

The soloist was Milka Ternina. In the aria from "Fidelio" she displayed a large, brilliant soprano voice of the grand opera type; but it was not until in the prayer from "Tannhäuser" that the true soul of the artist was fully revealed.

Morris Steinert's valuable collection of old musical instruments was one of the exhibits which was largely visited.

ERZOHLER.

MACONDA'S TOUR.

MME. CHARLOTTE MACONDA, the brilliant young coloratura soprano, whose season began with a series of music festivals in New England—her third consecutive engagement with the associations—leaves almost immediately for a transcontinental tour in song recital and concert.

Manager Loudon G. Charlton announces that except for a couple of Texas dates en route, Madame Maconda will go direct to Southern California for recitals November 13, 14 and 16. On the 15th she will be the soloist with the Los Angeles Symphony Orchestra. November 18 Madame Maconda is engaged to sing with a prominent San Francisco club. The 19th, 20th and 21st she will give recitals in San José, Oakland and Sacramento, Cal. Her other Coast bookings so far are Salem, Ore., November 23; Portland, 25th; Tacoma, Wash., 26th; Seattle, Wash., 27th; Vancouver, B. C., 28th; Walla Walla, 30th; Spokane, December 2, and her return journey, including recitals at Denver and other Colorado points, will terminate in time for her to sing with the Apollo Club, Brooklyn, December 10.

Madame Maconda's unusual versatility, which enables her to sing with equal ease and artistic excellence a dramatic aria, a florid bit or a simple ballad, together with a most attractive appearance and personality, have won for her deserved pre-eminence in Eastern musical circles, and she will doubtless add to her fame and popularity in this, her first recital tour in the Far West.

MAXSON PUPILS' ORGAN RECITAL.—At the Central Congregational Church of Philadelphia, Pa., on Tuesday evening, Mr. Maxson presented a number of advanced organ pupils in "An Hour of Organ Music," assisted by Katherine L. Tegmeier, soprano. Those who played were Lawrence Gaff, of Germantown; James C. Warhurst, of Camden; Ralph H. Leopold, William P. Twaddell, of West Philadelphia; Frank N. Oglesby, of Germantown, and Miss Emily M. Cadmus, of Philadelphia. They are all organists of prominence in the cities about the Quaker City, and played works by Guilmant, Dubois, Lemmens, Delbruck, Mendelssohn, Buck, Fink and Parker.

October 17 Mr. Maxson opened the new organ in Richmond Presbyterian Church, Port Richmond, and will next month open the organ at the Presbyterian Church of the Evangel.

EDITH M. DAVIS A HALL PUPIL.—The solo contralto of the Brick Presbyterian Church recently sang Franz's "Im Herbst"; "Dein," by Bohm, and "Salve Regina," by Buck, and in all these made a mighty impression by reason of fine voice, skilful handling of the same, and musical temperament.

Her great range, enabling her to sing the high G flat in the Franz song, followed at once by the low B flat, was one of the unusual features of her singing. Small wonder that when the entire personnel of this choir was changed she was the only one retained. Walter John Hall is making for himself an eminent name as teacher of many of our prominent singers.

EDUARD ZELDENRUST.

"SACRED moment," said Eduard Zeldenrust, with a sunny smile of intense satisfaction, "in which I at last set foot upon American soil and realize that, after ten years of impatient anticipation, I am really, actually, in New York," and he drew from his pocket a diminutive silken American flag and waved it triumphantly over his head.

There is a romantic story about that little flag, but the telling must be reserved for another time.

It was Sunday night, about 8 o'clock, that the ship Potsdam steamed up to her pier in Hoboken. Her passengers, after passing through the ordeal of custom house inspection, wended their way to the Christopher Street Ferry, and crossed the river to this side—and none among them was more jubilant at being once more on shore, nor more interested in every detail of what was going on about him, than the celebrated Dutch pianist, Zeldenrust. His first expressed desire was to be shown a "skyscraper," and as the outline of the buildings on the New York side became more distinct as the ferry neared the dock, his curiosity was amply satisfied and his amazement duly acknowledged.

Something over thirty years old, not above medium height, sturdily built, with an intellectual yet sensitive face, good, clear cut features, expressive gray eyes, a broad, high forehead crowned by dark wavy hair, a firm chin, determined mouth only partially concealed by a brown moustache, and hands which at once express strength and artistic possibilities—such, in brief, is the impression created by a cursory glance at Holland's foremost piano virtuoso, who comes to America now for the first time to make an extended concert and recital tournée.

This first impression is deepened to conviction by further acquaintance. Zeldenrust is eminently sane and normal in appearance, manner and bearing—absolutely without affectation or pretense of any sort. A ready and interesting talker in several languages, including English, on any and every subject, showing a vigorous and broadly cultured mentality, and a catholicity of interest that is as delightful as it is unusual in an artist. Evidently a sound and scholarly musician, and what is quite as rare and good to find, a gentleman in the best sense of the term.

His first remark as he emerged from the throng on the Hoboken dock was an enthusiastic expression of his delight at the beauties of the harbor and bay, the effects made by the myriads of lights on the shores and the innumerable water craft. His next was a eulogy for the customs officials, whose courteous and respectful treatment of him and his belongings was so very different from what he had feared from reading accounts of what others had suffered at their hands.

Regarding his voyage across the ocean Zeldenrust had only pleasant words except for the first two days out from Rotterdam, which were "shocking" as to weather; and the lateness of the hour of arrival here was explained by the fact that the ship had encountered persistent head winds during the entire ten days.

Asked the reason that he had never visited America before, and what had so keenly aroused his interest in this country, Zeldenrust explained that only continuous European engagements, season after season, had prevented him coming sooner; but that for the past decade he had read voraciously everything pertaining to this great and wonderful country—its customs, conditions and its people. Of the last he had met many abroad, in England, France, Italy and elsewhere on the Continent, even to his own land of dykes and windmills, Holland.

From all the acquaintances and friends thus made he had heard much of their native land, had received from them not only cordial assurances of their desire to have him visit them at home, but letters of introduction to other friends who would be both valuable and interesting for him to meet and know.

With the express desire and intention to become acclimated, to see something of New York and other Eastern cities, and to meet old and new friends in each before his tournée commenced, Zeldenrust crossed the ocean nearly a month before his first concert date; but he found on his arrival that, so great has been and is the demand for his appearances, Manager Charlton has filled the intervening time with bookings which will necessitate his going immediately to work on his programs. He will have time neither for sightseeing nor for social enjoyments, and in his apartment at the Gilsey House, where he found a grand piano on his arrival, he started in Monday with his prescribed ten hours of practice each day.

He regrets that the enormous package of letters of introduction which he brought over from Americans abroad to Americans here and hereabouts must be kept as souvenirs only for the present; but with Zeldenrust, as with others, it is business first, and he has relinquished, with a sigh, all thought of meeting people until his season is over, when, before he returns to Holland, he shall be able to enjoy a well earned respite of pleasure.

Temperate in all things—except practice—Zeldenrust smokes but one or two cigars a day, drinks not at all, retires early, rises early and devotes his time wholly to his work. He glories in his profession—says there is no one like it, and that the piano is the most intellectual instrument and the one from which the most satisfying results may be obtained. While he reveres Bach and Beethoven, he is by no means restricted to those composers either in theory and practice, and his studious devotion includes Schumann, Chopin, Liszt, Wagner and Brahms with equal interest and zest.

In his conversation regarding the Americans he has met abroad, he by no means neglects the American girl, upon which subject he waxes most enthusiastic. Bankers, brokers, lawyers, physicians, men in all the important professions and commercial pursuits he has met and knows as well as their wives and their sisters, women who are social leaders there as well as here. Yet it is to the American girl that Zeldenrust pays his most respectful homage, his most chivalrous regard. He says he has met many, he has taught some, and he has yet to see one who is not delightful in her independence of thought and action, her mental strength, her womanly charm, and that is the union of the two, due probably to the difference in their bringing up and education, that makes her so wholly adorable and unlike the girls of the old country. It is perhaps as well to say here, incidentally, that Zeldenrust is a bachelor.

What his pianistic achievements in America shall be remain to be seen. His dearest hope, very frankly expressed, is that he may strike a responsive chord in the audiences on this side of the water with the exposition of his musicianship and his art. That there is every reason to believe he will not be disappointed is apparent from the exalted place he has won and holds among the most exacting critics and music lovers of the Old World where he is regarded as the Dutch Rubinstein, and that Zeldenrust is pre-eminent among men, as well as among artists, is evidenced by the fact that he counts among his close personal friends Josef Israels and H. W. Mesdag, the world renowned Holland painters, and Baron Gevers, the United States Ambassador from the Netherlands, who was his compagnon de voyage in the trip across the ocean.

. Harris has a treatise in preparation on his system ano playing; pending its publication he desires to known something of its principles by the educat- f teachers and training of pianists. A fluent writer, of speech, with logical mind, this man may yet the world the true fundamental principles of pianism.

Carlotte Babcock and Katharine C. Ingersoll have to- r established the "International Musical and Educa- l Exchange," Carnegie Hall, giving as references people: Dudley Buck, Rev. Thomas J. Saturday evening Harriette Brower played the following program at Miss Spence's school on West Fifty-fifth street:

Gavotte	Gluck-Brahms
Theme and Variations	Rameau
Preludes	Chopin
Ecossais	Chopin
Nocturne	Chopin
Etude	Chopin
Valse	Chopin
Humoresque	Dvorák
Tarantelle, Venice and Naples	Liszt

Miss Mary Macnochie, soprano, a member of Mr. Woodman's choir, and a charming young singer, both in personal appearance and voice, assisted. This is the first of a series of Saturday evening entertainments at this school.

Robert Kent Parker recently sang Alward's "Beloved, It Is Morn," and other songs for some people who found his singing most enjoyable. He has an engagement for Holyoke, Mass., for the near future, and sings to-night, Wednesday, at the musicale on the United States battleship Kearsarge. A couple of recent press notices:

A magnificent basso voice, carefully trained and used in a most artistic manner, places Mr. Parker in the front rank of soloists.—Times.

Robert Kent Parker's perfect familiarity with the score made his reading of it a delight to those present. * * * The best work of the evening.—Pittsburg Post.

Another singer who has attained to prominence in a short time is the tenor John Young, a Saenger pupil. He sang at a funeral lately, where certain other prominent singers heard him for the first time, and one of these latter said most flattering things of him to the writer. Young has been engaged for the second time by the Brooklyn Institute, has a prominent uptown church, a synagogue, is busy with concerts, and may well look to the future with equanimity. A recent press notice follows:

"The Lord Looked Down From Heaven" was a tenor solo by Mr. Young. It was sung with a voice and expression that at once stamped the artist as one of the first rank. Every word was as clear and musical as a bell and sung with an ease and grace that could not fail to captivate an audience.—Portchester Journal.

Francis Fischer Powers returns to New York in fine fettle, refreshed after giving lessons to 200 Kansas City pupils, and after establishing the Powers-Genevra Bishop School in Los Angeles, Cal. He had with him Horace H. Kinney and Harry Briggs as assistants, and they were busy all the time. A large number of these Western pupils have arrived, or will arrive, to continue study in the Powers Vocal School. There are some remarkably fine voices among them.

Mr. and Mrs. Walter Robinson, of Carnegie Hall, are quite busy with old pupils, and have enrolled a number of new ones with promising voices. Although comparatively newcomers, their pupils are to be found in various church positions in and near New York.

They, themselves, not only fill prominent church positions, but are in demand on the concert platform, and in this respect also the season promises to be a fruitful one.

On October 8 they made a very successful appearance at a recital in the Twenty-third Street Y. M. C. A. On November 14 they are to sing for the Actors' Church Alliance, and on November 9 Mr. Robinson is engaged for the concert of the Swedish Aid Society of New York, to be given in the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

"Nell Morgan" is the name now on the door of the Joseph Joachim Violin School, following that of Geraldine Morgan. The newcomer is one of the two sisters of Miss Morgan, and has so far lived mainly in the South, where she had charge of the music in a women's college. She, too, is a Joachim pupil, having been some years in the Berlin Hochschule, and comes here to become her sister's first assistant.

Charles Russell, 'cellist, played solos at the last Woman's Press Club musicale, accompanied by Rosetta Wiener. The latter returns from a summer in Europe with a fine library of ensemble music for her special use in teaching the art of accompanying. Heinrich W. Meyn, best known as the tenor of Rutgers Presbyterian Church, assists her.

JEAN GERARDY.

THE season promises much for Gérardy, the 'cellist, and on another page will be found some of his pending engagements. The following is of interest regarding this gifted artist:

Jean Gérardy is a Belgian, born December 7, 1877, in Liege, a city famous as the native place of so many of the world's greatest musicians, including Leonard, Vieuxtemps, the Servais (father and Son), Ysaye, Thomson and numerous others. His father, a celebrated pianist, was master of the Conservatorium of Liege. He had no wish that his son should become a professional musician, but so keen was the boy's love for melody and so manifest were his talents that an old friend of the family insisted that young Jean should be educated in music for his own gratification, if for no more serious reason, and the parent yielded. It was decided that he should learn the 'cello, since there were so few musicians who had won great distinction with that instrument.

So at the age of seven he entered the Conservatorium, and six months later he captured the second prize in competition with young men of twenty and more. It was an unheard of achievement, such a prize at such an age. Bellman, the great 'cellist of the Heckmann Quartet, had never a pupil, but on hearing Gérardy he gladly undertook the instruction of the young prodigy. During the teacher's absence on tour with his quartet, the lessons were continued with another celebrated 'cellist, Massau, master of the Conservatory of Verviers.

Gérardy made his first public appearance in Liege at the age of nine, afterward playing at Spa, Lille, Aix-la-Chapelle and Antwerp, though his graduation did not occur until he was eleven years of age, when he went forth the youngest graduate the Conservatorium ever made. One of his most important engagements then was in conjunction with Paderewski and Ysaye, with whom he performed the Trio of Rubinstein. The very fact that the boy of only eleven years was considered by these great artists worthy to be heard in trios with them was in itself a compliment extraordinary and undoubted homage to genuine worth. The same year he made a tour of England with them, and at the Crystal Palace, upon his first appearance in London, Paderewski, desiring to show his high appreciation of Gérardy's genius, played the piano accompaniment for him, a rare tribute from one great artist to another. He then went to Germany, appearing first with Hans von Bülow, and in the leading cities with orchestral societies. As the first prodigy who ever performed on the 'cello his success was sensational. In Vienna he appeared with Hans Richter, and his famous Philharmonic Orchestra. He was there called the "Sarasate of the 'cello." Afterward, during his European engagements, he made tours with Adelina Patti and Melba, and when in England he was frequently called upon to play before the late Queen Victoria at Windsor, with whom he became a great favorite, and Gérardy treasures some costly gifts bestowed upon him by Her Majesty.

At sixteen he was engaged for a series of fifty concerts in the United States, in company with Stavenhagen, the pianist. In the United States and Canada his success was equally as great as it was in Europe. Three times he has visited Russia and won the highest honors. In Spain he was booked for three concerts with the Philharmonic Society in Madrid. The Queen was present at the opening concert, and a few days later she summoned him to the palace, whither she had especially gathered her court, and with her own hands she attached to the young 'cellist the badge of the Order of Knight of Isabella la Catholiqua, a decoration never bestowed before upon one of his age. In Paris he was again decorated with the Order of an Officer of the Public Instruction, which comes next to that of the Legion of Honor. He was the first 'cellist ever so honored by France. At the age of twenty he again returned to this country, where he was heard at all of the principal orchestral concerts, and later, accompanied by Ysaye, he made a tour of the country. This past season he was here again for a short time on his way to Australia, where last spring he made his début, with the same success that he has won at every previous début in a new country. He was hailed by the critics as the only successor of the great 'cellist Alfred Piatti, who has since died.

In Australia he gave twenty-one concerts, eight of which were in Melbourne. He then visited West Australia, New Zealand, where he was booked for ten concerts, and later Honolulu. This coming season will be Gérardy's third regular visit to this country and his tour will be under the management of Henry Wolfsohn, who has already booked with such prominent organizations as the Boston Symphony Orchestra for five concerts, the Thomas Orchestra in Chicago, the Pittsburg Symphony Orchestra, the Cincinnati Orchestral Association and the St. Louis Choral Symphony. He will also be heard in many recitals with the more prominent private musical clubs, as well as in a number of miscellaneous concerts in the larger cities. His tour will open about the middle of October and he will remain here until late in March or early in April. Gérardy's career is considered the most remarkable one ever experienced by a musical artist of his age. At the age of twenty-three he is recognized as one of the foremost 'cellists in the world. He plays upon one of the best known instruments made by Stradivarius, purchased at a cost of $10,000, the tone of which is only equaled by the mellowest of contralto voices.

GERARDY WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY.

On Friday and Saturday, October 18 and 19, Jean Gérardy was the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall, in Boston. This was Gérardy's first concert of a series that he is to play with this famous organization. On October 31 Gérardy will again be heard with the Boston Orchestra in Cambridge. Last night, the 29th, Gérardy played in Lenox, Mass.

The following are extracts from his Boston criticisms:

Mr. Gérardy, as in the past, did not indulge in sentimentalism or trickery. He is a musician of a musical family. The virtuoso did not stand before the artist; the player was the interpreter. His tone was rich and beautiful. His bowing was free and his left hand did wonderful things. He deserved fully the warm and long-continued applause.—Journal.

Mr. Gérardy played the entire concerto with beautiful tone, pure intonation and exquisite phrasing; the first two movements with as much warmth as the music would allow, the rondo with as much grace and agility as the 'cello will allow.—Transcript.

Yesterday it seemed as if he were a greater artist than ever before; as if he had subdued a youthful enthusiasm and had gained the poise and self-command of a finished artist, with his emotions under admirable control.

Gérardy's breadth and power of tone is as opulent as ever, and in the first part the somewhat pompous themes were given forth in a manner which impressed his auditors with his wonderful skill in producing organ effects on his instrument. He did not sacrifice harmony either; his tone was sweet and true to pitch. His technical dexterity made light of the mechanical difficulties of the 'cello, and his trills, double stopping, cantabile phrases, runs and chord fingerings were about as satisfactory as one could expect to hear, his manipulation of the upper strings producing a quality of tone hardly distinguishable from that of a violin. The third movement was exceedingly brilliant, the intonation in the rapid passages being specially pure, despite the enormous difficulties of the fingering. The performance throughout showed that the promise of his youth was being realized, and that to-day he is one of the masters of his instrument.—Globe.

European Short Notes.

Paderewski started his German tour last Thursday at Dresden.

The Kruse Quartet plays the d'Albert String Quartet, op. [illegible] and the Violin Sonata in E flat, by Richard [illegible] in London to-day.

Mr. Schelling, one of Paderewski's pupils, played in London yesterday. He introduced his own Fantaisie on themes from "Manru."

Hugo Görlitz is at Prague in order to be present at the demonstration by students of the University in honor of Kubelik before he leaves for England and America. He is already engaged for two of the Philharmonic concerts next year.

Emil Sauer will play at the Philharmonic in London on February 27 and will also give two recitals there on March 3 and 5.

De Pachmann gave his first performance in London this season at a popular concert which took place on Saturday last. It was a great success.

MRS. KORN'S COMPOSITIONS.—The piano arrangement of the orchestral suite, "Rural Snapshots," by Clara A. Korn, which was published by Breitkopf & Härtel, is enjoying a remarkably good sale. The suite was again performed by the Kaltenborn Orchestra during the past summer. Other compositions of Mrs. Korn's were performed at the Pan-American Exposition by Mrs. A. Marie Merrick, pianist, and Mme. Abbie Fridenberg, soprano. Madame Fridenberg has also sung at New York musicales Mrs. Korn's "The Miller's Daughter" and "Little Fellow," both of which she did with great depth of feeling and artistic interpretation.

MISS H. THEODORA WIGHT.—Miss H. Theodora Wight will sing two of the "Three Songs from Some Verses," at a Baltimore musicale next week. Mrs. Berenice Thompson is writing some new songs for Miss Wight, who has a deep, rich contralto voice. The songs will be settings of some poems by the Rev. Father Taff.

KINDERGARTEN MUSIC BUILDING.

KINDERGARTEN Music Building is a revelation in regard to child instruction. The child naturally revels in Nature's gifts of color, form and sound. Her voices are harmonious, her form complete in majesty and flooded by the great white light whose components are reflected in her wealth of vari-colored life. To him all connected with her is natural and beautiful, and that which reveals to him through eager eye, hand and ear her wonderful meanings is met by loving acceptance.

The only reason for his instruction is that he may learn to live aright. Here then, in Kindergarten Music Building is the place to teach the child how to learn and live, where he is at home and every task a pleasure. The only way the child can really grow is to grow naturally, and he can grow thus only in his natural environment of color, form and tone. Here he grows with his beautiful life lessons all about him, and needing but the gentle guidance of loving understanding to reveal life's deepest harmonies. He learns by question and answer. Present his own questions as to color, form and sound to him in tangible form, and he himself will answer them truly, and their depth of symbolism be revealed by natural unfoldment until the great ultimate of all is reached and practical life seen enthroned in harmony. The child does not need or desire mental ticklings or hours of frivolous amusement which afford no real instruction, but are frittering away the precious hours in so many kindergartens at present, but pleasing instruction in those things which develop his three-fold nature of the physical, mental and spiritual by the natural exercise of these triple faculties in unison.

This Nina K. Darlington, the founder and originator of Kindergarten Music Building, has ably done by her system, bringing the child in touch in the classroom with what most delights him in nature, the underlying significance of all being naturally brought out through game, song and lesson, singly and in combination, and that which would by other methods be learned only by hours of tedious labor is here spontaneously and thoroughly learned. Let parents realize the significance of this system to the little ones, so filled with love for bird and flower and music and color and all of nature in its spontaneity, and the miserable débris of false theories poisoning the sweet child life will be swept into natural oblivion.

G. P. BONNEY, BOSTON, MASS.

The following is a statement from one of the students of Kindergarten Music Building, who found the value of this system eighteen months ago, and has since proven it ably in her many successful classes:

"A few of the good points in Kindergarten Music Building are, first, the fact that it is developed from searching the interpretation of the truth of harmony, and its aim, which is the highest development of truth. t discerns the relation of the art of music to the scienc of harmony. It discovers the emanation of the man-m e music from the God-made. It treats not only of musi s we know it in this world, but of the harmony of creat n, and endeavors to develop the moral and spiritual lif of the little child, as well as the musical temperament, derstanding and skill. It teaches the fundamental f s of the origin and development of the art of music. M e- over, the child is happy in his work, at the same time l- vancing with a thoroughness and rapidity not equalle n other methods. When the course is completed the c d has a thorough knowledge of the whole piano keybo d, can read music readily in both clefs, understands qual s of tone and how they are produced, understands time rhythm thoroughly, knows the faces and lives of the g composers, is familiar with much of their music, has correct ear training to develop tone perception, is miliar with many songs, has gained physical control is considerably prepared for piano technic; underst the theory and construction of the art of music, is ta to understand and appreciate nature, is given an ap e hension of divine law, and harmony is developed natu l and happily. He has also learned to write music.

CARRIE HIRSCHMANN

An Instantaneous Success at the New England Fest

CARRIE HIRSCHMANN, an American girl, pl herself into the hearts of her audiences at the cent New England Festival and was warmly enc Her work was artistic and thoughtful. Here are s press clippings:

Miss Carrie Hirschmann, the gifted young pianist of New made her first appearance before a Maine audience and sco decided hit. Her selections were intelligently chosen and her formance showed bold and brilliant execution, wonderfully oped technic, strong temperament and marked freedom of Each number was enthusiastically received, especially the Rhapsodie, which was most beautifully played. After several recalls, Miss Hirschmann favored the audience with the cha and dainty "Spring Song" by Mendelssohn. Her future is f brightest promise. To-night she will play, with the orchestra Liszt Concerto, and lovers of artistic piano playing may e something notable.—Bangor News, October 5, 1901.

Miss Carrie Hirschmann, the pianist, was a revelation to all who had not heard her first performance at the festival, an gave new delight to those who know her skill. She playe Liszt Concerto in E flat, with orchestral accompaniment, an performance was wonderful, being characterized by a confi an individuality of style, a deftness of touch and an eloquen expression such as are the gifts only of the first rank artists the audience at the close gave her such evidences of its pl as only great artists have earned.

One is amazed at the earnestness and the energy of this little woman. It would seem that her strength must fail her the last notes of the long and difficult composition have been s but she rose smiling from the piano and readily came back t again. Miss Hirschmann was, indeed, a bright light of this fe —Bangor (Me.) Daily News, October 7, 1901.

It was a rare piece of good fortune the appearance of Miss H mann in substitution for the first orchestral number in pa Miss Hirschmann is new to a festival audience and made he at once to favor by virtue of merit and personality.

That beautiful composition, Liszt's E flat Concerto for the was a gem, exquisitely played and well accompanied by the o tra. In fact, Miss Hirschmann's appearance proved to be th prise and the event of the evening. The piano sang, wep danced under her magnetic touch, and the artist's audience w her in warm response from first to last.

A dainty Chopin dance was given in response to unstint plause and heightened the impression already made. Miss H mann is surely one of the bright lights of the Fifth Maine Fe —Portland (Me.) Evening Express, October 8, 1901.

In the second part of the concert Liszt's E flat Concerto w stituted for the Tschaikowsky Overture down on the progr troducing Miss Carrie Hirschmann for the piano part, with trai accompaniment. In this prodigious piece, which bristle difficulties and taxes conductor, orchestra and soloist to the u the success achieved by all was nothing less than remarkable. Hirschmann is one of the clearest, cleanest players that hav heard in our city. In the most difficult mazes of this concer was clearest and most delightful in touch, of high intellig interpretation, warm and poetic in temperament, and an arti brought her work so roundly and with such finish to the a that the player disappeared behind it. What power of wris what a pearly individualization of every note, and, for a pianist, what masterful presentation of fortissimo effects! Th pathetic conception, the finish of touch and tone, the alternat cacy and storminess of presentation, but, above all, the cl atmosphere and definite expression of the work made this re a memorable thing. All combined, it was one of the notable triumphs of the evening.—Portland (Me.) Eastern Argus, Oct 1901.

A slight change was made in the advertised program last e when Miss Hirschmann, a young pianist, was substituted

Tschaikowsky Overture, "1812." Miss Hirschmann is an earnestly enthusiastic player, and she gave the difficult Liszt concerto with apparent ease and ability. On her recall, however, in the Chopin waltz, she showed much more attractive qualities as an artist. There was far more repose and delicacy of sentiment, and everybody knows that Chopin is one of the most difficult composers to rightly interpret. Miss Hirschmann plays the Everett piano, which is always heard at the Festival concerts.—Portland (Me.) Daily Press, October 8, 1901.

The success of last evening's concert artistically, from the viewpoint of pure music, was Miss Hirschmann's. Liszt's Concerto in E flat, which Miss Hirschmann played in place of the orchestra's announced performance of Tschaikowsky's dramatic overture, "1812," is one in which the composer rose to a level of real power, and Miss Hirschmann's interpretation was masterful to a degree.

The eminent hypnotist M. Paderewski, if he cared to play this concerto, might spellbind his audience. Miss Hirschmann did, almost—but not entirely, for the audience scarcely realized what was going on till it was all over.

Perhaps it was the fault of a change in the program, but even that ought not to make such an apparent difference. There is consolation, though, in the fact that Miss Hirschmann will play again today, and if then a Manchester audience does not see in her more than a marvelous musician, then a Manchester audience is hopeless.—Manchester (N. H.) News, October 11, 1901.

Miss Hirschmann played again, and her work fully proved what I said of her yesterday. She is great, not only in the marvelous mastery of such forceful dynamics as are required in the Liszt Concerto, but in the delicate handling of the Henselt song, "If I Were a Bird," she showed a sympathy with her composer and her instrument which made her a part of both, and promised for her a future which she can make to suit herself.—Manchester News, October 12, 1901.

As the absence of Miss Adams cut down the second part, Miss Hirschmann played the Liszt E flat Concerto. Miss Hirschmann played this most difficult composition as nobody would suppose a woman could play it and overcame all its difficulties in a way which showed her to be a pianist of much more than ordinary ability. Being recalled, she played a Chopin waltz in a most charming manner, inspiring the wish that she might be heard in more music like this class.—Manchester (N. H.) Union, October 11, 1901.

Miss Hirschmann, whose playing of the Liszt Concerto at the evening concert created a genuine furore, repeated her former triumphs in a triad, embracing Henselt's "If I Were a Bird," Liadow's dainty imitation, "The Music Box," and one of Liszt's brilliant rhapsodies. In the inevitable recall, this really great pianist gave the lovely waltz, op. 64, by Chopin.—Burlington Free Press, October 16, 1901.

Miss Hirschmann, pianist, made her initial bow to a Burlington audience. Her number was the familiar Liszt Concerto in E flat. She played this difficult composition in a highly original manner, her interpretation being a superb rendering of a great work, which requires unusual musical memory, muscular and mental endurance, as well as great technical skill. Miss Hirschmann possesses all of these to a remarkable degree as well as a highly artistic touch and temperament. She responded to an encore with the "Marche Militaire," by Schubert-Tausig.—Burlington Daily News, October 15, 1901

Kaltenborn Quartet and Orchestra.

THUS early in the season the members of the Kaltenborn Quartet and Orchestra have been engaged for numerous concerts. The quartet will give four concerts in Brooklyn, N. Y.; four in Jersey City, two in Trenton, N. J., and a series in Brooklyn under the auspices of the Crescent Athletic Club.

The Kaltenborn Orchestra, with Franz Kaltenborn as conductor, will give a concert under the auspices of a social organization at the Grand Central Palace on November 28 (Thanksgiving Day). The orchestra will play at Montclair, N. J., on November 11, and in New York December 9.

KATHE GREGORY WITH NEVADA.—The popular young contralto with the youthful countenance and the profound voice is the only American engaged to accompany Nevada on her forthcoming concert tour. He begins November 6 singing in Rochester, Pittsburg, Boston, Providence, New York, Worcester, Springfield, Philadelphia, Washington, &c.

November 6 he sings at Tuxedo Park, the same week at Aeolian recital and later will appear in recitals in Boston and Washington.

WHITNEY TEW.—Much interest is centered in the appearance of Whitney Tew, the eminent basso, who has arrived in America from England. Mr. Tew's ability to sing in opera and oratorio has been amply illustrated. But during his present tour he will be heard most frequently in concert and song recital. His manager, Henry Wolfsohn, has recently been visiting the Western musical centers.

A PROMISING SEVERN PUPIL.—One of Mrs. Edmund Severn's most promising vocal pupils is Harry E. Brown, of Springfield, Mass. He possesses a tenor voice of unusual quality, a fine musical temperament, and decided dramatic talent. A brilliant career is prophesied for the young man.

HELEN HERBERT.—Miss Helen Herbert, of New York, has returned to Germany and resumed her position among the prime donne of the Magdeburg Opera.

VIENNA.

VIENNA, OCTOBER 2, 1901.

MUSICAL and dramatic circles in Vienna enjoy at this moment comparative quiet. The conservatory daily receives detachments of its 7,000 pupils. The Door and Epstein affair is well-nigh forgotten and Sauer may enjoy his title, his privileges and his salary of 14,000 kronen per year undisturbed. Amalia Dolcini may or may not win her lawsuit against Bohrmann, who, she claims, usurped her rights to the translatorship of the German version of "The Sign of the Cross," but the audience at the Jubileaum Theatre have quite recovered from the shock they received August 30 last, through the sensational scene of which she was the central figure, and the interest which was at first aroused by her youth, beauty and energetic courage has ceased to be an important factor in the judgments and criticisms passed on the affair. Miss Dolcini comes of a cultured Italian family, and is of noble birth. She is studying for the stage under Arno, in Vienna, and expects to make her professional début within a year or two.

Miss Edith Walker has concluded to remain at the Opera, and her beautiful cold voice and impassive acting are weekly, several times, a source of admiration without enthusiasm. The unsympathetic part of Amneris is well suited to Miss Walker's special style, and it would seem that the composer's intention of warming up all hearts in behalf of the enslaved royal maiden was well carried out at the "Aïda" performance on Friday, September 27, by the contrast between the stately Walker and the passionate Mildenberg, of glorious Brünnhilde and Isolde fame.

The Vienna heart seems to be capacious enough to accommodate quite a number of favorites. Gutheil-Schoder is one of these—but why does she play Carmen? Is it conceivable that the impulsive, wilful, attractive coquette that Bizet has given us should be bony, lank, hoarse voiced; in fact, in no way a typical Sevilla maid of superabundant youth? Moreover, the world has seen, and quite recently, a Carmen who can be an unprincipled flirt, an untamed, unrestrained and uneducated child of nature, and still not coarse. Gutheil-Schoder is contemptuous or unaware of such an interpretation.

The Wagner Cyclus, with Wm. Beck from Budapest and Förster-Lauterer from Hamburg, "als Gäste," was well given—that is the orchestra, notwithstanding occasional faulty brasses and woodwind, was good. Schalk and Helmesberger conducted the Ring, Mahler stepping in for "Tristan und Isolde." The singing, generally speaking, was only what is to be expected from a stock company. And why should worn-out singers resign when the public still persist in loving them, and frantically applauding their every appearance?

As for the machinery, mise-en-scène, &c., surely it is excellent. The stage of the Kaiserliche-Königliche Hof-Oper is unlike the Bayreuth stage which Mr. Huneker tells us of in his description of Klingsor's terrace, as presented at last summer's festival. The Vienna stage always closes when it is expected to close. It likewise opens at the proper moment, and swallows up its Norns and Nibelungs and Rhine daughters, or gives forth its mists and waves in the most approved fashion and according to latest improvements.

Some strangers resident for several years past in Vienna maintain that the ballet corps is degenerating. Maybe—still Frl. Sironi's skipping and pirouetting are a very acceptable performance, and all sorts of national, sacred and flower dances, butterfly and bee dances are pretty well understood by the ballet corps.

The Leschetizky world of high and low degree is pouring into Vienna. Pupils of all countries flock to vorbereiters, whose time is rapidly filling up. The American girl, with a firm belief in her own powers and a not unfounded faith in her dollars, sublimely confident, storms the main fortress at the start. Sometimes she effects immediate entrance. Sometimes—is it the air of Vienna and Ischl or the depressing influence of few elevators and many stairs, over-done meats and abundant flour foods?—sometimes she finds her native buoyancy strangely diminishing, and then, according to her choice of vorbereitres, she is doomed for a longer or shorter time to remain in the ranks of the great unknown (of Leschetizky). She may enjoy the acquaintance of some from within the inner circle and may be allowed to accompany these on pilgrimages to Währing, where from the outside she may contemplate the Herr Professor's villa, or exultantly giggle at the mere sight of the soulful-eyed Solo (Leschetizky's little dog), or enjoy the tremulous anticipation of seeing the master himself walk forth and fail to see or recognize anyone. She may even have the privilege (flanked by her vorbereiter) of playing once or twice before Leschetizky, but she is no more his pupil than she was in America. Then it is she most especially needs a fresh supply of American self-respect and courage if she expects to put through the sanguine plans she formed at home.

But we anticipate, for Leschetizky is still at Ischl and suffering severely, we hear, from the shock he received when the news was brought to him that his most dearly loved and highly gifted pupil, Gaston Lhérie, had unaccountably and unexpectedly shot himself. The catastrophe occurred at Ischl on the night of September 24-25. Lhérie's future had been predicted as that of another Paderewski. His career at the Paris Conservatory was one of brilliant and uninterrupted success. In Berlin, about two years ago, he won the Rubinstein prize. Some of the readers of THE MUSICAL COURIER may remember Mr. Floersheim's warm commendation at that time. His appearance in concert had already excited the greatest enthusiasm.

The Musical Encyclopedia, announced as forthcoming in a previous issue of THE MUSICAL COURIER, has appeared. Perhaps among the most interesting of the many volumes are the Chopin Studies, with Pugno's signature. A series of symphony concerts, under the direction of Ferdinand Loëwe, and beginning October 29, are announced at the Musik Verein. These concerts will present works of contemporary authors, a number of novelties, and, of course, the classic standbys. Chief on the list of soloists may be seen Sauer's name, with the "Emperor" Concerto.

At the impressive memorial services held under the Rev. W. H. Hechler in the chapel of the British Embassy, the organist of St. Stephan presided at the organ, and a double quartet of voices from the opera gave the hymns beloved of the deceased President—"Lead, Kindly Light" and "Nearer, My God, to Thee." Mr. McCormick, the American Minister, feelingly spoke a few appropriate words. The services were held at 11 a. m. for diplomatic and aristocratic circles, Duke Rudolph of Lichtenstein representing the Emperor, then absent from Vienna; and again at 3 p. m., as the chapel was by no means large enough to contain at one time the numerous Americans residing here who were anxious to testify their respect to the President's memory.

Virgil Piano School Recital.

RECITALS by the pupils and teachers of the Virgil Piano School will be given in the recital hall every Thursday evening this season, instead of Wednesday evening, as in previous years. These recitals are free, and the public are cordially invited to attend.

The program last Thursday evening was a delightful one, and was exceptionally well played.

The participants were Robert Colston Young, C. Virgil Gordon, Miss Bessie Benson, Miss Marjorie Parker, Wilbur Sanford Blakeslee, Miss Cora Hulburd, Miss B. V. Swope, Miner Walden Gallup, Laura Race and Master Hans Bergman.

The compositions played were by Bach, Beethoven, Rubinstein, Saint-Saëns, Liszt, Brahms, Schumann, Ilginsky, MacDowell, Stowjowski and Godard.

DAVOL SANDERS.—The talented young violinist, Davol Sanders, it is announced, has been booked by his manager, Remington Squire, for a tour of six months with the Katherine Ridgeway Concert Company. The tour opens in Brockton, Mass., and the company will appear in New England for the first two weeks, in New York, Pennsylvania and New Jersey for the following two months, and the balance of the time is booked in the Middle States and Far West.

GEORGE W. JENKINS.—George W. Jenkins, although no novice at that work, may nevertheless be considered a strong, new aspirant for concert honors among the well-known church tenors of this city, and he appears to have very bright prospects in that field of effort for this season. In September he placed himself under the management of Remington Squire, and already he has a very considerable amount of work ahead of him, being engaged for a big concert in this city on November 8; "The Creation" in Montreal, Canada; the "Swan and Skylark" in Yonkers, beside miscellaneous concerts in Brooklyn and several other cities.

BAILLARDS RECEIVE AT CLAVIER HALL.—Dr. and Mrs. Victor Baillard received their friends in their new studio at Clavier Hall, Friday evening, October 25. The evening passed delightfully with just that happy combination of the musical, the artistic and the social that have made their "At Homes" at their studio in Brooklyn so enjoyable in the past.

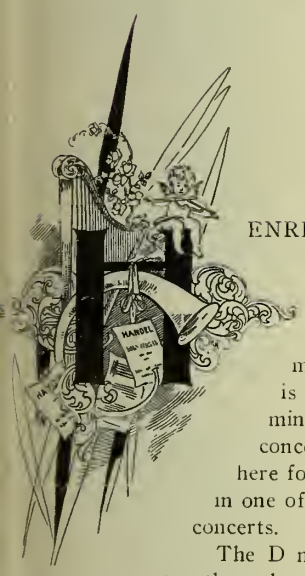
THREE NEW VIOLIN CONCERTOS.



ENRI MARTEAU deserves credit for introducing to Berlin three new violin concertos within the last few days. The most important of the three is the Concerto No. 2, in D minor, by Sinding, whose first concerto Marteau also played here for the first time last winter in one of the Nikisch Philharmonic concerts.

The D minor Concerto I like better than the first one in A minor. It symphonic in character, the orchestra playing an imtant part all through. And the orchestration is superb, rich and modern. The strings especially are employed h great effect. The thematic material of the work is striking as a whole, but it is remarkably well worked

The solo violin has largely passage work in the and last movements. The music lies well for the vioand sounds well. In the andante, in F sharp minor, violin has a fine opportunity to sing, for the most part louble stops, and they are violinistic double notes, writby a composer who not only had something to say, who knew how it should be said on the fiddle.

he Sinding Concerto is a sane, healthy work; there no unnatural strivings for effect in it, which cannot said of one of the other novelties, the concerto in C or by E. Jacques-Dalcroze, which Marteau played unthe baton of the composer himself.

his is one of those "interesting" works by a man who little to say but who makes a great fuss about saying There is undoubtedly a striving for new effects here. instance, a fugue for the full orchestra is introduced ard the close of the first movement. It is wholly unified. The recitative for solo violin in the slow movet (a largo), with an occasional pizzicato chord by the gs, is also out of place. In fact, in form the entire k is loose and disjointed. One does not know what to e of the finale. There is no logical connection bem the ideas.

nd then the solo part. It is rugged, awkward and uneful, especially in the first movement. C minor is an ward key for violin, anyhow, where much execution is d for. The passage work of the first movement is difficult, and does not sound at all brilliant, because s so awkwardly. Written half a tone lower, in B minor, ne tone higher in D minor, the same passages would rilliant.

ne key of C minor has its own peculiar character, and ppose it is this very character that Dalcroze wanted. hat is all very well in sonatas, quartets, &c., but in a t concerto like this, full of difficult passage work, which ughout the first movement does not modulate much, sticks largely to the original key, C minor is a very choice. In such a case the composer who does not into consideration the limitations of the solo instru- reckons without his host.

ganini, in his first concerto, wanted the characteristics h the key of E flat alone possesses. E flat major, though a far better key than C minor, is also a bad key for rapid execution, as the open A and E strings cannot be used.

Paganini wrote his orchestra parts in E flat, and cunningly tuned his fiddle half a tone higher, and thus while playing in E flat, he was executing in the key of D, one of the easiest and best sounding keys on the violin.

This trick greatly puzzled the connoisseurs of his day, for Paganini never tuned his violin audibly. Of course one cannot do such things nowadays.

The Dalcroze Concerto has interesting features. The treatment of the orchestra is masterful, the woodwind particularly being used with great effect. This is a redeeming feature for the solo violin, for it stands out well against the woodwind. The instrumentation is very modern, quite brilliant, though often too heavy. The themes are not grateful. All in all it is good capellmeister music.

The third novelty is a concerto by Tor Aulin, a young Norwegian. As a violin concerto per se this is the best of them all, though the Sinding Concerto has greater musical value. Tor Aulin is an excellent violinist himself. He introduced some of his smaller works to Berlin a few years ago, assisted by Ernest Hutcheson.

This new concerto is melodious and grateful. And the treatment of the solo violin! What a contrast from the Dalcroze Concerto! The key is also, strange to say. C minor, but what a difference! It modulates frequently. The passages lie and sound well. The solo violin always stands out in bold relief against the orchestral background. It is a real violin concerto, not a symphony with a violin obligato. Yet the orchestra has quite enough to do. It is always employed with skill and discretion.

There is an occasional delightful Northern coloring; one hears an echo from Norway's fjords and mountains.

The andante is a beautiful movement. The finale is, unfortunately, much weaker, both in thematic invention and in workmanship, than the other two movements. The choice of keys is peculiar. The first movement is C minor, the andante in A flat major and the finale in G major.

As a whole, though not a work of great depth, it is a grateful task for the performer, and is the best concerto by a violinist that I have heard of late years.

Marteau played all three concertos magnificently and with big success. Sinding was present and was called upon the stage amid great enthusiasm after the first movement of his concerto. Besides these three novelties Marteau played in his two concerts, with orchestra, the Bach A minor and the Mendelssohn concertos and the Bach E major Sonata for violin alone. The first evening he was not in good condition, but at the second concert he was in splendid form and played in a way that quite sustained his reputation. His technic was faultless, and his tone pure as gold. He deserves a vote of thanks for playing three new works here, where one hears all of the better known concertos done to death every winter. It is not an easy matter to pass judgment upon three big new works after but one hearing and without so much as a glance even at the music. I do not pretend that the above criticisms are infallible. I write simply my first impressions.

Albert Geloso, the Parisian violinist, has given two concerts with piano of late. Geloso is a great artist and a fascinating personality on the stage, but he did not do so well this year as last season. His interpretation of the Bach Chaconne was very queer. The variations on the theme of the first movement he played nearly all pianissimo; even the great arpeggio part, where there should be a tremendous crescendo and climax, he played ppp.

The theme in D major, however, he sang with wonderful tone. It sounded like a cathedral organ.

Geloso draws a grand tone from his instrument, his technic is impeccable, and he plays with great warmth. He is very fond of Bach and Beethoven, but he does not always hit upon the right interpretation. He takes too many liberties. Yet Geloso is a great violinist and a sterling musician. An artist must not be damned because he sometimes gives a peculiar reading of a well-known work.

Many minor violinists have played here already. I did not hear them.

It is possible that Sigmund Beel, formerly of San Francisco, will play here this winter. Beel played in London (where he is now living) last spring with great success. I saw the criticisms of the leading London dailies. They one and all called him a great violinist and a thorough musician, who played equally well the Paganini Concerto and the Chaconne.

I knew Beel well and often heard him when living in Brussels four years ago. He has a tremendous technic, having but few equals in this respect, and his tone is of a beautiful singing quality. He is a musician through and through, and as an artist altogether he is far superior to many of the well-known violinists now before the public. He is modest and never thrusts himself forward.

What could be more charming, poetic and thoroughly exquisite than the piano playing of Leopold Godowsky? When he runs a simple scale it is a poem full of exquisite charm, all by itself. His tone is at all times, whether in the most delicate fingerwork of a Chopin study or in heavy chords, wonderfully pure, full, round and singing. His touch is like velvet and has a quality quite unique.

About the great success of his concert on the 16th Mr. Liebling will tell you. I heard him under even more favorable circumstances the other evening at his house. A few friends had been invited to supper; afterwards, at 9 o'clock, Mr. Godowsky sat down to the piano and he did not get up again until 12 o'clock.

An amusing thing was the unisono playing of Mr. Godowsky and Dr. Pollock. Dr. Pollock is an amateur pianist, and has a prodigious memory. He also has technic.

Mr. and Mrs. Godowsky are well settled in their beautiful new home. In the choice of a wife Mr. Godowsky has been fortunate, which cannot often be said of great artists. Mrs. Godowsky, a former New York girl, is a charming woman, an ideal hostess, and she thoroughly understands her husband and is in perfect sympathy with him.

Bronislaw Hubermann, who when he played here some years ago gave the most prodigious exhibition of talent on the violin I ever heard, is coming out of his seclusion. He will give three concerts in Berlin this season.

ARTHUR M. ABELL.

CHAS. B. HAWLEY.—Chas. B. Hawley, the celebrated composer, is back from a long vacation at the seashore, and his studio at 489 Fifth avenue is the daily scene of busy activity. The John Church Company has just published three new songs by Mr. Hawley, "Your Lips Have Said You Love Me," "A Song of Life" and "Love and I"; all bid fair to become very popular.

The choir of the Broadway Tabernacle, of which Mr. Hawley is organist, sang the "Daughter of Jairus" last Sunday night.

H. W. GREENE.—The fall season at the H. W. Greene studios opens with a favorable outlook for a prosperous year. Mr. Greene's hours are being rapidly taken. The normal sessions which have for so long been a marked feature of his work and of such immense advantage to his students will begin the first Wednesday in November at 3:30 p. m.

THE NEW YORK SCHOOL OF ACCOMPANYING.—The registration is increasing weekly at the New York School of Accompanying. Among the new students are Miss Fanny Sweetser, of Cobleskill, who possesses splendid ability; Mr. Leslie, of Newburgh; Miss Horsfall, of Yonkers, and Miss Virginia Webster, of this city. Miss Wiener resumes her ensemble classes of four and eight hands.

MILAN.

MILAN, OCTOBER 15 1901.

AT last the mountain in labor has produced its ridiculous mouse; the commission appointed by the commune to study the question of the Scala, and determine the form of the famous referendum has given its reply.

It has decided to propose that the referendum be submitted between December 15 and 19 next; that all the administrative electors be invited to record their votes; and that the question, to be answered by a simple "Yes," or "No," be purely, solely and simply: Whether the electors think that the commune should grant a subsidy to the Scala?

In regard to this referendum I already gave you my general impression in recent past correspondence. In it I explained how the idea of calling on the administrative electorate to decide a question of art by a simple yes or no first came into the minds of the town council, composed principally of persons belonging to the Socialistic party, or, to use their generic term, the Popular Democratic party.

The doubt which I had expressed to a friend of mine on the town council, as to whether it was not impossible, by a simple question, to place clearly before the electors that of the pecuniary aid to be given to the Scala, was overcome by the reply, that not one but several would be the questions submitted to the voters.

Instead of this we now find the referendum commission, after so much study, publishing urbi et orbi, just this one single and simple question, which is so ridiculous that even that part of the press most favorable to our present town rulers finds it impossible to solve the great problem.

In fact, the one idea which would seem to have predominated with the commissioners is that of abolishing the word "endowment" (term used to denote the money which up to the present was given by the municipality to the Scala) and substituting for it the word "subsidy"; as if they did not both, under the circumstances, mean just exactly the same thing!

I think that probably the commission will have thought the majority of the public understands that the opening of the Scala is necessary to the welfare of the town; but the opening of the Scala is not possible without the pecuniary aid of the municipality; or, in other words, without the endowment, and the endowment is just that which we don't want, as it represents an old-time, mediæval notion, unworthy of the modern style of thought which dominates our present town council.

How shall we reconcile the abolition of the endowment with the continuation of the Scala? Let us ask the electors if they desire that the municipality shall allow a subsidy (which in blunt Italian means alms), and thus we shall gain our end; that is, the endowment will nominally be done away with, but the theatre will have the money all the same!

This mode of reasoning is tolerably foolish, but yet it represents the ergo of all that has been decided by the referendum commission. In fact, whatever may be the reply, it will not resolve the question in accordance with the desires of the popular party.

The position is this: they don't want the Scala really to be closed, but they ask instead that it shall be continued in such manner as to be accessible to all, and not only to the rich as at present, because the money of the municipality, they say, belongs to the whole people and not to any one particular class. The study of the commission was necessarily therefore directed toward this end; that is, to recognize the necessity of the Scala, and at the same time satisfy the pretentions of the people.

Now if the answer to the question should be No, that means that the Scala is doomed and must ceast to exist; if the answer be Yes, then it must continue as heretofore; with the result, after so much study and noise, that we shall be—just where we were before!

It appears to me that the questions to be submitted should have been at least two, in order to have a decided and unequivocal answer: First, whether the electors are of opinion that the commune should contribute to the support of the Scala, it being both morally and financially necessary to the town; second, whether the form hitherto used by the commune corresponds to the requirements and interests of the city, and of all classes of its citizens.

Let us hope that the commission, warned in time of their enormous mistake, will repair the error and not endanger any and every form of civic contribution to this the greatest manifestation of theatrical art that Milan possesses, and one of the few now remaining to Italy.

And now let me chronicle some of the theatrical doings. The Milan theatres have almost all reopened; in rather a weakly way perhaps, but this is only the preparation, as it were, for the more important representations which are to follow.

Thus at the Dal Verme we have had the "Poliuto," an old opera of Donizetti very seldom given now for want of artists suitable for its production, nor has it at the Da Verme risen above mediocrity, if we except the Signor Corsi, a good artist who knows how to draw public ap plause. After that we had the "Sonnambula," with the Sig nora Galvany in the leading part. She is a Spanish lad who treads our boards for the first time, for the purpos of testing Italian opinion, which proved entirely favorabl she being found to possess an unusually good voice, swe in tone and well tutored, with great agility up to the hig est notes, while her acting is undeniably good. Also th tenor Franco, likewise a Spaniard, sustains the part Elvino sufficiently well.

And, always at the Dal Verme, there has been a repr sentation of "William Tell," one of the great works Rossini; also of difficult execution for want of artis adapted to it. The present edition, if not altogether goo has anyway been fairly so.

Those who, like myself, have been present at the gre renderings of "William Tell"—at the Scala, with Tamagn in the leading part, or at the Téâtro Argentina, at Rom with Duc, the French Tamagno—cannot certainly be in pressed by that of Giacchero, who sustains the part Arnoldo at the Dal Verme. But Giacchero has in hi excellent qualities for the making of a first-class artis his voice being extremely robust, of wide range and pleasing and resounding quality; but, like all your Italian artists, he requires study—much study—under really good master who can teach him the unhesitatin placement of his voice, not neglecting, at the same time, little general culture in scenic art. The baritone, Paci an artist already known in the world of art, met wi a warm reception by the public, who, at the Lirico, h already applauded his artistic merits.

Of Matilde, Jemmy and other artists there is little say; they did their best, but to tell the truth that w not much. The orchestra, sufficiently strong, was w led by the maestro, Dal Fiume.

At this theatre on the 23d of this month the real autun season will be inaugurated with the "Tosca" of Pucci interpreted by the Signora Bianchini-Cappelli (Tosc Signor Garbin (Cavaradossi) and Giraldoni (Scarpi We shall thus have at last some representations after t style of the Scala without the annoyance of Commissio of Referendum and questions of endowment. And h does all this come about? I fancy I hear the reader i quiring. The thing is very simple. The theatrical ma ager, Signor Oreste Poli, is a young man of the mode school; he has been a long time in London and N ork, where he has learned to go ahead, with activity and me initiative of his own. Gifted with much artistic telligence, he has learned to understand the necessities a city like Milan, and during three seasons has under-ken the management of the Dal Verme, raising this eatre to the level of the good old times, now unhappily st, so that his pronouncements are awaited always with xious impatience by the Milanese public.

On the 26th of this month the Lirico Theatre of Sonzogno ill open with the "Sansone e Dalila" of Saint-Saëns; to followed by "Werther" and "Cendrillon" of Massenet, d by "Chopin," a new opera of the Maestro Orefice.

Just now, at the Lirico, they are giving operettes, with a panish company, who, beginning with Milan, purpose mak-g a tournée of the principal cities of Europe. Their but was satisfactory, both as regards the voice power of e artists and the mise-en-scène—characteristically Spanish as also because the artists are specialists of their sort. ne public naturally can only really enjoy the musical part the entertainment, which is, however, generally good for grace, its softness and sentimental warmth; all the rest that is, the witty dialogues, the caricature of persons and things Spanish—fall flat, and are rather tedious for want of a knowledge of the language.

The Manzoni, which is our Scala of prose, has also had a short little season of opera, "Norma" and "Lucia di Lammermoor" having been given moderately well, without either praise or complaint. Of the other opera season at the Fossati the readers of THE MUSICAL COURIER have already been informed by other correspondence from this side, and it would be useless to enlarge on it; the representations follow each other in regular course, with a change of operas but without much change in the execution of them.

F. ORLANDI.

BOWMAN IN PENNSYLVANIA.

THE local papers of Northeastern Pennsylvania report that the session of the Wyoming and Lackawanna County Musical Alliance, held in Factoryville from October 21 to 25, was one of the very best in the sixteen years' history of that organization. The purpose of the alliance is educational, not concert giving. The town and village choirs of that section meet twice a year for a week's study of good choral music and the inspiration that inures from association and the larger things that are possible to the union of 100 or more earnest singers.

It is an important movement in the development of a good style of singing of church music especially, and of concert music incidentally. Such an effort should be imitated in every section of this broad land. Were this done, it would exert a powerful influence not only in the smaller towns, but by reflex impulse it would affect the larger musical centres.

The results of the efforts put forth by the Musical Alliance of Pennsylvania, united to the skill as a conductor of E. M. Bowman, of New York, who led the present sessions, were seen in the large amount of good music which was studied during eleven rehearsals and then presented in good form to the public in two concerts, the first one on Thursday evening two weeks ago, which included Mendelssohn's "How Lovely Are the Messengers" ("St. Paul"); Tozer's "Ten Thousand Times Ten Thousand"; "God Is Our Refuge," Macfarlane; "From Egypt's Bondage Come," Page; a choral arrangement of the "Cujus Animam," from Rossini's "Stabat Mater," and "The Starry Host," a series of concert waltzes by Milde.

On Friday evening the program included the chorale from the Meistersingers' "Awake"; "The Heavens Are Telling," Haydn's "Creation"; "O Thou That Tellest," Händel's "Messiah"; the "Hallelujah," from Beethoven's "Mount of Olives," and Max Bruch's cantata, "Fair Ellen." All this music was new to practically all the singers when the sessions began Monday evening, October 21. Eleven rehearsals were held prior to the last concert Friday evening and considerable other music was sung besides that presented at the concerts.

Mr. Bowman is authority for the statement that, notwithstanding the short interval of study, the music was sung in an intelligent and artistic style.

Miss Bessie M. Bowman was the chief vocal soloist of the concerts, and according to reports scored a distinct triumph. Her voice is a rich contralto of lovely fresh quality, and her singing is characterized by exquisite finish and soulfulness. Voice, skill and winsome manner completely captured and held her audience at each appearance. So pleased was the Musical Alliance with her services that by a unanimous standing vote they passed resolutions to the effect that, much as they had anticipated from her voice and attainments, they were more than satisfied.

Mr. Bowman, beside his duties as conductor, played several organ numbers by Bach, Smart, Raff, Chopin and others, which were received with enthusiastic demonstrations.

Miss Susan Black, of Scranton, and W. N. Manchester, of Factoryville, who has conducted several meetings of the Alliance, sang in a highly creditable manner the solo parts in Bruch's "Fair Ellen."

KOEMMENICH TO CONDUCT.—Louis Koemmenich has arranged an attractive program for the concert of the New York Heinebund to be given at Terrace Garden November 10. The soloists are Leopold Winkler, pianist; Miss Rosa Wald, soprano; Miss Martha Wettengel, contralto; William Bartels, tenor, and Carl Schlegel, baritone. Schlegel is one of the artist pupils of M. J. Scherhey.

ETHEL CRANE.—Miss Ethel Crane, formerly the solo soprano of the Brick Church, and until recently of the Marcy Avenue Baptist Church, Brooklyn, has been chosen solo soprano of Dr. Kittridge's Church, Madison avenue and Fifty-seventh street, New York.

BARON FRANCHETTI.

Composer of the Opera "Germania."

[Interviewed by Our Own Correspondent.]

MILAN, OCTOBER 10, 1901.

If the Maestro Franchetti had not by his previous works already acquired the right to be considered (as he is considered) one of those modern Italian composers (two or three in all) who possess a perfect mastery of "technic," combined with great artistic power, he would at once have risen to the highest place in the public estimation, when the management of the Scala—disappointed of their great attraction, the "Nerone" of Boïto—addressed to him their earnest wish that he would allow his opera, "Germania," to take the place of the chef d'œuvre which Italy had been awaiting for over twenty years.

A new opera, especially if to be given at the Scala, always excites curiosity, and the fewer are the indiscretions divulged respecting it, just so much the more is this curiosity intensified. These indiscretions, however, in regard to the "Germania" have been both remarkably few and entirely unauthorized, because the author, Baron Franchetti, abhors self-advertisement, especially such as is only too much the fashion nowadays.

For this very reason my wish to have an interview with him had possessed itself of my mind as a sort of necessity. But how was I to overcome the insurmountable obstacle of his firm and absolute determination to not let himself be interviewed by anybody? I knew that he had already refused it to others, and I also knew that the steps I myself had taken, although supported by friends of the maestro, had likewise been fruitless.

It was necessary, therefore, to find some other means of obtaining my object. It is well known that Baron Franchetti has an almost exaggerated fancy for motor car driving, and those who were in a position to help me had told me that even when most absorbed the maestro's countenance would at once brighten up at a word about motor cars, their races, their pace, the obstacles they could overcome; and that by falling in with his views a little in this matter he becomes benevolent, conversational, oblivious of all surroundings, and—you become fast friends; whereas, if you talk of music——!

I settled, therefore, on a plan—infallible—but an accomplice is necessary; and this I find in the landlord of the Hotel Victoria, here in Milan.

Baron Franchetti, in order the better to work quietly and undisturbed on his "Germania," has been staying for some time at Airolo; in his frequent visits to Milan, which are always sudden and unexpected, he stays and often dines at the aforesaid Hotel Victoria. I get the landlord to reserve a place for me next to that usually occupied by the baron, and then under the guise, or disguise, of a traveler, I come in, take my seat and "dine." During dinner I do my best to glean what news I can of the "Germania," beginning, of course, with a trip by motor car.

Such my "plan," but it does not quite work with the precision of a shilling novel. Several times my place was "reserved" when the maestro had promised to come in to dinner, but unfortunately it remained unoccupied, as so severe is this motor car craze with the Maestro Franchetti that oftentimes he forgets not only his dinner, but even the friends he has invited to it. But my fellow conspirator, faithful to his promise, never tired of reserving my place for me, whenever he prepared the table for Baron Franchetti. At last our maestro gave an unusually serious promise that he would be in for dinner, and I a few minutes after he was seated made my entry into the dining room of the Victoria Hotel with the jaded appearance of a traveler, and the waiter led me to the place prepared for me.

Fortunately my victim was in excellent humor, because his motor car had accomplished the journey from Airolo to Milan in good style, and some minutes under the regular time.

Beaming with happiness he turned to the company for their approval. This was my opportunity and I took it, following him at once by motor car. "But, is it possible, sir, that you can have got over so much ground in so short time, and without accident? I confess that I am not very much up in motor cars, but from what little I know, your journeys appear to me real tours-de-force."

"Quite the contrary," replies the maestro, "it is my usual pace, that is, of course, if there be no exceptional obstacles besides the state of the roads. You are surprised? You would not be so if you were to see my 'Mercedes.'"

And then, like the uncorking of a bottle of champagne, the Maestro Franchetti overwhelms me with a sportive dissertation on automobilism: "My Mercedes is 35 horse power, made by Daimler, of Cannstadt, only weighing 22 cwt., and with a speed of 90 kilometers an hour on the flat, up to a maximum of 110. You think my drives from Airolo to Milan wonderful, but what would you say to those from Airolo to the summit of the St. Gothard, which my Mercedes does at the rate of 40 kilometers an hour, completing the journey always in twenty-five minutes, as regularly as a clock, and carrying four people, with their baggage, too? And the road up the St. Gothard, as you know, has a rise of 1,000 metres, equal to about 9 per cent., to say nothing of fifty-seven turnings at acute angles.

"And, what do you say to my journey from Schaffhausen to Zurich, Lucerne, Thun, Interlaken, Geneva, Chamounix, Chambery, Grenoble, Grande Chartreuse, Aix-les-Bains, Susa, Turin, Milan, Pallanza and Airolo; all in five days; yes, in five days only, understand?"

Only able to drop in an occasional oh! or ah! I remained there, with eyes and mouth open, gazing at his joyous face, full of happiness at the religious attention with which I listened, almost like a scared child listening to a ghost story or fairy tale.

And still he continued: "You see, I am so satisfied with my 'Mercedes' that I would not sell it at any price. Of the twenty-two motor cars that I have had none have equaled it, not even my two Panhards. My 'Mercedes' possesses every requisite for traveling well, quickly and without trouble. See, here I have some photographs taken by the Maestro Giordano, as a remembrance of our last journey."

Here I boldly jerked in the question whether he would mind giving me one or two of them.

"Certainly, with pleasure! I am so happy when——" And he began another spurt of automobilism, with never a sign of the road that might lead me to "La Germania." Only think what ground I had to jolt over before reaching it; but, taking advantage of his first stopping place, and determined to rush it somehow, I chimed in with: "Excuse me, maestro, but how on earth do you manage to find time for music, and especially for the 'Germania,' for which you have engaged yourself, if you are flying about on your motor car from morning to night?"

Now I cannot say that this question met with the same hearty response as would a more sportive one, but he was now in the right mood, as I had been led to hope, and he did not avoid my question.

"The press," I continued, "has already noticed it, and has made public several indiscretions, among which that it is a work of considerable proportions."

"I must tell you," he replied, "that all the news hitherto published in regard to the 'Germania' is erroneous, and especially where they state that the work terminates with the battle of Jena and the victory of Napoleon. Nothing could be further from the truth; the opera terminates on the contrary with the battle of Leipsic (1813), the defeat of Napoleon, and the triumph of Germany."

Encouraged by my success, it is unnecessary for m to say that I tried my best to get all the information could, and I now repeat it as accurately as I can remem ber, so as to render as well as possible the subject of th libretto.

The opera is in four acts. The first takes place in mill at Nürnberg, where are assembled some students di guised as millers, in order to avoid the police, who a seeking to root out the secret societies of conspirator Among them is Worms, the baritone, who shortly afte ward is surprised by the police and arrested. To his car as his most trusty friend, Federico (who has gone to th wars) had intrusted his betrothed, of whom he is pa sionately fond. Worms, however, losing all control ov his better-self, falls madly in love with his charge; a in the first act we have the duet between Worms a Rika, where she upbraids him for his broken faith. this secret meeting the principal personages of that time Weber, Maria Louise, &c.—appear upon the scene.

The second act takes place in the Black Forest. It is characteristic picture, with a coloring that renders the a mosphere of the place highly suggestive. Federico, no returned, marries Rika, who says nothing of her relatio with Worms; but amid it all is heard, far away, the so of the baritone, who escaped from prison and is on h way to rejoin his companions. He finds Rika united o Federico, and, unable to control himself, rushes a Federico tries to overtake him, little dreaming of reason which has caused his flight. Meantime, howe Rika, seized with remorse at having deceived the r whom she adores, and who believes her faithful, takes to flight. When Federico returns he finds Jani, the little sister of Rika.

A fearful storm has arisen, and it is at its height Federico hears from the innocent, artless lips of the li Jani how Worms is madly enamored of her sister Rika

The third act, which for its scenic situations must st one at once as the most important, and about which Maestro Franchetti is most enthusiastic, happens at Kön berg in one of the hiding places of the most important s societies of those times. A great meeting has been s moned, and the members, completely masked, are all p ent. Their chief is Worms, who is seated at the pos honor. To everything he says blind acquiescence is gi excepting only by one among their ranks, who has n laring to contradict him. At last Worms, impatient at his continued insult, invites anyone who has any opposition to make to step out and make himself known. One nan of resolute bearing comes forward and uncovers; it s Federico, who throws in the teeth of his friend the rime of which he has been guilty. General surprise at eeing two fast friends face to face in enmity. Worms does ot deny the accusation; on the contrary, he accuses himelf of having done that which was repugnant to his own atural instincts. But the outrage must be wiped out with lood. Worms, it is true, is already self-doomed to die or the glory of his country, but by death on the battle eld, an enviable, a hero's death, and he cannot, must not ttain it! And there, on the very spot where love of county should unite all, the duel is to take place.

But just as the duel begins, the Queen Maria Louise appears. * * * The swords are lowered, and a reconciliaon is effected by the queen, who will not allow the spillg of blood so necessary to the country for the expulsion f the stranger.

In the fourth act we are on the battle field after the ttle of Leipsic. Rika is wandering among the dead in earch of Federico, who has, she knows, been wounded; e is repentant and longs for his forgiveness. She finds m dying. One only favor do I ask you if you wish me die happy," says Federico; "tell me * * * who is ctor? Germany! And from afar, a vision of Napoleon efeated and flying appears to the dying man, who breathes s last, happy to die for the freedom of his country.

The Maestro Franchetti is most enthusiastic about the retto of "Germania"; he says it is the best that Illica s ever conceived or written. Scenic in character, draatic in its action, grandiose in its style, everything necsary for the making of a great opera is embodied in it. In regard to the music I can say but little. To my quiry whether he was following his own style, that of y particular school or seeking some new, unbeaten path, replied:

"All that I must leave to the public to answer, unless I n able to do so myself * * * ad opera finita. Believe , that to make up one's mind to follow any given sysn is to be false to one's own self; the musical work of composer is the result of what he himself knows, of at he has studied—the result, in short, of his own ntiment, of his own nature.

'When I am struck by some phrase in a libretto, or by me highly scenic situation, I sit down to write so as to der by the notes exactly what I feel, the sensations used in me; I do not think in the least about any tool, style or system. I write music, and that is all! hen finished I read over what I have written, to see if written notes reproduce the impression first made on , and I then correct and re-correct until they do. And not think, my dear sir, that those passages in music—matter who the author—which seem inspired and writ- straight off are really the result of a first impression. thing of the sort. They have been written, weeded. pped and changed, many and many times, until at last author is repaid in the final result obtained. You see, ave been at work over four years on the 'Germania,' and an assure you that no single passage in it, as the blic will hear it, is the same as I wrote it under my first pression; all of them have been filed down and polished h much care and study. I worked four years on the t and second acts, whereas the third was done in a nth—how long the fourth will take remains to be seen, t is not yet finished.

Anyhow, the music of my 'Germania' seems to me to e resulted in Italian music; of course, there are no certati, airs or duets of the old style of composition; while the orchestra describes the action, the song of the artists is free, with passionate and sentimental phrasing. The prelude to the fourth act is the most worked up, and, to my mind, the most finished part of the opera. It is a prelude—I might almost say a poem of symphony—of grand proportions, intended to represent the 'field' after the battle of Leipsic; a vision of ancient legendary heroes of Germany, riding over the field of battle, chanting a hymn of admiration to the glory of the new heroes fallen for their country and its history, as they themselves had fallen for the faith and love.

"I may be accused of anti-Wagnerism in thinking that my 'Germania' savors of Italian music. There are few who respect Wagner more than I do; I admire him, I study him! I was misunderstood last year when I wrote that 'Tristano ed Isotta' at the Scala wearied the public. I am of opinion that to enjoy Wagner requires musical instruction superior to that which at present generally obtains. It is no use 'posing' as a Wagnerian, the effort to do so by a forced attention to the representation is too overpowering; you succumb to it—for that which is not understood cannot please! Educate the people little by little to that sort of music, and they will enjoy it seriously, or at least will admire it. Everything is progressive; in nature there are no interruptions."

The dinner was over some time. During the heat of the discussion the waiter, by a lucky inspiration, had brought in a bottle of Chambertin—now empty. There remained only the coffee—almost cold—and the liqueurs.

To change the subject, I asked the Baron whether it was true that he had written, or was writing, an operette in conjunction with the Maestro Giordano. "It has already been finished some time," he replied, "and if it has not yet been represented, the reason must be sought in editorial peculiarities, or rather in the peculiarly unartistic working of monopoly, it having been inconsiderately and unfortunately ceded to a—let us say—collector of operettes, who requires first to rid himself of other previous purchases.

"The operette is entitled 'Giove a Pompei,' and is as merry and jovial as can be imagined. Illica had written the libretto for a composer of operettes, who, however, did not take it, and he then showed it to me. I was smitten with it, so full is it of wit and life, and I determined to set it to music at some moment when I should be in the humor. But I never found the time. Being one day with Giordano and Illica, we were laughing together over the several scenes of 'Jupiter at Pompei,' when Illica jumped up and said: 'Why don't you write it together?' We looked each other in the face, and—'Done,' said we both in chorus. And so—at the Lake of Como, in the quietude of a villa there—'Jupiter' was born. You should have seen us write it! We could hardly jot down the notes for our laughter at the motives, which came to us spontaneously, as we read passage after passage of the libretto! How I should enjoy seeing it represented." * * *

The waiter here announces that a gentleman wants to speak to Baron Franchetti. "Goodness gracious! Some bother or other," grumbles the Baron. "Why didn't you say I was out," and, turning to me: "We were so comfortable here, chatting together!"

But I, who had obtained my intent (including the sketch which the painter Minardi, of the Illustrazione Italiana, had, by my invitation, surreptitiously made of our meeting, from a table in the corner of the room), was not quite so much annoyed at the intrusion as I should have been half an hour before. I bade a cordial adieu to the Baron, who kindly expressed the hope of seeing me again next morning at breakfast, but when next morning came the stranger had already taken his departure—for Milan. F. ORLANDI.

MISS MCKENZIE TO ASSIST MRS. STOCKER.—Miss Rebecca McKenzie, soprano, will assist Mrs. Stella Prince Stocker at her lecture recital in the public school course on November 4.

KATHERINE RUTH HEYMAN.

MISS KATHERINE RUTH HEYMAN, the distinguished young American pianist, has in the past five years established her right to a place among artists of the first rank in this country, and she has been accorded honors that are substantial proof of the very high esteem in which her musicianship is held. These marks of distinction, too, are but repetitions of like honors conferred upon her by the most exacting authorities, critics and laymen, and musical organizations in the leading centres of Europe.

Born in California, Miss Heyman began her musical studies when she was but four years old. Her father, Arnold Heyman, a noted violinist and pupil of Spohr, was her instructor, and at the age of six she first played in public. In 1891, accompanied by her mother, Miss Heyman went to Berlin where she enjoyed the advantage of an extended course of study with Heinrich Barth. While abroad she made some very important appearances and scored a succession of brilliant triumphs. After her return to America in 1894 she concertized for two seasons through the Middle West, and made a tour of the principal Eastern cities with Bronislaw Huberman.

Subsequent study abroad was followed by engagements as solo pianist in all the leading cities of the East and Canada, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Kneisel Quartet, and with such noted artists as Madames Schumann-Heink and Sembrich, with Plançon, Campanari, Salignac and Hugo Becker.

Of her pianism, the most authoritative critics here and abroad agree that her technic is masterly—more than adequate for every demand, her interpretation marked with a beautiful intelligence and sympathy, her temperament exceptionally musical, sensitive and highly artistic. In addition to her rare musicianly qualities, Miss Heyman possesses the potent charm of a graceful bearing, great refinement, magnetic personality and an attractive appearance.

Aptly termed "the girl with the wonderful eyes and fingers," Miss Heyman acquits herself with notable distinction in ensemble as well as solo playing, and she is already booked for a large number of orchestral and recital appearances this season. Her first engagement is with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge, Mass., November 24.

Riesberg-Harris Engagement.

THE engagement of Miss Estelle Harris, solo soprano in the choir of the Church of the Divine Paternity, to Frederick W. Riesberg, the organist and accompanist, was formally anounced last week.

Miss Harris, who is a handsome young woman, came to New York several years ago from her home in Easton, Pa., to study with Miss Emma Thursby. The choir position which she holds, and her popularity as a recital and concert singer bespeak talent and vocal method, and the other points that makes an artist attractive and a success. Miss Harris is the daughter of the late Orlando Harris, of Mauch Chunk, assistant paymaster of the Lehigh Valley Railroad at the time of his death. Her musical education began in childhood with the best teachers to be found in a small city. To Miss Thursby's training, however, Miss Harris owes her artistic standing.

During the past summer Miss Harris sang at Mr. Riesberg's organ recitals at the Pan-American Exposition in Buffalo. Later she was engaged as soprano soloist for concerts and recitals at the summer school in Asheville, N. C. The series of subscription concerts at the school were given under Mr. Riesberg's direction.

Mr. Riesberg is organist and choir director of the Roseville (N. J.) Presbyterian Church, a successful accompanist and teacher of piano, organ and harmony. He holds the secretaryship of the New York State Music Teachers' Association, and is a contributor to THE MUSICAL COURIER.

Frank H. Ormsby, a tenor singer, has located in Denver, Col., where he has a studio.

On October 14 an organ recital was given at Owensboro, Ky., by Minor C. Baldwin.

A vocal recital was given at Galesburg, Ill., by Miss Mary P. Thompson October 17.

A series of three organ recitals will be given at Hartford, Conn., by Frank J. Benedict.

Mrs. C. F. Menninger and Miss Annie M. Parry Bundy gave a musical recently at Topeka, Kan.

Miss Alice Fallon, who gave a concert recently in Birmingham, Ala., will return to Dresden in November.

Bruno Steindel and Mrs. C. Trimble were the soloists at the Y. M. C. A. concert last week at Minneapolis, Minn.

Miss Mary Hallock, of Philadelphia, appeared before the pupils of the Moravian Seminary, Bethlehem, Pa., recently.

The New Haven (Conn.) Symphony Orchestra is to give a series of six concerts this season, and Professor George Stillman Kelley is to conduct them.

Nelson A. Sprackling, a promising pupil of Professor Charles E. Clemens, is filling the position of temporary organist at Emanuel Episcopal Church, Cleveland, Ohio.

Vernon Edward Matlack, of Chicago, has been secured for the opening recitals on the new pipe organ now being erected in Vincent Church, Spokane, Wash., November 5 and 6.

One of the most delightful musicals of the season was given last Thursday evening at the home of Dr. and Mrs. Alexander A. La Vignel, on Kennard street, Cleveland, Ohio.

A musical event of interest in Indianapolis, Ind., will be the recital at the Propylæum the first week in November by Hugh McGibeny, violinist, and Karl Schneider, baritone.

Mrs. Howard Rogers, Ben Franklin and Clarence Phillip were the soloists at the Pianola and Aeolian recital held in the parlors of the music establishment of Cluett & Sons, Troy, N. Y.

Frederick W. Wallis, of Kansas City, who recently gave a song recital at the Art League, Leavenworth, Kan., was assisted by Miss Mattie Lou Catron, contralto, and Mrs. Jennie Schultz at the piano.

The Paterson (N. J.) School of Art, Music and Language was filled with music lovers at the first recital of the season. The soloists were Claude Trevlyn, Miss Ella Force and Jacob Epple, basso.

The piano students beginning lessons under Professor Sickner at the Sickner Conservatory, Wichita, Kan., are Mrs. F. G. Vandyne, Mrs. J. A. Remspear, Opal Remspear, Kathryn Jones, Harry Lawrence, Pearl Reed, Marguerite Case, Avis Hamilton, Marie Horner, Mrs. W. H. Burns and Anna Moore.

The Students' Concert Company of the Ithaca Conservatory of Music, consisting of Mrs. Lelle Rhodes-Mangang, Mrs. Chamot, Miss Elizabeth N. McCrea and Ford Hommel, is meeting with great success on its concert tour through Pennsylvania.

Organ recitals by G. B. Carter are to be given at the First Presbyterian Church, Elmira, N. Y. The soloists for the first were Miss Mary V. Donovan, Mrs. John Wentworth, Robert Parmenter and Philip Young.

Arthur Dunham, organist, assisted by Mrs. Virginia M. Hight, soprano; Miss Katherine Eloise Donahue, contralto, and Sherman Hight, tenor, gave the opening concert at Holy Trinity Church, Bloomington, Ill., when the new organ was dedicated.

Progress Hall, Parkersburg, W. Va., was filled with a representative audience when Edmund Alexander Jahn, baritone, and Miss Emma Arnold Payne, pianist, and Charles A. Bukey, accompanist, gave the first recital of Trinity Choir series.

The officers of the Lebanon (Pa.) Choral Society are: President, H. W. Siegrist; vice-president, Samuel McAdam; treasurer, C. W. Few; secretary, H. C. Roeder; directors, Morris Light, H. H. Lineaweaver, William McAdam, James Eckenroth, G. S. Miller, A. A. Ritcher; musical director, E. A. Berg, of Reading; accompanist, Chas. G. DeHuff, with James Eckenroth and H. W. Siegrist as assistants.

Lovers of music in the State University and city of Vermillion, S. Dak., are elated over the organization of the musical talent of the community into a society which will be known as the University Choral Society. Constitution and by-laws have been adopted, and J. D. Logan elected president; J. E. Payne, vice-president; C. S. Sloan, secretary; Miss Woods, treasurer; J. E. Payne, Dr. Foster and Professor Myers, executive committee.

NATIONAL CONSERVATORY CONCERTS.

ALL members of the faculty, several of the officers and a crowded house greeted the young pupils who participated at the first in the series of monthly students' concerts at the National Conservatory of Music, Tuesday evening, October 29. This was the program:

Sonata, for piano and violin.....Gade
Miss Grace Halleck and Carl Tollefsen.

Air, For All Eternity.....Mascheroni
Miss Martha Gauze.

Piano soli—
Butterfly.....Grieg
At the Spring.....Scholz
Miss Florence Helfer.

Aria, Within This Sacred Dwelling.....Mozart
A. Rosenburg.

Sonata (second movement).....Grieg
Miss Paula Schluter.

Songs—
The Princess.....Grieg
Ich liebe Dich.....Grieg
Miss Lulu Decker.

Violin solo, Fantaisie Appassionata.....Vieuxtemps.
Master Julius Casper.

The young pianists who played are pupils of Miss Adele Margulies and their playing was remarkable for clean technic and musical quality. Miss Grace Halleck, who played in the Gade Sonata with Mr. Tollefsen, is herself a teacher at the conservatory, but as she was trained for her work by Miss Margulies, she may be credited as a Margulies pupil. Mr. Tollefsen, the violinist who played with Miss Halleck, is a Lichtenberg pupil. He was recently promoted to the position of preparatory teacher, a place for which his training has fitted him. The singers reflected credit on their individual teachers. Miss Gauze is a pupil of Royal Stone Smith; Mr. Rosenburg, a pupil of Wilford Watters, and Miss Decker, of Miss Annie Wilson. Master Casper, who played the closing number of the concert, is a pupil of Lichtenberg. He is a gifted boy, of whom the general public will hear more before the present musical season closes.

CLAVIER PIANO SCHOOL.

A LARGE audience in Clavier Hall attended the second recital of the season last Friday evening. The ogram was given by Charles Russell, 'cellist, director the ensemble class, assisted by Miss Mary J. Lansing, ntralto; Harry Stewart Briggs, pianist, and George ehl, violinist. Mr. Russell opened the evening with ccherini's quaint 'Cello Sonata in C major. After singing of "Morire," by Papini, by Miss Lansing, with llo obligato, Mr. Russell played a group of compositions—Air, by Bach; "Moment Musical," by Schubert; he Swan," by Saint-Saëns, and "Vito," by Popper. is group gave Mr. Russell an opportunity to show that possesses both a finished technic and the ability to oduce those rich, warm tones that make the 'cello the otional instrument that it is. Compelled to add an exnumber. Mr. Russell played another composition by oper. Miss Lansing sang charmingly songs by uise Tunison and Edna R. Park. The concert closed h a musical performance of a trio by Gade for 'cello, lin and piano, played by Messrs. Russell, Stehl and ggs. It is expected that future recitals of the school have more ensemble numbers. With Mr. Russell the head of the ensemble classes, the department is g extended. The third recital, Friday evening, Nober 8, will be given by piano pupils of the school. Virgil, the director, will add some of his instructive arks.

MIL HOFMANN.—Emil Hofmann, the well-known bari-, scored a brilliant success with his powerful yet symetic voice and refined art wherever he sang in America season. Mr. Hofmann has filled a large number of important engagements abroad this summer. October e sang at a concert in Leipsic, and made a notable ression. He won storms of applause, and the critics sed highly his artistic style, his noble tone production, the taste and care with which he selected his songs. repeated his triumph in a recital he gave in the same October 31. Under the direction of Loudon G. Charl- Mr. Hofmann will be heard again in America this on, when he will sing a number of return dates and a long list of engagements in cities which could not re his services last year. Mr. Hofmann sails for this try November 5, on the Kaiser Wilhelm, to reach this in time for his first engagement with the Eintracht at ark, N. J.

MUSIC IN BROOKLYN.

A MODEST genius is seeking to establish an analogy between music and clothes. Footnotes on the advance circulars sent out by the Brooklyn Institute request those attending the concerts this year to disregard the matter of evening dress, the aim being now to make the concerts more social. Before consolidation New Yorkers charged Brooklynites with wearing their boots unblacked. This, of course, applied only to the men. Brooklyn women are known the country over for their admirable taste in dress. Not so severe in their modes as Boston and Philadelphia women and never so extravagantly attired as their Manhattan sisters, Brooklyn women have for years represented culture and breeding in the quiet and yet graceful manner in which they wear their clothes. Therefore it would seem that the hints on the Institute advance circulars are intended for that patient, provincial and credulous mortal—the Brooklyn man, who appears to have offended some of the powers that be by attending the concerts in the ill-fitting suit of tweed or cheviot which he wore at his office all day. The writer, however, warns Brooklyn women to save their delicate tinted bodices for the concerts at the Academy of Music. Until some philanthropist presents the owners of Association Hall with new seats it is unwise to wear light clothes to the concerts given in that auditorium. As the "regulars" know, the chairs in Association Hall are covered with a cheap, sticky leather, or "leatherette." Silks and satins become glued to the backs of these uncomfortable and hideous chairs, and in case the bodices are light in color the wearers come away with a stain on their pretty garments. The best that the women can do to conform to the reasonable request regarding dress is to wear dark bodices and touch them up with color at the throat and corsage. A pair of white gloves will give the finishing touch to a correct appearance at an evening concert.

Unfortunately, the Brooklyn Institute gives most of its concerts at Association Hall. So far as the knowledge of this writer goes, the Institute has engaged the Academy of Music for only nine concerts—five by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, two by the Brooklyn Oratorio Society, one by the Brooklyn Saengerbund (in December), and one by the Brooklyn Arion (in April). The seats or chairs at the Academy are upholstered in cotton velvet, and when these are well brushed women are not likely to have their dresses soiled.

The Germania Club, the most exclusive and wealthiest social club of the Germans in Brooklyn, gave a private concert at the clubhouse on Saturday evening, October 26. Arthur Claassen, conductor of the United Singers of Brooklyn and of the Brooklyn Arion, arranged the concert and directed the musical program. The soloists were Arthur Hochman, pianist; Mrs. Marie Rappold, soprano; Hans Kronold, 'cellist; Charles Stuart Phillips, tenor, and a double quartet from the Brooklyn Arion. The entertainment of the club declared this to be one of the finest concerts ever given before the club, and Mr. Claassen was warmly complimented for his success. The Arions sang five songs and were enthusiastically received. Arthur Hochman also scored immensely with the music lovers present. Mr. Claassen played the accompaniments for the singers.

Miss Amy Murray delighted a large audience in the Bushwick Avenue Reformed Church on Tuesday evening, October 29, with her Scottish lecture-song recital. The piano accompanying was done by Mrs. W. S. Nelson. Miss Murray's program follows:

Scottish-American Song—
O Sing to Me the Auld Scots' Sangs.....Dr. James Bethune
Songs of the Lowlands—
Afton Water.....Robert Burns
O Whistle and I'll Come to Ye.....Robert Burns
Bonnie Dundee.....Sir Walter Scott
When the Kye Comes Hame..James Hogg (The Ettrick Shepherd)
Songs of the Border—
The Flowers o' the Forest. Traditional.....Sir Walter Scott
Young Lochinvar.....Sir Walter Scott
(Adapted to an old border melody by Miss Murray.)
Songs of the Highlands—
A'Chuthag. (The Cuckoo.)
Skye Boat Song.
Accompanied upon the ancient Celtic harp (Clarsach).
Songs of the Jacobites—
Charlie is My Darling.
Hey Johnnie Cope.
Will Ye No' Come Back Again?
Character song—
Caller Herrin'.....Lady Nairne
(In the holiday dress of a Newhaven fishwife.)

Auld Lang Syne.

Miss Sarah Anderson, soprano, and Joseph Baernstein, basso, attracted an audience of music lovers to Memorial Hall last Thursday night for their joint recital. Both of these singers are blessed with rare voices, voices that interpret equally well an operatic aria and a classic song. The interesting program we published last week was given and both artists were recalled many times.

Assisted by pupils and several professional artists, Frederic Reddall, the baritone singer and teacher, gave his twenty-ninth morning musicale at the Pouch Mansion last Saturday. Mr. Reddall sang the prologue from "Pagliacci" and from manuscript a new musical setting for Kipling's poem, "A Song of the White Men." Miss Clara A. Otten, pianist, played a Prelude by Grieg, "Improvisation," by MacDowell; "Aufschwung," by Schumann, and the B minor Scherzo by Chopin. Miss Charlotte Miller, soprano; Miss Lily White, soprano, and Miss Rebecca Lane Hooper, contralto, were the assisting singers. Arthur Wood accompanied.

Departments of dramatic art, English diction and physical culture have been added to the Klingenfeld College of Music and School of Elocution. Beginning in a modest way a year ago, this school, located at 108 Hancock street, has made a reputation for itself on the Hill. Mrs. Marie M. Klingenfeld is the director of the three departments referred to in addition to singing, which has long been Mrs. Klingenfeld's specialty. The changes in the faculty not previously announced include Paul Listermann, violin; August Walther, harmony, and Wilbur Luyster, sight singing and reading. These are strong names. Mr. Listermann has studied abroad under Joachim and other famous masters. In the absence of Mr. Klingenfeld in Canada, Mr. Listermann will have charge of the violin department. Mr. Walther is a composer and lecturer whose fame keeps growing. Mr. Luyster is an exponent of the celebrated Gallin-Chevé method. He has given lectures under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute and at Carnegie Hall.

The Music Students' Club met at the home of Miss M. Louise Mundell, 276 McDonough street, last Wednesday evening. The hostess, who is a local singer and teacher, gave a talk on "Voice Culture." The vocalists of the evening were Miss Lillian Hatch, Miss Helen F. MacManus and Miss Henrietta Gahn. Mrs. Francis Pelton-Jones was the pianist.

The Kneisel Quartet gave the first of three chamber music concerts in Association Hall last Wednesday evening, with Mrs. Mary Hissem De Moss as the assisting singer. This was the program:

Quartet in D major, op. 64, No. 5.....Haydn
Songs for Soprano—
Mein Lied.....Gumbert
Die Trommel gerühret.....Beethoven
Freudvoll und leidvoll.....Beethoven
Liebliches Bächlein.....Paradies
Mrs. Hissem De Moss.
Trio for violin, viola and violoncello, in D major, op. 8..Beethoven
Songs for soprano—
Through the Still Night.....Tschaikowsky
The Belfry Warden's Daughter.....Loewe
Mrs. Hissem De Moss.
Quartet in F major, op. 96.....Dvorák

Mrs. De Moss again showed excellent taste. She phrases well, enunciates distinctly and in the lighter songs on the program she appealed most to her audience. Hers is a bird-like voice, better suited to ballads and songs not written in tragic or dramatic vein.

To-morrow evening (Thursday) Dr. Hanchett will give the closing lecture on "Musical Contrasts" in the Assembly Hall of Adelphia College. He will have the assistance in the ilustrations of the Maxwell House Orchestra and several singers. The compositions and other details were published three weeks ago.

Friday evening, November 7, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will pay its first visit to Brooklyn for the season. The concert will be given at the Academy of Music. Miss Milka Ternina and Ellison Van Hoose are the soloists announced. The evening will be devoted to Wagner as follows:

Overture, Bacchanale, and scene between Tannhäuser and Venus from the first act (Paris version), Tannhäuser.
Walter's Prize Song, The Mastersingers.
Siegfried's Parting from Brünnhilde, Siegfried's Death, Funeral March, Closing Scene, Die Götterdämmerung.

The second in the series of song and violin recitals before the Brooklyn Institute will be given Wednesday evening, November 13, by Whitney Tew, baritone, and Miss Anna E. Otten, violinist. The program follows:

Ah! mio cor (Alcina).....Händel
Qui s'degno (Il Flauto Magico).....Mozart
Hat man nicht mit seinen Kindern.....Bach
Whitney Tew.
Elegy, op. 35, G minor.....Bazzini

NEW YORK COLLEGE OF MUSIC.—Beginning on Monday afternoon, November 18, and continuing every Monday during the season, Wm. J. Henderson will deliver a course of lectures on history of music before the students of the New York College of Music.

PHILADELPHIA, October 26, 1901.

SEVERAL little things which have occurred lately indicate that the somewhat absurd stand taken by the local Musical Union against the management of the Philadelphia Orchestra is slowly being given up. It appears to be the desire of the union to withdraw as gracefully as possible from the affair. A number of the orchestra's most bitter opponents in this matter, when explained the true condition of things, as briefly stated in my last letter, withdrew their opposition at once.

When the contention was at its height, the Musical Union amended its by-laws, making one year's residence in Philadelphia a prerequisite to membership. This made membership for non-residents virtually prohibitory. I understand, upon the best of authority, that this amendment has been repealed.

In order to fully understand the union's opposition to foreign players, it must be remembered that this body forbids its members from playing in an orchestra containing non-union players. Now, if the union through its rules prevents a member from joining the orchestra (and the preference has always been given to Philadelphia musicians), his grievance is clearly against it and not against the management of the orchestra, which is anxious to engage him. It is difficult to see wherein these rules benefit Philadelphia's best musicians.

The soloists for the coming season of concerts are Hofmann, Schumann-Heink, Kreisler, Harold Bauer, Gregorowitsch, Gérardy, Miles and Liebling. Concerts will be given in Philadelphia on the following Saturday evenings, November 23, November 30, December 14, December 21, December 28, January 4, January 18, January 25, February 1, February 15, March 1, March 8, March 15 and March 22 and public Friday afternoon rehearsals preceding each concert. The orchestra will also play in Lancaster on December 3, January 27 and February 27; in York on December 10, January 13 and February 13; in Harrisburg on January 15, February 26 and March 17; in Reading on November 18, January 20 and March 3; in Allentown on January 21 and March 4; in Trenton on November 27, January 22 and March 5; in Wilmington on December 17, January 7 and February 13.

Among the box holders for the concerts at the Academy of Music in this city are the following: Mrs. Spencer Ervin, L. G. Fouse, Mrs. C. A. Griscom, John H. Converse, Miss M. K. Gibson, Mrs. Chas. W. Henry, N. A. Taylor, C. H. Kuhn, C. S. Bement, Mrs. A. J. Cassatt, A. C. Harrison, Dr. de La Roche, Mrs. G. M. Freeman, Henry Whelen, Jr., Mrs. Joseph Leidy, Jr., J. G. Klemm, F. T. S. Darley, Mrs. H. P. McKean, Mrs. F. H. Rosengarten, S. T. Bodine, Mrs. Thos. S. Harrison, Mrs. Louis F. Benson, Mrs. S. P. Wetherill, Mrs. Florence Fox, Jas. W. Paul, Jr., Andrew Wheeler, Jr., Mr. Rossmassler, Alex. Van Rensselaer, Geo. C. Thomas.

The board of directors of the Mendelssohn Club have issued a prospectus announcing the opening of the club's twenty-seventh season. The present season will consist of three concerts to be given at the Academy of Music on Thursday evening, December 12, March 6 and May 8. The soloists will be Pol Plançon, for the first concert; Miss Suzanne Adams or Frau Fritzi Scheff, for the second, and Madame Schumann-Heink for the third.

A partial list of the works to be performed by the Kneisel Quartet in Philadelphia this season includes quartets op. 18, No. 2; op. 59, No. 1; op. 132 and op. 135, by Beethoven. Haydn, Mozart, Brahms, Tschaikowsky, César Franck, Grieg and Loeffler are also represented. The compositions which will be played for the first time at these concerts are sonata for piano and violoncello, Ba[illegible]; Quartet for piano and strings, d'Indy; Quartet in C ma[illegible], Novaceka (manuscript); Quartet in C minor, Debus[illegible]; Quintet for piano and strings, Chadwick.

Mildenberg's Busy Season Has Begun.

ALBERT MILDENBERG is again in the midst of [illegible] almost overwhelming class of interesting piano [illegible] dents at his studio at Carnegie Hall, and also at the C[illegible]sical School for Girls, where he is director of the dep[illegible]ment of music. Piano students have been convinced [illegible] Mr. Mildenberg is able to train and coach them in [illegible] legitimate and higher lines of piano study. The convic[illegible] emanates from the fact some of the most talented pi[illegible] students in New York city, and from all points in [illegible] United States, are with him this season for serious w[illegible]

Mr. Mildenberg's plan this season is to bring before [illegible] public one student each month, who will play a rec[illegible] with the assistance of some well-known vocal artist [illegible] each recital. This will enable the pupils to become [illegible] customed to public performance, and to lose that [illegible] vousness which is the terror of all débuts. The first p[illegible] to be heard was Miss Gertrude Hilton, who success[illegible] appeared at Carnegie Hall on October 10. Her pla[illegible] won the most favorable criticisms from all sources. [illegible] Hilton was formerly a pupil of Raif in Berlin, but [illegible] turned to America and continued her work with [illegible] Mildenberg, who prepared her for this recital enti[illegible] This speaks volumes for the American teachers, of w[illegible] Mr. Mildenberg is proud to be counted one of. His [illegible] pils play with ease and grace, with surety of technic [illegible] beauty of tone, and are compelled to memorize ev[illegible] thing they study.

More Maconda Dates.

ANNOUNCEMENT was made in last week's issu[illegible] THE MUSICAL COURIER of Mme. Charlotte Macon[illegible] transcontinental recital and concert tour. Since that [illegible] nouncement so great has been the demand for Madame [illegible] conda's appearances in other cities than those named [illegible] Manager Charlton has been compelled to extend the [illegible] both as to time and territory, and dates are now bein[illegible] ranged which will be definitely announced later. Thos[illegible] Salt Lake City and Denver are set for December 6 a[illegible] respectively, and engagements already made in Have[illegible] Mass., and Brooklyn, N. Y., will have to be deferred [illegible] later in the season when the popular and gifted so[illegible] shall have returned to the East. En route back to [illegible] York Madame Maconda will sing with the Male Cl[illegible] Club, in Toronto, Canada, February 6, and a month [illegible] on March 6, she has been engaged as soloist with the [illegible] phony Orchestra in Detroit, Mich.

THE LEONORA JACKSON TOUR.—Managers Jackson [illegible] Wakefield report that the Leonora Jackson tour is b[illegible] solid to Christmas with the exception of three dates. [illegible] are now under negotiation. The demand for Le[illegible] Jackson and her company is so great that her record [illegible] of 161 concerts last season bids fair to be more [illegible] duplicated this winter.

MUSIC IN THE TWIN CITIES.

Twin City Office THE MUSICAL COURIER,
825 HAGUE AVENUE,
ST. PAUL, Minn., October 1, 1901.

THE St. Paul Choral Club has made two more important bookings for its concert series, and has secured Electa Gifford, the American coloratura soprano, for "The Creation" in April; also John W. Lince, a prominent oratorio basso, who is fast becoming a concert favorite in the West. The Choral has now completed its list of artists for the three concerts which are to be given the People's Church. The club has started out so auspiciously in its second year, and is doing so much in bringing fine artists to the city for the production of great masterpieces that one is reminded that it is among the educational advantages offered to the musician and student during the year's musical season. The rehearsals for "The Messiah" are in progress.

The artists already engaged are Genevieve Clark-Wilson, Mabelle Crawford, Glen Hall and Joseph Baernstein for "The Messiah."

For the second concert, February 13, part songs and recital, Sara Anderson, soloist.

For the third concert, Thursday, April 13, "The Creation," Electa Gifford, Theodore Van Yorx and John W. Lince.

The sale of season tickets for the Y. M. C. A. course is progressing rapidly, and everything points to unusual success. The series is quite unparalleled from the standpoint of music and novelty of entertainment. The charges for course tickets are only nominal for the best seats, while tickets to 1,500 seats are sold so low as to make each number cost a mere trifle. An additional feature has been added since the course was announced in Emil Liebling, the Chicago pianist, who has been engaged to appear with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra January 31. Mr. Liebling has hosts of friends in the musical circles of both cities, who have long wished for his appearance here as a soloist with some of the musical clubs. Mr. Liebling will play a novelty in piano literature in introducing the Moszkowski Concerto, op. 59, for piano and orchestra, which received its initial performance in America at the Mendelssohn Club concert, February 8, 1900, Theodore Thomas directing.

The course up to date is as follows:

Ernest Seton Thompson, November 22; Madame Nordica, December 3; Whitney-Mockridge Company, December 13; Chicago Symphony Orchestra, Emil Liebling pianist, January 10; Jacob A. Riis, January 21; English Bell Ringers, January 30; Leland T. Powers, February 7; Katherine Ridgeway Company, March 4; Dr. Henry Van Dyke, March 10, and Robert J. Burdette, March 27.

Camilla Urso, assisted by Mrs. M. O. Graves, soprano, will give a recital Friday evening, November 1, at Park Congregational Church.

Dr. W. Rhys-Herbert has returned from London, after an absence of more than a year. Dr. Rhys-Herbert has been engaged in advanced study in harmony, voice and organ.

Franklin W. Krieger, pianist, will give his début recital November 1 at Mozart Hall and will be assisted by Miss Anna Williams, soprano; Miss Jane Wakeman, accompanist; Harry E. George, tenor.

MINNEAPOLIS.

The opening meeting of the Ladies' Thursday Musicale was held Thursday morning at the Unitarian Church and was a delightful affair socially and artistically. The church was completely filled with enthusiastic members and their friends and all seemed eager to begin the serious work of the year. Mrs. G. E. Ricker, president of the club, gave a warm and cordial greeting to the members and their guests, and expressed the hope that they might all soon be enrolled in the membership. The meeting was the tenth anniversary of the club, for which occasion Mrs. Ricker had prepared a paper of self-congratulations. The plan of the work of the Musicale for the year has been the subject of careful thought and its general idea is for two composers to be represented in each of the study programs, one a classic master, the other a modern. The day's program was from Verdi and Nevin, and was opened with an eight-hand arrangement of "Giovanni d'Arco" by Verdi, played by Mrs. Runyan, Mrs. Morton, Miss Brundage, Mrs. Jones. Two Verdi songs sung by Miss Gertrude Hale, and the "Ernani" aria, sung by Miss Clara Williams, "Rigoletto" quartet, Maud Ulmer Jones, Mrs. Porteus, Harry George and C. E. Fisher. The Nevin numbers were played by Mrs. Mamie Swanberg and Constance Osborn and a group of his most popular songs by U. S. Kerr.

The musical event of next week will be the violin recital given by Mme. Camilla Urso in Plymouth Church, Tuesday evening, for the Ladies' Thursday Musicale. Madame Urso will be assisted by Mrs. Maud Ulmer Jones, soprano; Mrs. Sheldon Pearce, pianist, and Mrs. Pearce and Miss Gertrude Sans Souci will be the accompanists. The program will be one of rare interest and will include a capriccio by Niels Gade, which was found among the composer's papers after his death and was introduced by Madame Urso to the American public during her concert season of 1895. Another pleasant feature will be the "Melodie Elegiaque," by Emil Ober-Hoffer, which Mr. Ober-Hoffer has dedicated to Madame Urso, and he will accompany the violinist in the rendition of the composition.

The concert is a treat to the members of the club, and they have the privilege of securing an extra ticket at half the general admission price at the studio. The committee has graciously listened to the expressed desire of the public to be admitted to this concert, and tickets have been placed on sale at the Metropolitan Music Store.

The program in full is as follows:

Piano, Prelude in C sharp minor.....Rachmaninoff
Etude .....Schütt
Mrs. Sheldon Pearce.
Song, Mignon.....Liszt
Maud Ulmer Jones.
Violin, Theme and Variations in D minor.....Corelli (1658-1713)
Camilla Urso.
Piano, Morceau de Concert, En Route.....Godard
Mrs. Sheldon Pearce.
Violin—
Guitarre .....Lalo
Andante Cantabile.....Sgambati
Variations Brillantes.....Camilla Urso
Camilla Urso.
Songs—
Wishes .....Sans Souci
Butterflies and Buttercups.....Victor Harris
Love in May.....Parker
Maud Ulmer Jones.
Violin, Melodie Elegiaque.....Emil Ober Hoffer
(Dedicated to Mme. Camilla Urso and accompanied by the composer.)
Violin, Capriccio (op. posthumous).....Gade
Camilla Urso.

Herman Zoch gave the first of his piano recitals this season at Unitarian Church, playing a program of five Beethoven sonatas on October 23.

A delightful course of recitals will be given in the Johnson School of Music this winter by the members of the faculty. The course will be opened Wednesday afternoon at 3.o'clock with a lecture recital by Edward Baxter Perry, the blind pianist. Mr. Perry was the originator of the lecture recital, and his plan of prefacing each composition with a brief descriptive and explanatory talk makes his programs of unusual interest.

The other programs will be given by Carl Riedelsberger, assisted by Mrs. Vienna Neel Connor, Miss Lydia Burton, Mrs. Charles Holt, Gustavus Johnson, Charles Swenson, Miss Oda Birkenhauer, Mrs. Rodney N. Parks, Miss Nellie Odegard and Russell Patterson.

Mr. Crosse will give the third and fourth of his series of Bach recitals this week. The first program will be the "Partita's," the E minor complete and selections from the five remaining ones. The second program will be from "The Well Tempered Clavichord," a collection of Bach's finest preludes and fugues. In these master works Bach gave the musical world its richest legacy.

Hamlin H. Hunt will give an organ recital in Plymouth Church, Tuesday, November 5, and will be assisted by Mrs. H. C. Truesdale, vocalist.

A series of sonata concerts by Miss Verna Golden and Carlyle Scott will be given before the holidays, the first on Friday night at the Unitarian Church. The programs for the first two concerts will be made up entirely of sonatas for the piano and violin. The capabilities of both artists are so well known and appreciated that the concerts are being anticipated with much pleasure. The programs are certain not only to have a marked educational value but to afford entertainment of a high order. The first program includes sonatas by Locatelli, Beethoven, Hauptmann and Grieg.

Mrs. Louis Marchand Park will sing at the opening program of the Schubert Club in St. Paul Wednesday.

An interesting recital was given last evening in Unitarian Church by the faculty of the Northwestern Conservatory of Music. The program was given by Miss Sans Souci, Miss Bartholomew, Clarence Marshall, John Parsons Meach, Mr. Christiansen and Mr. Robertson.

GERTRUDE SANS-SOUCI.

Glasgow Gives Sousa an Ovation.

LONDON, November 4, 1901.

SOUSA'S Band received a memorable ovation last Saturday night at the close of its engagement at the Glasgow Exhibition. The great assemblage attempted to carry the conductor on their shoulders.

Sousa began a tour of the provinces last Monday night at Middlesborough.

A DEVINE PUPIL SECURES CHURCH POSITION.—Mary Louise Gehle has been successful in securing the position of contralto soloist of St. Stephen's choir after a large number of voices were heard for the position. St. Stephen's, under the direction of Mr. Le Jeune, is noted for its high standard of music, and the distinction for this reason is more highly regarded. Miss Gehle has a decidedly brilliant future before her. Her voice is aptly described as phenomenal, and her training has been entirely under Mme. Lena Doria Devine.

SONGS BY GERTRUDE SANS SOUCI.—Miss Sans Souci, of St. Paul, has published three new songs, entitled "Wishes," "In Dreams I Linger with Thee," published by the Metropolitan Music Company, of Minneapolis, Minn., and "My Heart in Singing," published by Oliver Ditson Company, Boston.

BUFFALO MUSIC.

BUFFALO, November 1, 1901.

AS the gates close and the last electric light goes out at the Pan-American grounds, Buffalonians turn with renewed energy and enthusiasm gained from the many enjoyable musical attractions at the Exposition to their own local interests in the divine art.

Mr. and Mrs. Frank Davidson will fill a long felt want among music students this season by giving eighteen evenings with "Music and Musical History." Besides four request evenings, there will be the following: First and Second Classical Periods—Beethoven; Bach and Beethoven; Beethoven's contemporaries; Schubert chamber music. Romantic Period—Chopin; Schumann. Modern Composers—Brahms; Wagner; Richard Strauss and Dvorák; and American composers.

At the first evening, October 29, an interesting program of piano and violin music was given by Mr. and Mrs. Davidson, Miss Burns, Miss Kean and Mr. Hahn. The selections were all from the first classical period, in which the great mass of students are too little interested, and a most instructive talk was given by Mrs. Davidson. May this good work go on throughout the city.

Recently, Liza Lehmann's "Daisy Chain" was given successfully by the quartet of the First Congregation Church, under the direction of the organist, Mr. Montague. The names of the members of the quartet, Miss Chase, Miss Gates, Mr. Elliott and Mr. Robertson, would be vouchers for the artistic perfection of the evening, and the expectations of the listeners were entirely fulfilled.

The professional musical circle has been enlarged by the removal to the city of Mr. and Mrs. George Szag, violinist and pianist, formerly of Binghamton, N. Y. Friday week Mr. and Mrs. Szag gave a charming musicale at their new home in honor of Mr. and Mrs. G. E. Gale, of Binghamton. The following program was given:

Concerto (two pianos).....Mozart
Miss Manning and Mrs. Szag.
Violin solo, from Suite in G minor.....Kies
George Szag.
Soprano soli—
Happy Days.....Streletzki
Silent Night.....Bohm
Mrs. Geo. E. Gale.
Piano solo, Twelfth Rhapsodie.....Liszt
Mrs. Elsbeth Meyer-Szag.
Violin solo, Faust Fantaisie.....Sarasate
Mr. Szag.
Piano solo, Polonaise.....X. Scharwenka
Miss Caroline Manning.

Henry Lautz has just written for and dedicated to Miss Helen Gould a charming song, "The Brook and the Ocean." Mr. Lautz has made an ideal setting to Longfellow's poem (Miss Gorld's favorite) and the song surpasses its numerous pleasing predecessors.

Sunday evening, at the Teck Theatre, a farewell concert was given by the Royal Bavarian Infantry Band, under the direction of Herr Jacob Peuppus. The daily concerts for six months of this band at Alt Nürnberg have won so much praise from the thousands of Pan-American visitors that added praise for director and musicians would be superfluous.

The program was enhanced by the appearance of the Upper Bavarian Peasant Troupe. The following selections were given:

Overture, Rienzi.....Wagner
Fantaisie, The Folklunger.....Kretschmer
Selection from The Singing Girl.....Victor Herbert
Morgenblaetter Waltz.....Johann Strauss
The famous Koenigseer Upper Bavarian Peasant Troupe.
Grand Fantaisie from Der Freischütz.....Weber Overture, Banditenstreiche.....Suppe
Aus grosser Zeit (grand military potpourri).....Jacob Peuppus
The famous Koenigseer Upper Bavarian Peasant Troupe.
American Fantaisie.....Victor Herbert
All Electric Polka.....Jacob Peuppus
Mussinan March.....Carl

At the first recital of its eighth season the Ionian Musical Club gave the following program at the studio of Mrs. Gould, Ashland avenue:

MODERN COMPOSERS.
Fantaisie on Modern Operas.....Epstein
Miss Bonham and Miss Cummings.
Evening in Algiers.....Saint-Saëns
Miss Davidson.
Soprano solo, Night Time.....Vandewater
Miss McCormick.
Les Hirondelles, op. 14.....Godard
Miss Hameister.
Supplication.....Julie Rive-King
Miss Dewey.
Baritone solo, It Was a Dream.....Bartlett
Walter B. Livingston.
Meditation.....Raff
Miss Parkinson.

Burmeister's Triumph in Boston.

RICHARD BURMEISTER'S great success at the Worcester Festival with his performance of Liszt's "Concerto Pathetique" was duplicated last Saturday in Boston at the second concert of the Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Gericke. Novelties among piano concertos are rare, and the great army of pianists in Boston was looking forward with eagerness to the one with which Mr. Burmeister made his r'entrée in Boston this season. There was, of course, much discussion as to the merits of the neglected concerto by Liszt, but no one could deny that Mr. Burmeister again won an extraordinary success with it, this time even in conservative Boston, the old Leipsic of America. The performance was a model one, Mr. Gericke taking great pains in bringing out the beauties of the work—probably Mr. Burmeister has never before heard the Fugato for the strings so clearly and cleanly executed.

The Boston press, like the audience, gave an enthusiastic verdict about the performance, of which a few extracts follow here:

Mr. Burmeister's skill in rearranging the Chopin F minor Concerto was shown some four years ago at the Symphony concert and, quite naturally, his contribution to the concerto of last week was specially interesting. In the Chopin work he rescored and developed the thin orchestration in a masterly manner, and with the second piano part of the Liszt Concerto he has performed a task of much greater difficulty, and with results equally successful. This was shown last month at the Worcester Festival and further demonstrated at the Symphony concerts. A pupil of Liszt and familiar with his ideas, Mr. Burmeister has been able to retain the master's characteristics in the new orchestral score, and by changing the piano parts in some instances make the work much more effective than it was in its original form.

Mr. Burmeister's playing was very brilliant and full of expression, and his whole performance suggested a sure and sympathetic understanding of the work he interpreted. He did not force the tones, and he displayed the poetic nature of the composition to the fullest, especially in the dreamy andante, where the piano sings its delightful melody accompanied by muted strings. His command of the instrument is thorough, and his finger work is of the highest grade of dexterity and ranks with the foremost among the contemporary artists. Mr. Burmeister was cordially received and heartily applauded at the close of his performance.—Boston Globe.

The pianist is to be thanked for giving us something comparatively unhackneyed. Mr. Burmeister played with clear and crisp technic and an artistic sense that was most satisfactory. It was a notable case of man and orchestra in perfect balance.—Boston Traveller.

Mr. Burmeister has done his self-appointed task cleverly, for he is a well equipped musician and understands the adaptation of means to ends. The arrangement is interesting as a reply to the old question, "What will he do with it?"

Mr. Burmeister has already made his mark in Boston as a pianist of completely developed technic, of good sense and ready judgment, sure and strong in decision, ready and resourceful in execution, of clear understanding and scholarly delivery, using his virtuosity better than for mere display, and therefore entitled to respect as much as applause.

All these excellent qualities he brought to bear upon this work, but he could not make it better or more effective than it is intrinsically. The andante, which fitted with the orchestra best of all he accompanied and assisted admirably, and the vehement and full toned finale which he had contrived won him a double recall.—Boston Herald.

WOMEN'S STRING ORCHESTRA REHEARSING.—The Women's String Orchestra has begun its sixth season of weekly rehearsals under Director Carl V. Lachmund, in the chapel of the Church of the Holy Communion. The members are in future to be classified, so that those of greater experience receive in addition to their share of the season's surplus a special bonus, for which purpose a fund is now assured. This will add largely toward placing the orchestra on a still higher standard.

GEORG KRUGER, of the Conservatory of Music faculty, gave the first public piano recital of the season Tuesday evening, October 29, in the Recital Hall of that institution, presenting the following program:

gic Fire Scene.....Wagner-Brassin
k, Hark, the Lark!.....Schubert-Liszt de de Concert.....Rubinstein ata, op. 53, C major.....Beethoven me Varie, op. 16, No. 3, A major.....Paderewski de.....Chopin ade, op. 47, No. 3.....Chopin des Ohdes.....Leschetizky
ngarian Dance.....Brahms miniscences from Faust.....Gounod-Liszt aphrase de Concert.....Gounod-Liszt

I never heard Mr. Krüger play to better advantage. He med to have an absolute sense of values; his use of the al was at all times judicious and his poetic sense as- ted itself to an unusual degree. Technically Mr. Krü- has acquired a singing quality in the tone which he duces that few pianists possess. In the most difficult sages that tone is predominant. He has been accused using too much physical force at times, but he could be charged with such a fault on this occasion. It was sical tone, nicely graded, well shaded; the expression houghtful conviction. His interpretation of the sonata not so much intellectual as it was deep, passionate emotional. In pieces of an entirely different genre— h as the Paderewski "Variations," Mr. Krüger ex- ed by reason of the buoyancy and vitality which he im- ted to them. Mr. Krüger is a pianist who is constantly wing in artistic proportion.

rof. A. J. Gantvoort, of the College of Music, will de- r the first of a series of lectures on the history of music Monday, November 4, at 1:30 p. m. The lectures will tinue to be given at that hour on Mondays, as during past five seasons. The course comprises twenty lectures ll, and its importance can scarcely be overestimated— neglect not less than deplorable. It is hoped that many lents both in and out of the college will make use of opportunity to bring themselves into closer touch with art to whose technic they are willing to devote so much heir time, but with whose history and development they not acquainted.

very interesting program has been arranged for the faculty concert of the season of the College of Music Friday evening, November 8, in the Odeon. Ernest Wilbur Hale, pianist, and Edmund A. Jahn, baritone, are the participants. Following is the program:

Thus Saith the Lord (Messiah).....Händel
Sei mir Gegruest.....Schubert-Liszt
Fantaisie Impromptu, C sharp minor.....Chopin
Der Atlas.....Schubert
The Tear.....Tschaikowsky
Youth.....Meyer-Helmund

Dr. Nicholas J. Elsenheimer, of the College of Music, delivered the second lecture of the series on sacred music last Wednesday afternoon in the Lyceum. A very attentive and appreciative audience attended. There has been quite an increase in the enrollment in the new department for the study of the Gregorian chant. Dr. Elsenheimer is the instructor.

The first of the series of lectures on the voice was delivered by Dr. Wade Thrasher, of the College of Music, Friday afternoon in the Lyceum. A large number attended, the widespread invitation sent out to the members of the vocal profession by Dr. Thrasher no doubt being responsible for it.

Among the interesting numbers to be heard at the two piano recital to be given this month by Signor Romeo Gorno and Dr. Nicholas J. Elsenheimer, of the College of Music, will be a Scherzo in E flat, written by Signor Albino Gorno, principal of the piano department of the college. Brahms' gypsy songs will be given by a vocal quartet composed of Miss Katherine Gibbons, soprano; Miss Elsie Louise Bernard, contralto; J. Wesley Hubbell, tenor, and Edmund A. Jahn, baritone, who are to assist. Miss Gibbons is a pupil of W. S. Sterling, and Miss Bernard and Mr. Hubbell are pupils of Signor Lino Mattioli; Mr. Jahn is a member of the college faculty.

"A Question of Pride," a four act comedy, will be presented by the School of Expression, under the direction of Miss Mannheimer, next Saturday evening in the Odeon. The School of Expression is the elocution department of the College of Music. Following is the program:

Constance Kenworth.....Cora Kahn
Dorothy, her sister.....Mabel Brownell
Mary Ann.....Blanch Sternberger
Perkins.....Mary E. Rusk
Miss Tibbetts.....Florence Shaw
Mr. Allen.....Adolph P. Osler
Horace Greyburne.....George Crawford
David Fosdick.....Charles R. Chesley
James Sharpless.....Alfred Bauer
Mr. Russell.....Harry Weber
Mr. Tibbetts.....W. Worrall Hetherington
John Blake.....Leroy Fahnestock
Act I.—Kenworth.
Act II.—Four months later. Back parlor of Mr. Fosdick's shop.
Act III.—A month later. The same time, evening.
Act IV.—The same time, next morning.

CONCERT AIDS ENDOWMENT FUND.

SEVERAL hundred dollars were added to the Twentieth Century Endowment Fund of the "Old First" Presbyterian Church through a concert given last Tuesday (October 29) evening in the Chapel of the Church, corner Eleventh street and Fifth avenue. The far-reaching work for music accomplished by William C. Carl, the organist and musical director, is reflected in the active interest and generous support of musical affairs by the members of this historic New York church. The idea of raising an endowment fund is to establish the church as a permanent institution to future generations in the community. By and by it will be referred to as "a downtown" church, but those who love this stately old church for its noble past are the ones laboring to raise an endowment which will insure it financial support far into the future years. The aim is to make it a cathedral church to the Presbyterian denomination.

The concert last Tuesday evening was given under the auspices of the Christian Endeavor Society of the church. Mr. Carl directed the musical program. The artists who appeared were Mme. Lisa Delhaze Wickes, pianist; Alfred Donaldson Wickes, violinist; Mrs. Mary Elizabeth Cheney, soprano; Mrs. Antonia Sawyer, contralto; E. Ellsworth Giles, tenor, and Ed. Bromberg, basso. The program was:

Piano, Fantaisie Impromptu.....Chopin
Madame Lisa Delhaze Wickes.
A Song of Thanksgiving.....Frances Allitsen
E. Ellsworth Giles.
Songs—
When Myra Sings.....Lehman
Chanson Tendre.....Bemberg
The Little Red Lark.....C. Villiers Stanford
Mrs. Mary Elizazbeth Cheney.
Violin, Romance.....Wieniawski
Alfred Donaldson Wickes.
Songs—
Das Kraut Vergessen Heit.....Von Fielitz
Er der Herrlichste von allen.....Schumann
Mrs. Antonia Sawyer.
Aria, Infelice, from Ernani.....Verdi
Edward Bromberg.
Piano, Etude de Concert.....Martucci
Madame Wickes.
Songs—
The Ash Grove.....Old Welsh
The Bells of Aberdovey.....Old Welsh
The Missing Boat.....Old Welsh
Mrs. Mary Elizabeth Cheney.
Violin, Scherzo.....Van Goens
Alfred Donaldson Wickes.
Songs—
Berceuse (Manuscript, first time).....Charles E. Ives
Die Lotos-Blume.....Charles E. Ives
E. Ellsworth Giles.
Songs—
Demande.....Cecile Dufresne
If I Were Loved.....Stahlschmidt
Mrs. Antonia Sawyer.
Song, The Two Grenadiers.....Schumann
Edward Bromberg.

Mr. Carl played the piano accompaniments for the four singers with that skill and sympathy that appeal to an audience and enhance the good points in a singer. All of the artists were received with cordial applause, and extra songs and numbers were demanded. The souvenir program sold during the evening contained a brief history of the church, and a chapter was devoted to the musical advancement made under Mr. Carl's direction.

THE program of the third Symphony concert, given last night in Symphony Hall, Mr. Gericke conductor, was as follows:

Overture, Bacchanale, scene between Venus and Tannhäuser (Tannhäuser).
Walther's Prize Song (Die Meistersinger).
Siegfried's Parting from Brünnhilde. Siegfried's Death. Funeral March. Finale (Die Götterdämmerung).

All the music, as you see, was by one Richard Wagner. O Richard! O mon roi! as the laborers in the Wagnerian vineyard are accustomed to sing when the whistle blows and they begin or lay aside their joyful task.

These pieces are familiar to you all; they will be performed this week in New York by the same players and the same singers, Miss Ternina and Mr. Van Hoose. Therefore I do not propose to speak of the music itself, except as I may use it for a peg from which to hang digressions.

The Bacchanale and the extended scene between Venus and the Knight provoke comment, even though there be no ballet on the stage, even though the hearer be no longer an active member of the Society for Physical Research.

It has long been the opinion among the chelas of the Wagnerian faith, an opinion derived from earnest and thrifty lecturers, full-fledged mahatmas, makers of books and other eminent persons, that "Tannhäuser" was "hooted and hissed" off the stage of the Opéra because the exemplary Wagner would not supply a ballet for the base enjoyment of the members of the Jockey Club. The name of this club is mentioned by lecturers in tones that are not unlike those of a stuffed horn, to show their detestation of a society that was founded originally at Sodom and had a large non-resident membership in Gomorrah.

We find even Mr. Finck, whose biography of Wagner is still by far the most valuable and entertaining, writing concerning the ballet scene in the first act of the opera: "Unfortunately, this scene, as imagined by him, presented difficulties insuperable to the ballet corps even of the Grand Opéra, an institution which had degenerated at that time into little more than a pretext for ballet performances—that is, the crude, clumsy and lascivious anatomical exhibitions and tiptoe dancing which, by some strange occultation of all æsthetic powers of discrimination, used to be considered 'graceful.'"

Mr. Finck's book was published in 1893. In 1895, when "Tannhäuser" was revived at the Opéra, Paris, the ballet master who was at the Opéra in 1861, M. Lucien Petitpa, was asked to give his reminiscences.

It was Petitpa who had charge of the Bacchanale, and he told his story of those stormy days and nights in the Journal des Débats, April 21, 1895. The librettist Nuitter took him to see Wagner, who was living in the rue d'Aumale. "As soon as we were there, the composer sat down before the piano. He played with indescribable dash and fury; his hands crushed the keys. At the same time he would throw himself about, call out the entrances of the groups, and try to invoke the scenes of the terrible Bacchanale: 'Arrival of fauns and satyrs—they throw everything into confusion; disorder is at its height,' shrieked the composer, and under his hands, which kept striking the keys, the musical delirium waxed greater and greater. While he was thumping out a succession of shuddering chords, Wagner suddenly cried: 'A thunderbolt strikes; we are all dead.' At that very moment a cart emptied paving stones in the street. There was a terrible and prolonged noise. Wagner turned about, stupefied, and we three looked at one another with staring eyes. Not for some seconds did we come to ourselves. And that was the way I was initiated into the new music."

Wagner gave Petitpa a kind of scenario, a piece of paper on which the number of measures affected by each phase of the Bacchanale was indicated. We know from this how he wished the Bacchanale to be performed in 1861:

"TANNHAUSER."

INTRODUCTION.

SYMPHONIE DANSEE.

1. The curtain rises. Twelve measures (very lively). Voluptuous dance of the Nymphs. They call to them young men, who are lowered.
2. Twelve measures. Ensemble.
3. Twelve measures. Fresh groups arrive down stage. Entrance of Bacchantes.
4. Sixteen measures. Bacchanale. Frenetic dance.
5. Sixteen or twenty-four measures. Predominance of the voluptuous element. The Nymphs lead in action.
6. Sixteen measures. Impetuosity. The men take an active part. At the same time new groups (Fauns, Satyrs, &c.) come always down stage.
7. Twenty-four or thirty-two measures. Delirium increases. Cries, howls of joy.
8. Twenty-six to thirty measures. Furious stampings. Fauns and Satyrs lead the rout. Constant crescendo.
9. Sixteen measures. Height of delirium and disorder.
10. (Three-quarter molto moderato): Sixteen or twenty-four measures. A flight of Cupids. They fire their arrows at the groups and subdue their fury. An amorous languor succeeds to the delirium. The Nymphs and the young men are raised slowly. The Bacchantes, Fauns and Satyrs go up stage.
11. Thirty-two measures (dolce). Intervention of Venus, the three Graces and other gracious divinities. Calm is re-established. Dance of Graces, accompanied by the song of invisible sirens.
12. Thirty-two measures. Continuation of dance of Graces and the other gracious divinities.
13. Thirty-two measures. Still a slow and graceful movement. Rosy mists hide the back of the stage.
14. Thirty-two measures. Exit of Graces. End of the dance.

Petitpa was a conscientious man. "I went to the Louvre to copy the ancient marbles for the group of the three Graces; I have the drawing even now. But it was not worth while to be so conscientious, for no dance lasted over a few minutes. Do I say dance? I should say tableaux vivants. Wagner was well satisfied with the manner in which his Bacchanale was presented. And he was not an easy one to satisfy. Quel diable d'homme!"

But was Wagner satisfied?

It appears from others that he wished more sensuous fury, greater amorous ardor. "M. Petitpa went to the point beyond which the habits of decency at the Académie Impériale de Musique would not allow him to pass."

Thus the tableaux vivants, "The Rape of Europa" and "Leda and the Swan," which should have come at the end of the Bacchanale, were not seen. The ballet girls were not then in the habit of wholly undressing for the stage, and these groups were to be represented by artists' models. Trials were made. Then this scheme was abandoned. Sketches were photographed and were to be thrown on the stage, but they were never used.

Why could not these sketches be used as stereoptic illustrations in concert as well as lecture? A darkened hall would delight believers in Pudor's theory that music is not well heard in a bright light; and in the most passionate moments the conductor could touch a button and Fauns and Bacchantes would embrace or Europa would ride in a voluptuous sprawl on the bull's back or Leda would stroke the cool neck of the Swan. The half of a dollar might be added easily to such an educative concert.

Furthermore, Wagner's friends protested against the "glacial" performance of this Bacchanale. Gasperini called it an orgy at a young ladies' boarding school, and Leroy cursed the poor girls because they danced with as much dignity as though they were in the "Gardens of the Alcazar, the delight of Moorish kings."

Now one word about the "hooting and hissing" of the opera from the stage. Mr. Finck is better informed on this point than are some of his colleagues. He publishes the fact that Wagner himself withdrew "Tannhäuser" that Walewsky and Royer agreed to his wish only with reluctance, because there was intense desire to hear the work, and the house was sold out for many performances ahead. We know that Royer, the manager, counted on at least twenty-five or thirty performances. And he did not love Wagner.

There was a cabal against "Tannhäuser." This fact is well established. Whether the two music critics, Scudo and Héquet, were at the head of it is not so sure.

The Jockey Club has had its defenders. There is no doubt but that the members were furious because there was no ballet in the second act; but the Prince de Sagan, who was a member in 1861, protested in 1895, "in the name of his old colleagues," against the widespread and ill-founded reproach. The fact that the Count Mosbourg and the Marquis de Gaucourt were Wagnerians in 1861 does not account for the actions of the others.

Baudelaire wrote at the time: "That men who can afford the luxury of a mistress among the dancers at the Opéra should long to see the talents and the beauty of their purchase put as often as possible in full light is indeed a paternal sentiment that everybody will understand and excuse. But that these same men, without regard for the public curiosity and the pleasures of others, should prevent the performance of a work which displeases them because it does not satisfy the demands of their protectorate—that is not to be endured. Keep your harem and preserve therein religiously the traditions; but let us have a theatre where they who do not think as you can find other pictures better suited to their taste. Then we shall be right, you, you of us, and everybody will be satisfied."

Furthermore, the story that the Princess Metterigry, broke her fan at the third performance is purely gendary, in spite of Jules Janin's elegy, "Il est brisé, le l éventail!"

Georges Servières, who sums up the matter admirably ter painstaking examination, does not assign the withawal of the opera to the inefficiency or malice of Dietsch, e conductor, or to the row raised by the Jockey Club. ie sluggishness of the conductor and the orchestra; the decent behavior of the members of the club no doubt aded Wagner into writing his request. There were more portant reasons for the failure: the protection of the incess Metternich and the personal interference of the nperor provoked the wrath of other composers and their lowers—we all know, for instance, how badly poor Berz behaved. Politics entered in; those opposed to the nperor hissed the opera brought out by his command. ie unfortunate disposition of Wagner himself had much do with his fate; his o'erweening pride, his suspicious ture, his want of tact, his cubbishness—these made the all minded bitterly hostile, and many of these small nded persons were journalists. His friends had bored public by talking and writing about the music of the ure. Nor did the publication of his "Letter on Music," h the sniffs at composers liked in France, ingratiate him h the public.

The French public, as a whole, if we may judge from ntemporaneous writing and from what Wagner himself d, treated him with much courtesy and fairness. A risian public could hardly be expected in an opera that luded passionate praise of Venus to understand the apition of "troubadours in apricot tights celebrating to harp platonic love and inquiring into its essence."

As a concert piece this Bacchanale is brilliant and exng, but in the theatre I prefer the old version, and efly for this reason: the Bacchanale written in the ech of music drama is out of place in this opera as gner conceived it. It is as a warm and glowing piece tapestry hung in a large, high, cool hall of neutral s. With this Bacchanale the opera ceases to be homoeous. Nor do I prefer the lengthened version of ius, scolding, whining, entreating, cursing, to the rter scene. If Wagner had only cut out that ugliest of ugly tunes, the hymn to Venus that the wretched ight is made to sing! No Italian, even in the most deerate days, ever wrote such vile measures.

I wonder if anybody except the proofreader ever read whole of an "Etude sur Tannhäuser," by Alfred Ernst Elie Poirée. Pages 18 to 27 are given up to analyof the different characters. (Only the shepherd boy mitted.) I learn that "timid souls have been shocked Wagner's boldness" in putting Venus on the stage. haps they order these things better in France. Venus have seen her in Germany and the United States was erally between thirty-five years of age—as Artemus rd would say—and weighed at least 210 pounds—I k it would be better to estimate it after the English ion, in stones. Venus, it appears, is a woman of exling complexity. She is the radiant Olympian, the eress, the Demon of the Middle Ages and the Lover. abeth redeems her, as well as triumphs over her. And e can be so much in one opera!

Wolfram stands on Erik's shoulders and announces is Sachs! And, indeed, he may do this or anything suits his fancy, if he will stick to the true pitch in the ired Romance.

ou may have thought that Hermann was merely a shocking example of the père noble, a colossal bore. I assure you he is nothing of the kind. Messrs. Ernst and Poirée make it clear that he is imposing, beautiful and human. His speech is full of kindliness and dignity; it is warm with feudal and national pride; and the singer should not forget to preserve the majestic elegance that characterizes a protector of the arts, who pays homage in the sight of the people to the talent of poets and the singers about love. Pol Plançon, as a Frenchman, probably knows this passage by heart. Hence the grandeur and beauty of his performance.

The authors say that Venus has "intonations caressantes"; that another characteristic is a descending fifth, perfect or diminished, from which it is seen she is naturally amiable and easily satisfied.

The concert was brilliant in all respects. The orchestra played with superb breadth and passion. Ternina, who was in excellent voice, sang with supreme artistry. Mr. Van Hoose, who made his first appearance at these concerts, performed admirably, at short notice, a difficult task. His voice is vigorous and manly; ready to respond to any strain; yet it lends itself easily to passages of gentler emotions.

The Kneisels gave a concert, the first of the season, in Chickering Hall, October 28. The program was made up of chamber music by Beethoven: Quartets, op. 18, No. 2; op. 59, No. 1, and the 'Cello Sonata, op. 69, played by Mr. Schroeder and Mrs. Beach. The concert was too long, far too long, and the pieces were too familiar. Mr. Schroeder played delightfully in the sonata.

Edwin H. Lemare gave an organ recital at Symphony Hall, October 29. He played Bach's Prelude and Fugue in D major and Fugue à la Gigue; his own Symphony in G minor and Meditation in D flat; his arrangement of the Prelude to "Parsifal," and pieces by Hollins and Wolstenholme. He has marked facility in command of the manuals and pedals, and he has an unusual sense of color effects. These effects are at times surprising and often beautiful. He is distinctly an orchestral player; he considers the organ as an instrument that may imitate the orchestra. The chief characteristic of the organ is an imposing, pontifical dignity that cannot be imitated by the orchestra. An oboe on the organ is not an orchestral oboe; and it lacks the individuality of the man that applies his lips. A violin passage cannot be reproduced on even one of these strange machines that are now called organs. And at his concert the hearer was often tempted to exclaim: "I would give a dollar to hear a diapason," in parody of Grétry's remark concerning "Uthal."

Carl Armbruster, assisted by Miss Pauline Cramer, gave the first of ten lectures on Wagner and his works in Chickering Hall, October 31. He talked about Wagner's life, "Rienzi" and "The Flying Dutchman." I stood it fairly well until 8:50 p. m., when he bowled me out by saying, in a clear, bell-like voice, that "Rienzi" was far superior to any opera by Meyerbeer. Miss Cramer sang "Schlaf ein holdes Kind," "Erwartung" and songs from "Rienzi" and "The Flying Dutchman."

The Era (London) is worth reading, not merely because it is known as "The Actor's Bible," but on account of the musical criticisms. Here are two instances:

"'Sakimtala' was the overture to one of Carl Goldmark's earlier operas. The composer, though little known in this country, is recognized in Austria as one of the ablest musicians."

This is still better:

"That César Franck will ever be popular in this country we do not believe, but as an original musician, who died too early to fully develop his ideas, much interest has been taken in his career." Poor Franck! If he had lived another month he would have been sixty-eight; and at eighty he might have done something with "his ideas."

Successful Faculty Concert.

THE studios of the American Institute of Applied Music were crowded Friday evening last week, when a recital was given by several members of the teaching staff. The following was the program:

Violin Sonata in G major.....Rubinstein
Alfred Donaldson Wickes.
Arioso Benvenuto.....Eugene Diez
McCall Lanham.
Sonata, C minor.....Beethoven
Mme. Lisa Delhaze-Wickes.
Songs—
Air.....Henry III
C'est mon ami.....Marie Antoinette

Violin soli—
Aria (on G string).....Bach
Scherzo.....Van Goens
Alfred Donaldson Wickes.
The Quest.....Smith
McCall Lanham.
Scherzo in B minor.....Chopin
Mme. Lisa Delhaze-Wickes.

In response to enthusiastic encores Mr. Lanham sang "Thou'rt Like Unto a Flower," by E. Ludwig, and "I Long for You," by C. B. Hawley; and Madame Wickes played Chopin's Etude in A flat, op. 25.

INGA HOEGSBRO PLAYS FOR CHARITY.—Miss Inga Hoegsbro was the solo pianist at a concert given in the Hanson Place M. E. Church, Brooklyn, last week, for the benefit of the Deaconess' Home at 238 President street, Brooklyn. Miss Hoegsbro played brilliantly four numbers on an interesting program. The vocalists of the concert were William C. Thompson, baritone, and Mrs. Alice Merritt-Cochran, soprano.

LAMBERT PUPILS.—Among the many gifted piano students of Alexander Lambert, of the New York College of Music, the following will give piano recitals during the winter in New York and vicinity: Miss Mercedes O'Leary, Miss Gussie Zuckerman, Miss Nellie Baldwin, Miss Leonora Wally.

Last night (Tuesday, November 5) the first meeting of the Metropolitan Choir was held at the American Institute of Applied Music at 8 p. m. THIS is the last week of grand opera at the Tivoli and with "La Bohême" and the ever popular "Carmen," of which latter the people never seem to have enough, the season will close. Paul Steindorff is to have a testimonial performance.

It is something of a disappointment not to have had fulfilled the promise of Saint-Saëns' "Samson et Delilah," the "Jewess" and other new names on the Tivoli's repertory for the grand opera season, but when we all learn to live up to our promises I suppose the millennium will have arrived. That is not saying that some of us at least do not try to live up to our promises—but this is moralizing.

Mrs. M. E. Blanchard has been one of this week's attractions in song recital. Mrs. Blanchard is a pupil of Mme. Julie Rosewald and for three years filled the position of contralto at Trinity Episcopal Church, under Dr. H. J. Stewart. Two years ago she went East and studied arduously all the time she was there, first with Lena Little, of Boston, and afterward with Oscar Saenger and Isadore Luckstone in New York. The effect of her Eastern trip is most salutary. Always possessing a lovely voice, the spirit was lacking to give it life. She has returned imbued with the atmosphere in which she lived while East. She has temperament, lovely interpretation and phrasing and in the two recitals given from old French to modern English it was a constant source of enjoyment. But one criticism is to be made: She needs resonance in her lower register. There is not volume enough, but that is easily remedied, and Mrs. Blanchard is even now an almost perfect singer of lieder. Fred Maurer accompanied Mrs. Blanchard at both recitals, and as an old concert-goer remarked, "It was worth the price of admission to hear his delightful accompanying."

Mary, Susan and Dorothy Pasmore, the charming little trio that we have heard before in concert always with most intense pleasure, were the chief attraction at the first of the Pasmore popular concerts, which took place in Maple Hall, of the Palace Hotel, on Tuesday night last. These children have played together so long and have become so used to audiences that their work is unmarred by the faintest symptom of nervousness, and the whole soul of each performer seems to go into her fingers. The first trio, violin, piano and 'cello, was the Haydn in G and the "Gypsy Rondo," which in the last movement was taken with strict tempo and closed in a storm of applause. The Schubert Trio was no less pleasing, and proclaimed the true artist in each of these talented little performers.

Mary, the eldest, and the violinist, gave the andante, allegro and moderato from the Seventh Concerto, De Beriot, and I have never heard an amateur render it with more earnestness and intelligence. She has a strong yet supple wrist and gets a very mature tone for so young a player. Her execution is clean, her tone warm and expressive. The children, though young, are veterans in study, and might easily put older heads to shame.

The vocal part of the program was given by Mr. Pasmore himself, who was in excellent voice, and some of his pupils, Mrs. Florence Wyman Gardner, a soprano of rare sweetness of quality, and Mrs. Edith Scott Basford, whose deep contralto gave a hint of fine possibilities for the future. Two quartets were sung by Mrs. Gardner, Mrs. Basford, Mr. Nowlan and Mr. Pasmore, accompanied by Arthur Fickenscher. Mr. Pasmore teaches the Shakespeare system of tone production and is an enthusiast in the building of voice. One of the best known vocal teachers in 'Frisco, he has the names of some of our sweetest singers on his list of pupils.

I had the pleasure one day this week of listening to little Enid Brandt while she played the "Concertstücke" of Weber, the whole thirty pages of which she is to perform at her coming concert November 5, with an accompaniment of four string pieces and second piano, which will be taken by her mother. Enid was a marvel last year. This year, still a babe of but nine years, she plays as one who has complete mastery of her instrument, and has the confidence of perfect knowledge in her own ability.

She could not reach an octave last year, now she plays octave runs with perfect ease. Her phrasing is wonderful, and the value of each individual note has been so carefully studied, the effect as a whole is marvelous. What this infant will become in a few years more is a matter for conjecture. The compositional gift is well developed, and her ideas are very original and quaint. She is a beautiful child, perfectly healthy, an utter baby at her play and entirely devoid of one particle of self-conceit. S. H. Friedlander, who has her concerts under his management, hopes to tour her ere long in a repertory that is one of the surprises accomplished by this really prodigious genius of tender years.

Hugo Mansfeldt writes from Berlin that while in Dresden recently he and Mrs. Mansfeldt were the guests of Emil Sauer and were charmingly entertained. Sauer w recently appointed director of the Vienna Conservato of Music. He was planning to be present at Alma Ste cel's first concert in Berlin, October 26. Mr. Mansfeldt expected home shortly and will give a piano recital, a sisted by Mrs. Oscar Mansfeldt, in Sherman-Clay Hall December 6.

The first "Artists' Day" of the Sacramento Saturd Club took place on October 26 with a fine program giv by Mrs. C. J. Wetmore, contralto, and Louis Von d Mehden, 'cellist. Miss Adelaide Dierssen was the acco panist.

Across the bay, Miss Fern Frost, a pupil of Elizab Westgate, gave a recital of her piano pupils in the parl of the First M. E. Church, Saturday afternoon, October They were assisted by Master Fred Seiffert, a pupil on violin of Alexander Stewart.

Concerts in prospect are those of the Loring Club a Orpheus Concert Company, both of which take place Thursday, the 31st, and Frederic Biggerstaff, pianist, sisted by Mrs. Sedgeley Reynolds, Saturday afternoon, N vember 2. The Loring Club is entering on its twenty-fi anniversary year and for this concert have prepared extraordinarily fine program. Miss Annie Louise Dan will be the lady vocalist of the evening.

Mrs. A. Wedmore Jones

Severn Pupil as Orchestral Leader.

EDWARD A. RUSHFORD, the leader of the orche at the Northampton (Mass.) Academy of Music a professional pupil of Edmund Severn. Local m lovers have been delighted with the music of the theatr performances under Mr. Rushford's baton, and now critics are beginning to notice his skill as leader. Her an extract from a report in the Northampton Gazette a performance of "Mistress Nell," by Henrietta Crosm and her company:

Just a word in reference to the orchestra. We can learn lessons from European countries, and one is to give the orch a share of our applause. So far the work of Leader Rushford his men is far better than that of any previous season. Kee pace with the improvements made by the academy's manager is giving a higher class of music. Their playing between the was to me the principal source of enjoyment, far better than play itself. If the work of the orchestra pleases you, do no afraid to show your satisfaction by hearty applause.

Elizabeth Weller.—Miss Elizabeth Weller, a yo woman who has recently entered the ranks of the pro sional accompanists, might be called a "born" accompa When a child she often played accompaniments for pleasure it gave her, and it seems but natural that should make that her profession later in life. Miss W received her training at the American Conservatory Music, Chicago, under the director, John J. Hattsta supplemented by a special technical course in this For over a year she has been the studio accompanist Harry Wheeler, the noted vocal instructor, and last sm mer she was his accompanist at Chautauqua, N. Y.

Some of Miss Weller's recent engagements were: " Persian Garden," at a concert for a quartet, a concer the Y. W. C. A., and the "Elijah," played last week Choral Union, under Tali Esen Morgan. She has quently played at fashionable receptions, and last wi she played Beethoven symphonies and music of that for concerted instruments, for both professionals and teurs.

Miss Weller will devote two days each week to te ing accompanying at her studio, "The Winchester," West Fifty-seventh street, New York.

T Carl Sobeski's studio last Saturday afternoon a most interesting program was given by Miss Elisa rthley, assisted by Charles Turner. Miss Worthley has ne soprano voice, which she uses in an artistic manner, ging in a broad style with color and great finish. She studied with Mr. Sobeski for the past three years, and work justifies the many compliments she was the re- ent of. Mr. Turner also studies with Mr. Sobeski, and a fine voice. Teacher and pupils were complimented l congratulated upon the success of the afternoon's gram. The musicale was a social success alone. The gram is given to show the range of music that Miss rthley sings:

il's Lament.....Leighter
-de Chase.....Johns
ets .....Ellen Wright
Years at the Spring.....Mrs. Beach
Miss Worthley.
the Forest.....Kritzer

Charles Turner.
Love but a Day.....Mrs. Beach
di Cristi.....A. Lotti
Grand, Queen of Sheba.....Gounod
, Hark, the Lark!.....Schubert
Spring.....Sobeski
Miss Worthley.

addition to the above program, Miss Estelle Neuhaus, was present, contributed several piano solos.

ne of the most successful singers of this city, Frederic tin, has already made a large number of engagements the season that might almost be said to fill the entire er. Two most important ones are those with the Han- and Haydn Society at Christmas time, and with the on Symphony Orchestra December 28 and January 30. h the Symphony Orchestra the Brahms "Liebeslieder" mixed quartet is to be given. It has always been a er of comment and surprise that with so many good ers in Boston, soloists for the important concerts ld always be engaged from abroad, and it is therefore icularly gratifying and complimentary to Mr. Martin e engaged for the above events.

her engagements to be filled in the near future by Martin are in Bangor, Me.; Winchester, Brockton, Worcester, St. Johnsbury, Vt., and Concord, N. H.; in fact from November 12 until December 20 he has no open dates at all. Many managers of choral societies are negotiating with Mr. Martin, and his season promises to be a most successful one. Mr. Martin sang at the New Hampshire Music Teachers' Association at the Weirs in the summer and made a pronounced success.

Dr. H. J. Stewart, organist and director of music at Trinity Church, has completed the chorus written for H. G. Tucker's society. The words are from a poem by Longfellow, "The Three Singers," and the work is an unaccompanied chorus. It will be given during the winter at one of the concerts by Mr. Tucker.

Organ concerts to be given by Everett E. Truette are November 7, Mechanics Falls, Me., when a new organ will be inaugurated; November 12, Campello, also to inaugurate a new organ, and November 15 at the Union Church, Worcester.

The program arranged by Whitney Tew for his vocal recital at Chickering Hall on Wednesday evening next will include a number of songs and arias that he has sung with success in other concerts. This is Mr. Tew's first concert in this city. Isidore Luckstone will be the accompanist.

Heinrich Schuecker was one of the soloists at the first recital given under the direction of George B. Stevens at Gloucester on October 21. The Times in a review of the concert had the following to say about Mr. Schuecker, who is so well known as the harpist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra:

"The enthusiasm of the afternoon went to Mr. Schuecker, for the harp is truly most appealing, and he plays it so beautifully. His opening number, a Fantaisie by Saint-Saëns, was rendered with fluency of technic, creating an excellent impression, which was deepened in the rendition of a Minuet, E. Schuecker; Romanze, Godefroid; 'Spring Song,' Gounod, the performer being urgently encored after his two numbers, but only offered one in response."

In response to the offer of two prizes made by the New England Conservatory of Music for compositions for orchestra and chorus and for orchestra alone, twenty-seven compositions were submitted. These have now been examined and the decision of the judges, George W. Chadwick, Horatio W. Parker, Frank van der Stucken, is as follows:

That the first prize of $600, for the work for chorus and orchestra, be not awarded at the present time, as none of the compositions received are, in our opinion, of sufficient seriousness or artistic scope to warrant such a prize.

That the second prize of $400, for the best work for orchestra alone, be awarded to Henry K. Hadley, of New York, for his Symphony in F minor, entitled "The Four Seasons."

The tour of the Fadettes of Boston is under the direction of the Great Eastern Lyceum Bureau of Toronto this season and they have dates filled from October 14 to February 1. The tour began at Yarmouth, N. S., and goes through Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Maine, Quebec, Ontario, Michigan, New York, Pennsylvania, New York, Connecticut and Massachusetts. The last half of January will be spent in New York, Pennsylvania and Ohio. Mrs. Caroline B. Nichols is conductor; Mary Reuck-Wilczek, violin soloist; Miss Mildred Rogers, mezzo soprano. The programs are always of interest and include the best of both classic and modern music.

Theodore Schroeder, baritone, will be the soloist at the Aeolian and Pianola recital this afternoon at Steinert Hall.

There will be a piano recital by Edwin Klahre at Steinert Hall on the afternoon of November 7.

On the evening of Sunday, November 17, a series of nine musical services from standard oratorios will be inaugurated at the First Baptist Church. The music will be under the direction of Norman McLeod. The quartet of the church recently has been reorganized, and will have the assistance of many of the leading oratorio singers of the city, among them Mrs. Walker, Arthur Beresford, Mrs. Jeannie Crocker Follett, Dr. D. Crosby Greene, Frederick Smith and others. The popularity of these services was so great last season that only about half of the applicants for cards of admission could be accommodated and for this reason it has been decided to give a repetition of each oratorio on the following Sunday evening.

Next Tuesday evening a free competition for two full scholarships, open to persons of both sexes from all over the country, will be begun at the New England Conservatory of Music. The judges will be Signor Bimboni, the head of the operatic school; George W. Chadwick, director of the Conservatory, and a third to be selected.

ANOTHER MILLER PUPIL.—Miss Ray M. Spencer, contralto, and a pupil of E. Presson Miller, is meeting with great success in her lecture-song recitals, and has already booked a large number of engagements for this season. The subjects of her lectures are "Woman's Creative Genius in Music" and "English and Scotch Ballads." Miss Spencer gives a short, interesting talk, and then illustrates by singing a number of songs in an artistic manner. Her voice, of fine quality, has been well trained and enables her to give to each number its proper interpretation and full musical value.

JAMES GIBBONS HUNEKER, of THE MUSICAL COURIER, returned from Europe this week.

THE Election Day holiday will necessitate a delay of twenty-four hours in the publication of this issue.

OUR American millionaires and billionaires may be interested to hear that Tara's Hill, in the County Meath, Ireland, is for sale. This is the spot Irish kings and Irish beauties made their own for generations, and which inspired Thomas Moore to write the eloquent poem, "The harp that once through Tara's Hall."

MUSIC is as far removed from politics as the North Pole from the South Pole, but when a city elects a musician as mayor it becomes necessary to chronicle the event. Returns from San Francisco declare that Eugene E. Schmitz, a local orchestra leader, has been elected mayor. The twentieth century promises many unique movements, and the election of a musician to wield his baton over a great municipality is a fulfillment of some of the predictions.

OUR Brooklyn friends are determined to raise the standard of musical performances in the borough. The resolution is worthy of hearty support. As we have at other times pointed out, the journey over to Manhattan from Brooklyn on a cold winter night is one no normal person cares to undertake. Brooklyn needs a new music hall, and this will come, too, when the efforts are concentrated in the right direction. Association Hall is an auditorium unsuited for recitals, and while the acoustics of the Academy of Music are good, it is hard to get up any artistic enthusiasm in a building devoted to political meetings and balls.

AWARD PADEREWSKI PRIZES.

NEW YORK, October 30.—The judges in the competition for prizes from the fund established by Ignace J. Paderewski last year announced their decision to-day. There were three prizes of $500 each for the best work for orchestra, the best piece for chorus and orchestra, with or without solos, and the best piece of chamber music for any combination of instruments. The competition was restricted to composers born in the United States, and the prizes were awarded as follows: Work for orchestra, to Henry K. Hadley, musical director of the Cathedral School of St. Paul, Garden City, L. I., for his symphony, "The Four Seasons."

Choral work, Horatio W. Parker, Battell professor of the theory of music at Yale University, for "A Star Song," cantata for solo, chorus and orchestra.

Chamber music composition, Arthur Bird, for a serenade for wind instruments. Mr. Bird, although a native of the United States, is now a resident of Berlin.

The trustees of the fund are Henry L. Higginson and William P. Blake, of Boston. The judges appointed by Paderewski were Wilhelm Gericke, Carl Zerrahn, B. J. Lang and W. F. Apthorp, of Boston; H. E. Krehbiel, H. T. Finck, J. G. Huneker and W. J. Henderson, of New York, and S. S. Sanford, of New Haven. Sixty-eight compositions were entered.

MR. PADEREWSKI has done a service of unquestionable artistic magnitude in bringing about a successful competition, by means of which prominent American composers will enjoy not only a recognition of their respective merits but also a peculiarly powerful advertisement for their works, and advertising is exactly what the American composer needs badly.

If the works of Americans were gauged in accordance with their merits many American compositions would be played and sung in place of foreign works that are either superannuated or merely produced by force of a foreign flavor. The American composer requires and needs prestige, and this can be secured through judicious advertising (and by advertising we do not refer merely to newspaper advertising), such as is given to some of them by means of the publication of the abo prize distribution.

No doubt the judges decided properly in sele ing the three of the 68 compositions, and it wou be interesting to know who the other 63 compose or the composers of the remaining 63 works we at least it would be just to mention the seconds a thirds in each of the three classes, if for no oth reason than the encouragement such publicati would hold out.

Mr. Hadley is a very gifted composer. M Parker stands in the front rank of our young generation of composers, and so does Arthur Bi and either of them naturally stood in good cha to come forth as a winner. The next and m important step now is to have the works p formed—but only after thorough rehearsing.

WITH the first issue of THE MUSICAL COUR for this month of November we publish eleventh and last but one in the series of ins ments on musicians' natal days, with some refere to the astrological significance thereof. The wr of this series of arti has not been unmindfu scoffers and skeptics, for the many who have terested themselves in these casual and modest pers heartfelt gratitude is extended. Astrolo which may be described as the disinherited chil astronomy, is after all a science that is still attr ive to many rational minds in this day and gen tion. The writer has never been able to fathom man or woman who professes to believe in ort dox Christianity, and yet in the same breath denounce spiritualism as a humbug, and astrol as a theory of darkness and superstition. In "St. Mark's Rest" John Ruskin attempts to alyze what he describes as "The Protestant Mi in its attitude toward Catholicism, particul Roman Catholicism. The writer fancies a sin contrast might be drawn between those who ac such "hardshell" doctrine as man's creation f the dust, the Immaculate Conception and the urrection, while refusing to believe that the g planets in the solar system do influence the ph cal body. Most know that the changes of moon do affect the insane, but we know it because the medical fraternity has declared it t a fact. If the moon, a reflected, lifeless body, power to excite or alleviate disordered minds, it not seem logical for those powerfully bril stars, Jupiter, Venus and the Sun, to influence beings who inhabit Mother Earth?

MUSICIANS BORN IN NOVEMBER.

The modern writers on astrology agree with brethren in ancient times in asserting that hu misery is the result of ignorance of the zod laws. The nine planets named in astrology portend good or evil to mankind are Nept Uranus, Saturn, Jupiter, Mars, Sun, Venus, cury and the Moon. The astrologers have di these into three classes. Namely, the Sun, Moon, Jupiter and Venus are good planets. nus, Saturn and Mars are evil planets, and Me and Neptune are neutral planets. The élite i cient Egypt regulated their lives accordingly, of all ancient peoples the Egyptians were th strongest and most wonderful. They educ their children in a way that should be in har with the zodiacal influences under which they born. To-day if some wise man should arise proclaim that Lincoln and McKinley were b under Saturn, which happens to be the fact, w the rushing, selfish material world stop to lis James A. Garfield was born under Mars. W as George Washington, who bore a charmed was born under Jupiter. Lincoln and McKi were born in the zodiacal sign Aquarius, and urn is the ruling planet. Aquarius prevails on or about January 20 until February 19, and succeeded by Pisces, which is ruled by Jupiter. Washington was born in Pisces. We considered the signs of Aquarius and Pisces in the instalments published in January, February and March, and with each instalment gave the dates of famous musicians and composers born in the signs.

Readers who find that they were born in Aquarius need not be apprehensive, because it frequently happens that the malefic influences of his Satanic Majesty Saturn are neutralized by favorable planets at the hour of birth. Aquarius is one of the most remarkable of all the signs. Mozart, Schubert, Mendelssohn, Auber, Hérold and Nessler are among the composers born in Aquarius. A superior mind and a kindly magnanimous nature are among the inborn traits of the Aquarius child, and fully these endowments were proven in the lives of Lincoln and McKinley and Mozart and Mendelssohn. Aquarius people are most likely to achieve success in music, painting, literature, journalism, the ministry, and in a few branches of commerce. They are warned against entering pursuits that deal with lead and the coarser minerals. Lincoln and McKinley died from wounds inflicted by leaden bullets.

The sign Scorpio, which began on or about October 22, prevails in November until on or about the 21st, when it is replaced by Sagittarius. Mars rules Scorpio and Jupiter rules Sagittarius. Scorpio is the second or middle sign in the Water Triplicity or Water Domain. Jupiter is the third and last sign in the Fire Triplicity or Fire Domain. Both are powerful signs, but the dissimilarity between the people born under these signs is as great as the contrast between water and fire. This contrast in the adjoining zodiacal houses is what most bothers the skeptic.

Here are the names and birthdays of musicians and composers born in November in the sign Scorpio:

November 3 (1801) Vincenzo Bellini, died September 24, 1835; November 4 (1841) Carl Tausig, died July 17, 1871; November 5 (1494) Hans Sachs, died January 20, 1576; November 6 (1859) Ignaz Jan Paderewski, very much alive; November 7 (1767) Bernard Romberg, died August 13, 1841; November 12 (1834) Alexander Borodin, died February 17, 1887; November 13 (1817) Louis James Alfred Lefébure-Wely, died December 31, 1869; November 14 (1774) Gasparo Luigi Pacifico Spontini, died January 24, 1851; November 15 (1811) Marie Leopoldine Blahetka, died January 17, 1887; November 16 (1766) Rodolphe Kreutzer, died January 6, 1831; November 17 (1816) August Wilhelm Ambros, died June 28, 1876; November 18 (1786) Sir Henry Rowley Bishop, died April 30, 1855; November 19 Friedrich Wilhelm Zachau, died August 14, 1712.

The musicians and composers who have left a name after them born in November in the sign Sagittarius are:

November 21 (1851) Arthur Goring Thomas. died March 21, 1892; November 22 (1710) Wilhelm Friedemann Bach, died July 1, 1784; November 22 (1780) Conradin Kreutzer, died December 4, 1849; November 23 (1697) Jean Marie Leclair, died October 22, 1764; November 24 (1817) Fritz Spindler (from all accounts this venerable musician is still living in Dresden where he settled many years ago); November 25 (1752) Johann Friedrich Reichardt, died June 27, 1814; November 26 (1811) Karl Franz Brendel, died November 25, 1868; November 27 (1804) Sir Julius Benedict, died June 5, 1885; November 28 (1830) Anton Rubinstein, died November 20, 1894; November 29 (1810) Louis Plaidy, died March 3, 1874; November 29 (1798) Gaetano Donizetti, died April 8, 1848.

The higher attributes ascribed to Scorpio people by the astrologers are adhesiveness and silence, and to the Sagittarius people introspection and benevolence. Some of the faults of the Scorpio who live on the lower or animal plane are terrible indeed if all the astrologers have written is to be regarded as the truth. Revenge is sweet to the unawakened Scorpio individual, and that is said to be so with all the water people. Ungovernable tempers, strong passions, a tendency to toady to the rich and powerful, the habit of procrastination, unfaithfulness in friendship and in the marriage relation, overweening vanity, are some of the leading faults which the astrologers ascribe to the Scorpio people who live on a material plane of existence. These people are naturally very gifted. They possess remarkable magnetism, skill in the use of their hands, have strong nerves and tremendous will power. Medicine, surgery, war, and, when the ruling planet Mars is favorably placed at hour of birth, music and literature are some occupations in which Scorpio people may achieve eminence. The superior people born in the sign Scorpio are those who have been wisely trained from youth. Scorpio boys and girls require the guidance of a watchful mother's eye, probably more than any other children. This, however, is the astrologers' statement, not ours.

Many beautiful traits have been ascribed to people born in the sign Sagittarius, the Archer, which prevails from on or about November 21 to December 20. They are prophetic, and are therefore advised to rely upon their own inspirations rather than upon the advice of their friends. Ruled by the just and beneficent Jupiter Sagittarius people demand justice in matters small and great. They abhor meanness, and cruelty to man, child or beast arouses their indignation to action. They are most loyal in friendship and in their love relations. Treachery in a friend or by a loved one crushes the Sagittarius man or woman, and in striking back the injured one frequently goes to extremes. Because of their inborn love of children Sagittarius people make the best teachers in the world. Purity is their native element, and thus we find them chaste in thought, word and deed. A powerful musical current radiates from Jupiter, and thus Sagittarius is credited as one of the most musical signs. Beethoven was born in December in this sign. Sagittarius people make ideal reformers, for they are inspired by their consuming love of justice. They are often repaid with brutal ingratitude, but as their aim is the betterment of their fellow men they work on indifferent either to praise or condemnation.

The closing instalment in this series of articles will be published the first Wednesday in December.

WAGNER THE INSURGENT.

IN the public library of Dresden there is a collection of papers left by the late Franz Adolf Schmidt, who was Richard Wagner's lawyer in a suit brought against him by a Dresden bookseller. Among these documents is a letter from Wagner, dated Berlin, February 20, 1863, to the following effect:

I thank you very much for your communication and your kind offer to serve my interests. After the harsh and unfair behavior of the Bookseller A, I am glad to have a favorable prospect of being now placed in a position to spare my poor wife unseemly annoyance. Have the goodness to induce Herr A to withdraw his complaint and to propose a note for the amount of the sum, payable 15th April this year at my home in Dresden. The form of the note, please send to me at St. Petersburg, in case the inclosed draft drawn up by me is not considered satisfactory.

Regarding this matter as disposed of, I am quite ready to execute a deed to transfer all my property to Dresden to my wife, although, as far as I know, no new annoyance need be expected from the remaining creditors, as I myself, for the satisfaction of Kriete's demands for interest, can find a way to pay it gradually.

But I now have another request, esteemed sir. Would you kindly undertake the commission of procuring for me, by the proper channel, an extract of the incriminating depositions in the records of the court respecting my participation in the Dresden insurrection in the year 1849. I have been advised by kind friends in high position to meet by these means the continued calumnies of ———, that I at that time tried to set on fire the Royal Palace in Dresden, which seems such a strong proof of my participation in those events that every endeavor even in the highest circles is answered by saying that with such a man one can have nothing to do, &c? It is quite impossible that such a charge against me can exist, and thus by these extracts I could place my good wishers in a position to oppose ———'s insinuation. But if such a charge against me was laid before the court, I should feel it necessary to have this point brought to actual investigation.

Perhaps you may think it useful under these circumstances to see the Minister of State, Baron von Beust. In the audience which he granted me last November in Dresden I was permitted to lay before him my urgent request to set at ease, by a favorable statement, the Government of the Duke of Saxe Weimar on this point, so that if he resolves to take me into his service in any way there could be no offense to the Royal Saxon Court. Herr von Beust promised me earnestly to consult with His Majesty on the matter. But it was reported to me from Weimar that such a favorable statement would not be made by the Minister there, Herr Von Watzdorf, and I must conclude from many indications that there still prevails at the Court of Weimar great anxiety in this respect. Consequently it would be very serviceable if you could induce in my name Herr Von Beust to intervene in a conciliatory spirit. My St. Petersburg address you will hear through my wife. I shall not stay there over three weeks, and after that shall be found in Vienna.

RICHARD WAGNER.

Schmidt examined the archives of the Dresden courts, and sent the depositions, leaving Wagner to do with them what he liked. "I rejoice to be able to assure you," he adds, "that the accusations originating in Vienna, of attempted arson, find no support in the documents," and concludes by attesting that most of the charges rest only on the report of an unsworn witness. Schmidt's extracts are:

A.—Before the Insurrection.

"Herr Wagner, in the year before the Insurrection, shall have taken part in conversations in his garden, which latter formed the basis of the pamphlet by Musikdirector Röckel on "Arming the People"; furthermore, about Easter, 1849, he shall have had meetings at Bakarin, and about the same time or earlier, ordered from a tinsmith 500, according to the statement of the tinsmith, very harmless hand grenades, and to have had at least a part of them delivered."

B.—During the Insurrection.

"Herr Wagner during the insurrection was seen by various persons in the rooms of the so-called Provisional Government. Further, he encouraged a body of Communal Guards from Chemnitz, both in Oederan and Freiberg, to go on to Dresden, and in Dresden to have led a body coming from Zittau through the streets. To Röckel, who during the first days of the insurrection was in Prague, he is said to have written a letter in which occurs the passage, 'We have only fear that the insurrection might break out too soon.' On May 6, 1849, that is, on the day of the insurrection, Wagner was seen on the Kreuzthurm, whence he observed the position of the troops and the approach of the popular processions, wrote down the result of his observations and let the written note down to the street. Watchers then took it up and carried it to the Provisional Government. Finally, although there is no mention in the documents of any complicity of Herr Wagner, a box was said to have been transported to his lodgings, which box belonged to Bakuneir."

C.—After the Insurrection.

"After the suppression of the insurrection in Dresden by the military, Herr Wagner got away from Dresden, met between Tharaud and Freiberg Heubner and Bakunier and went with them to Freiberg. He also remained a long time in Heubner's dwelling.

"Other accusations, having reference to a participation by Herr Wagner in the aforesaid insurrection, are not found in the records. Especially in no place is there any hint that Herr Wagner had made an attempt or had an intention of setting fire to the Royal Palace in Dresden or to any other public or private building."

So Wagner must be acquitted of having ever contemplated a grand scenic effect of troops marching and crowds rushing in tumult with the blazing palace in the background.

The rest of the Wagner-Schmidt correspondence, published in the Zeitschrift der International Musikgesellschaft, is occupied with the publication of his three operas, "Rienzi," "The Flying Dutchman" and "Lohengrin," and squabbles with publishers German and French and pecuniary complications of all kinds. As an excuse for no further mention of these we plead the Statute of Limitations.

THE PIPER OF DREAMS.

The desert of my soul is peopled with black gods,
Huge blocks of wood;
Brave with gilded horns and shining gems,
The black and silent gods
Tower in the naked desert of my soul.

With eyes of wolves they watch me in the night;
With eyes like moons.
My gods are they; in each the evil grows,
The grandiose evil darkens over each
And each black god, silent
Under the iron skies, dreams
Of his omnipotence—the taciturn black gods!

And my flesh and my brain are underneath their feet;
I am the victim, and I perish
Under the weight of these nocturnal gods
And in the iron winds of their unceasing wrath.

—Lingwood Evans.

I.

IT was opera night and the lights burned with an official brilliancy that challenged the radiance of the Café Monferino across the asphalt. There all was decorous gaiety; and the doubles of Pilsner never vanished from the little round metal tables that overflowed into the juncture of the streets Gluck and Halèvy. Among the brasseries in Paris this was the most desirable to lovers of the Bohemian brew. The cooking, Neapolitan and Viennese, perhaps explained the presence one June evening of tall, blond, blue-eyed Illowski, the notorious Russian symphonist. With several admirers he sat sipping bocks and watched the motley waves of the boulevard wash back strange men and women—and again women.

Lenyard spoke first. Young and from New England, he was studying music in Paris.

"Master, why don't you compose a music-drama?" Illowski, gazing into the soft blue of light and mist over the Place de l'Opéra, did not answer. Scheff burst into laughter. The one who had put the question became angry. "Confound it! What have I said, Mr. Dutchman, that seems so funny to you?" Illowski put out a long, thin hand—a veritable flag of truce: "Children, cease! I have written something better than a music-drama. I told Scheff about it before he left St. Petersburg last spring. Don't be jealous, Lenyard. There is nothing in the work that warrants publicity—yet. It is merely a venture into an unfamiliar region, nothing more. But how useless to write for a public that still listens to Meyerbeer in the musical catacombs across the street!"

Lenyard's lean, dark features relaxed. He gazed smilingly at the fat and careless Scheff. Then Illowski arose. It was late, he said, and his head ached. He had been scoring all day—more than sufficient reason for early retirement. The others demurred, though meekly. If their sun set so early how could they be expected to pass the night with any degree of pleasure? The composer saw all this; but he was sensibly selfish, and, buttoning the long frock coat which hung loosely on his attenuated frame shook hands with his disciples, called a carriage and drove away. Lenyard and Scheff stared after him and then faced the situation. There were many tell-tale porcelain tallies on the table to be settled, and neither had much money; so the manœuvring was an agreeable sight for the cynical waiter. Finally Lenyard, his national pride rising at the spectacle of the Austrian's penuriousness, paid the entire bill with a 10-franc piece.

Scheff sank back into his chair and grinningly inquired: "Say, my boy, I wonder if Illowski has enough money for his coachman when he reaches the mysterious, old dream-barn he calls home?" Lenyard slowly emptied his glass. "I don't know, you don't know, and, strictly speaking, we don't care. But I'd dearly like to see the score of his new work."

Scheff blinked with surprise. He, too, was thinking of the same dread matter. "What in God's name do you mean? Speak out! I've been frightened long enough."

"This Illowski is a terrible man, Scheff. Do you suspect the stories are true after all——?" Then both men stood up, shook hands and said: "Neshevna will tell us. She knows."

II.

Pavel Illowski was a man for whom the visible world had never existed. Born a Malo-Russ, nursed on little Russian legends, a dreamer of soft dreams until more than a lad, he was given a musical education in Moscow, the White City—itself a dream of old Alexander Nevsky's days. Within sight of the Kremlin the slim and delicate youth fed upon the fatalistic writers of the nineteenth century. He knew Schopenhauer before he learned to pronounce German correctly, and the works of Bakounin, Herzen, Kropotkin became part of his cerebral tissue. Proudhon, Marz and Ferdinand Lassalle taught him to hate wealth, property, power; and then he came across an old volume of Nietzsche in his uncle's library. The bent of the boy's genius was settled. He would be a composer—had he not, as a bare-headed child, run sobbing after Tschaikowsky's coffin almost to the Alexander Nevsky Monastery, in 1893—but a composer who would mold the destines of his nation—perhaps the destinies of all the world, a second Svarog. He early saw the power, insidious, subtle, dangerous power that lurked in great art, saw that the art of the twentieth century, his century, was music. Only thirteen when the greatest of all musical Russians died, he read Nietzsche a year later; and these men were the two compelling forces of his life until the destructive poetry of the mad, red-haired Australian poet, Lingwood Evans, appeared. Illowski's philosophy of anarchy was now complete, his belief in a social, æsthetic, ethical regeneration of the world fixed. Yet he was not a militant reformer; he would bear no polemical banners, wave no red flags. A composer of music, he endeavored to impart to his work articulate, emotion-breeding and formidably dangerous qualities.

Deserting the vague and fugitive experimentings of Berlioz, Wagner, Liszt and Richard Strauss, Illowski modeled himself upon Tschaikowsky. He read everything musical and poetical in type, and his first attempt, when nearly thirty, was a symphonic setting of a poem by a half-forgotten English poet, Robert Browning, "Childe Roland to the Dark Tower Came," and the music aroused hostile German criticism. Here is a young Russian, declared the critics, who ventures beyond Tschaikowsky and Strauss in his attempts to make music say something. Was not the classic Richard Wagner a warning to all who endeavored to wring from music a message it possessed not? When Wagner saw that Beethoven—ah! the sublime Beethoven—could not do without the aid of the human voice in his Ninth Symphony, he fashioned his music drama accordingly. With the co-operation of pantomime, costume, color, lights, scenery, he invented a new art—a patched and tinkered one, said his enemies, who thought him old fashioned—and so "The Ring," "Tristan and Isolde," "Die Meistersinger" and "Parsifal" were born. True classics in the devotion to form, repose and freedom from th feverishness of the later men headed by Richar Strauss—why should anyone seek to better thei to supplant them? Wagner had been the Moza of his century. Down with the musical Tartars the East, who spiritually invaded Europe to rob h of peace, religion, aye, and morals!

Much censure of this kind was aimed at Illowsk who continued calmly. Admiring Richard Strau he saw that the man did not dare enough, that h effort to paint in tone the poetic heroes of the pa century, himself included, was laudable, but th "Don Juan," "Macbeth," quaint "Till Eulenspiege fantastic "Don Quixote" were, after all, chiefly co cerned with a moribund æstheticism. Illowski be liked the Strauss setting of "Also Sprach Zarathu tra," because it approached his own daring proje though it neither touched the stars nor reached t earth. Besides this music was too complicated. new art must be evolved—not a synthesis of the c arts dreamed by Wagner—but an art consisting music alone; an art for the twentieth century, democratic art, in which poet and tramp alike cou revel. To the profoundest science must be unit a clearness of exposition that only Raphael h Even the peasant enjoys Velasquez. The Grec fathomed this mystery: all Athens worshipped marbles, and Phidias was crowned King of En tions. Music alone lagged in the race—music, p speech, part painting, with a surging undertow passion—music had been too long in the laborator of the wise men. To free it from its Egyptian bon age, to make it the tongue of all life, the interpre of the world's desire—Illowski dreamed the drea of madmen.

Chopin, who divined this truth, went first to people, later to Paris, and thenceforth he beca the victim of the artificial. Beethoven was born soon in a world grown gray under schola shackles. The symphony, like the Old Man of Sea, weighed upon his mighty shoulders; mu he believed, must be formal to be understood. lowski in his many wanderings pondered th things: saw Berlioz on the trail in his efforts to mulate a science of instrumental timbres; saw W ner captivated by the glow of the footlights; Liszt, audacious Liszt, led by Wagner, and trib laid upon his genius by the Bayreuth man; Tschaikowsky struggling away from the temp tions of the music-drama only to succumb to symphonic poem—a new and vicious version that old pitfall, the symphony; saw César Fra the Belgian mystic, narrowly graze the truth some of his chamber music, and then fall victim the fascinations of the word; as if the word, spo or sung, were other than a clog to the free wing imaginative music! Illowski noted the strug of these dreamers, noted Verdi swallowed by maelstrom of the theatre; noted Richard Str and his hesitation at the final leap.

To the few in whom he confided he admi that Strauss had been his forerunner, having the notion that music must be beautiful to be m and seeing the real significance of the chara istic, the ugly. Had Strauss developed the c age or gone to the Far East when young—Illo would shrug his high shoulders, graw his ciga and exclaim: "Who knows?"

Tolstoy was right after all; this sage, who u cover of fiction preached the deadliest doctri doctrines that aimed at nothing else than the equilibration of social conditions. Tolstoy had veighed bitterly against all forms of artificial ar the Moujik did not understand Beethoven, the the worse for Beethoven; great art should have Mozart's sunny simplicities without Mozart's orate technical methods. This Illowski belie To unite the intimate soul-searching qualitie Chopin and exclude his alembicated art; to s ith torrential puissance the feelings of the com- non people, whether Chinese or German, Esqui- aux or French; to tell them things, things found either in books nor in pictures, nor in stone, either above the earth nor in the waters below; to berate them from the tryranny of laws and beliefs nd commandments; to preach the new dispensa- on of Lingwood Evans—magnificent, brutal and lood-loving—ah! if Illowski could but discover is hidden philosopher's stone, this true Arcana of l wisdom, this emotional lever of Archimedes, hy then the whole world would be his; his power ould depose Pope and emperor. And again he eamed the dreams of madmen—his mother had en nearly related to Dostoïewsky. * * *

"Of what avail the seed-bearing Bach and his gues—emotional mathematics, all of them! Of hat avail the decorative efforts of tonal fresco- inters, breeders of an hour's pleasure, soon for- tten in the grave's muddy disdain! Had not the age lowered music to the position of a lascivious ndmaiden? To the sound of cymbals it postured r the weary debauchee. No; music must go ck to its origins. The Church fettered it in its rvice, knowing full well its good and its evil. Be- re Christianity was, it had been a power in hieratic nds. Ancient Egyptian priests hypnotized the ultitudes with a single silvery sound; and in the epest Indian jungles inspired fakirs induced sions by the clapping of shells. Who knows how e Grand Llama of Thibet decreed the destinies of llions? Music again, music in some other garb an we now sense it." Illowski groaned as he at- ked this hermetic mystery. He had all the tech- of contemporary art at his beck, but not the ique tone; that unique tone by which he might come master of the universe and gain spiritual minion over mankind. Yet the secret, so fear- ly guarded, had been transmitted through the es. Certain favored ones must have known it, n who ruled the rulers of earth. Where could it found? "The jealous gods have buried some- ere proofs of the origins of all things, but upon shores of what ocean have they rolled the stone t hides them, O, Macareus?" Thus echoed he fatidical query of the French poet. * * *

Illowski left Europe. Some said he had gone to ia, the mother of all religions, of all corruptions. had been seen in China, and later stories were ated of his attempts to enter the sacred city, asa. He disappeared and many composers and ics were not sorry; his was a too commanding sonality: he menaced modern art. Thus far urch and state had not considered his individual stence; he was but one of the submerged units of rik's vast Slavic Europe, which now almost trav- ed the Eastern hemisphere. So he was forgotten l a minor god arose in his place—a man who te pretty ballets, who declared that the end of sic was to enthral the senses; and his ballets e danced over Europe, while Illowski's name ed away. * * *

At the end of ten years he returned to St. Peters- g. Thinner, much older, his long, spidery arms, ost colorless blond hair and eroded features gave n the air of a cenobite who had escaped from e Scandinavian wilderness into life. His Orien- reserve, and evident dislike of all his former so- habits, set the musical world wagging its head, alling the latter days of Dostoïewsky. But Ill- ski was not mad: he simply awaited his oppor- ity. It came. The morning after his first con- he was awakened by fame knocking at his gate, most horrible kind of fame. He was not called adman by the critics, for his music could never e been the product of a crazy brain—he was nounced an arch-enemy to mankind, because he infamous secrets in his music, secrets that had buried in the shale of a vanished epoch. And, the world grow cold, he drove to its very soul most hideous truths. A hypnotist, he conducted his orchestra through extraordinary and malevo- lent forests of tone. The audience went into the night, some sobbing, some beating the air like pos- sessed ones, others frozen with terror. At the sec- ond concert the throngs were so dense that the au- thorities interfered. What poison was being dis- seminated in the air of a music hall? What new device of the revolutionists? What deadly secret did this meagre, dreamy, harmless looking Russian possess? The censors were alert. Critics were in- structed by the heads of their journals to drive forth this musical anarchist; but criticism availed not. A week, and Illowski became the talk of Russia; a month, and Europe filled with strange rumors about him. Here was a magician who made the dead speak, the living dumb—what were the limits of his power? What his ultimate intention? Such a man might be converted into a political force would he but range himself on the right side of the throne. If not—why, then there was still Siberia and its weary stretches of snow!

When he reached Moscow rioting began in the streets. Leaving, he went with his dark-skinned Eastern musicians to the provinces. And the Gov- ernment trembled. Peasants threw aside spade, forgot vodka and rushed to his free concerts, given in canvas-covered booths; and the impetus com- municated to this huge, weltering mass of slaving humanity, broke wave-like upon the remotest bor- ders of the empire. The Church became alarmed. Anti-Christ had been predicted for centuries, and latterly by the Second Adventists. Was Illowski the one at whose nod principalities and powers of earth should tremble and fall? Was he the prince of darkness himself? Was the liberation of the seven seals at hand—that awful time foretold by the mystic of Patmos? The Metropolitan of the Greek Church did not long hesitate. A hierarchy that be- came endangered because a fanatic wielded hyp- notic powers must exert its prerogative. The aid of the secret police invoked, Illowski was hurried into Austria; but with him were his men, and he grimly laughed as he sat in a Viennese café and counted the victories of his first campaign.

"It has begun," he told his first violinist, a stolid fellow with black blood in his veins.

It had begun. After a concert in Vienna, Illow- ski was politely bidden to leave Austria. The unset- tled political condition, the disaffection of Czech and Hungarian, were a few of the reasons given for this summary retirement. Yet Illowski's orchestra did not play the "Rakoczy March"! The clergy heard of his impieties; a report obtained credence that the Russian composer had written music for the black mass, most blasphemous of missal travesties. When he was told of this he smiled, for he did not aim at attacking mere sectarian beliefs; with Bakounin, he swore that there must be total destruction of all ex- isting institutions, else—nothing!

He went to Germany, believing the countrymen of Nietzsche would receive with joy this Overman from the East. There was no longer any Bay- reuth—the first performance of "Parsifal" else- where had killed the place and the opera. In Mu- nich, the authorities forewarned, Illowski was ar- rested as a dangerous character and sent to Trieste. Thence he shipped to Genoa, and once in Italy he was free. On the peninsula his progress was that of a trailing comet. The feminine madness first manifested itself there and swept the country-side with epidemic fury. Wherever he played the danc- ing mania set in, and the soldiery could not put it down by force of arms. Nietzsche's dancing philos- opher, Zarathustra, was incarnated in Illowski's compositions. Like the nervous obsessions of me- diæval times, this music set howling, leaping and writhing the volatile Italians, until it began to as- sume the proportions of a new Evangel, an hysteri- cal hallucination that bade defiance to law, doctors, even the decencies of life. Terrible stories reached the Vatican, and when it was related that one of his symphonic pieces delineated Zarathustra's Cave with its sinister mockery of prelate and king, the hated Quirinal was approached for assistance, and Illowski vanished from Italy.

In the British Isles the same wicked tales were told of him. He was denounced by priests and publican as a subverter of morals. No poet, no demagogue had ever so interested the masses. Musicians of academic training held aloof. What had they in common with this charlatan who treat- ed the abominable teachings of Walt Whitman symphonically? He could not be a respectable man even if he were a sane. And then the unlettered, tiller of the soil, drunken mechanic, and gutter drab all loved his music. What kind of music was it to be thus understood by the ignorant?

The police thought otherwise. Illowski gathered crowds—that was sufficient to ban him, not as the Church, with bell, book and candle, but with stout oaken clubs. Forth he fared, and things came to such a pass that not a steamer dared convey him or his band to America. The United States Congress got wind of the seditious and disturbing music and hastily passed a resolution forbidding the landing of the agitator. Freedom, at all hazards, must be maintained in the country of Washington, Jefferson and Lincoln.

By this time the scientific reviews had taken him up as a sort of public Illusionist. Disciples of Char- cot explained his scores—though not one had been published; while the neo-moralists gladly denounced him as a follower of the Master Immoralist, a sub- limated emotional expression of the ethical nihil- ism of Friedrich Nietzsche. Others, more fanciful, saw in his advent and in his art an attempt to over- turn nations, life itself, through the agency of cor- rupting beauty and by the arousing of illimitable desires. Color and music, sweetness and soft luxu- ries, declared these modern followers of Ambrose and Chrysostom, were the agencies of Satan in the undermining of morals. Pulpits thundered. The press sneered at the new Pied Piper of Hamelin, and poets sang of him. One Celtic bard named him "Master of the Still Stars and of the Flaming Door."

For women his music was as the moth's desire. Wherever he went there were women—women and children. Old legends were revived about the an- cient gods. The great Pan was said to be abroad; rustlings in the night air set blushing young folks. An emotional renascence swept like a torrid simoon over Europe. Those who had not heard, had not seen him, felt, nevertheless, Illowski's subtle influ- ences in their bosoms. The fountains of democ- racy's great deeps were breaking up. Too long had smug comfort and utilitarianism ruled a world grown weary of debasing commerce. All things must have an end, even wealth; and to the wretched, to those in damp mines, to the downcast in exile and in prisons, and to the muck of humanity, his name became a beautiful, illuminated symbol. The charges of impiety were answered: "His music makes us dream." Music now became ruler of the universe, and the earth hummed tunes; yet Illow- ski's maddening music had been heard by few.

Humble, poor, asking nothing, always giving, he soon became a nightmare to the orthodox. He preached no heresies, promised no future rewards, nor warred he against church or kingdom. He only made music and things were not as they were be- fore: some strange angel had passed that way filling men's souls with joy, beauty and bitterness. Duties, vows, beliefs fell away like snow in the sun; families, tribes, states grew restless, troops were called and churches never closed. A wave of belated paganism rolled over the world; thinkers and steersmen of great political and religious organizations became genuinely alarmed. So had come the downfall of the classical world; a simple apparition in a far away Jewish province, and the Cæsars fell supine—their empires cracked like mirrors! To imprison Illow- ski meant danger; to kill him would deify him; for in the blood of martyrs blossom the seeds of mighty religions. Far better if he go to Paris—Paris, the cradle and the tomb of illusions. There this restless demagogue might find his dreams stilled in the scarlet negations and frivolous philosophies of the town, thus the germ-plasm of a new religion, of a new race, perhaps of a new world, be drowned in the drowsy green of a little glass.

Illowski, this Spirit that Denied, this new Mephisto of music, did not balk his evil wishers.

"Paris, why not? She refused to understand Berlioz, flouted Wagner, and made mock of Rodin's marble egotisms, the ferocious, white stillness of his Balzac! Perhaps Paris will give me, if not a welcome, at least repose. I am tired."

To Paris he went and, excepting a few cynical paragraphs, received no attention. The Conservatoire, the Académie de Musique, did not officially welcome this gifted son of the Neva; the authorities blandly ignored him; though the police were instructed that if he attempted to play in front of churches, address mobs or build barricades, he must be confined. Paris had no idea of Illowski's real meaning; Paris, even in the twentieth century, always hears the news of the world last; besides, she conceives no other conquest save one that has for its object the several decayed thrones within her gates. Illowski was not molested and his men, despite their strange garb and complexion, went about freely. The Russian composer of ballets was just then the mode.

Some clever caricatures appeared of Illowski, representing him as a musical Napoleon, cocked hat, sleek white horse and all. Another gave him the goat's beard of Brother Jonathan, with the baton of a Yankee bandmaster; and then it was assured that the much advertised composer was a joking American masquerading as a Slav, possibly the vender of some new religious cure born in the fanatical bake-ovens of Western America. "Faust" alternated with "Les Huguenots" at the Opéra, Pilsner beer was on tap at the Café Monferino; why worry over exotic stories told of this visitor's abnormal musical powers? And little did anyone surmise that he had just given a symphonic setting to Lingwood Evans' insurrectionary poem with all its ghastly refrain: "I hear the grinding of the swords, and He shall come——" Thus did Paris unwittingly harbor the poet, philosopher, composer and pontiff of the new dispensation, Pavel Illowski. And Lenyard, with Scheff, was hastening to Auteuil to see Neshevna, whose other name was never known.

III.

Lenyard disliked Neshevna before he saw her; when they met he made no attempt to conceal his hatred. He again told himself this, as with Scheff he pursued the gravel path leading to the porter's lodge of Illowski's house. In Auteuil it overlooked the Seine, which flowed a ribbon of sunny silver between its green ribbed banks. Together the pair entered, mounted a low flight of steps and rang the private bell. Neshevna opened the door. In the flood of a westering sun the accents of her fluid Slavic face and her mannish head set upon narrow shoulders—all the disagreeable qualities of the woman—were exaggerated by this bath of clear light. Her hard gaze softened when she saw Scheff. She spoke to him, not noticing the other:

"The master is not at home." Lenyard contradicted her: "He is; the concierge said so."

"The concierge lies; but come in. I will see."

Following her they reached the music room, which was bare of instruments, pictures, furniture, all save a tall desk upon which lay a heap of music paper. Neshevna made a loping dart to the desk—she was like a wolf in her movements—and threw a handkerchief over it. Lenyard watched her curiously. Scheff gave one of his good natured yawns and then laughed:

"Neshevna, we come to ask!" "What?" she gravely inquired. There was a lithe alertness in the woman that puzzled Lenyard. Scheff lounged on the window sill. "Now, Neshevna, be a good girl! Don't forget Moscow or your old adorer."

"You fat fool, you and your clerical friend here, what do you want spying upon Illowski like police?" Her voice became shrill as she rapidly uttered these questions, her green eyes seemed shot with blood. "If you think I'll tell either of you anything concerning the new music——"

"That's all we are here to learn."

"All? Imbeciles! As if you or your American could understand Illowski and his message!"

"What message?" Lenyard's grave face was not in the least discomposed by the Cossack passion of the woman. "What message has Illowski? I've heard queer stories and cannot credit them. You are in his confidence. Tell us, we ask in humility, what message can any man's music have but the revelation of beauty?"

Lenyard's diplomatic question did not fail of its mark. Neshevna pushed back her flamboyant gray hair and walked about the room. "Mummies!" she suddenly cried. "As if beauty will content a new generation fed on something besides the sweetmeats and pap of your pretty, meaningless music. Don't you know that painting, literature, creeds—aye, and the kingdoms—are dying for want of new blood, new ideas? Music alone is a vital force, an instrument for rescuing the world from its moral and spiritual decay. Nietzsche was a potent force in the nineteenth century, but not understood. They condemned him to a living death. Lingwood Evans, poet, prophet, is now too old to enforce his message—it is Illowski, Illowski alone who shall be the destructive Messiah of the new millennial. 'He cometh not to save; not peace, but blood!'"

The fire of fanaticism was in her eyes, in her speech. She grasped Lenyard by the elbow: "You, you should serve the master. Scheff is too fond of pleasure to do anything great. He is to give the signal—that's glory enough for him. But you, discontented American, have the stuff in you to make a martyr. We need martyrs. You hate me? Good! But you must worship Illowski. Art gives place to life and in Illowski's music is the new life. He will sweep the globe from pole to pole, for all men understand his tones. Other gods have but prepared the way for him. No more misery, no more promises unfulfilled by the rulers of body and soul—only music, music like the air, the tides, the mountains, the moon, sun and stars! Your old-fashioned melody and learning, your schoolboy rules of counterpoint—all these Illowski ignores."

Lenyard eagerly interrupted her: "You say that he does away with melody, themes, harmony; how does he replace them, and how does he treat the human voice?" Neshevna let his arm fall and went slowly to the tall desk. She leaned against it, her hand upon her square chin. Scheff still gazed out upon the lawn where splashed a small, movable fountain. To Lenyard the air seemed as if charged with electric questionings. His head throbbed.

"You ask me something I dare not tell. Even Scheff, who knows some things, dare not tell. If Illowski's discovery—which is based on the great natural laws of heat, light, gravitation, electricity—if this discovery were placed in the hands of fools the world would perish. Music has been so long the plaything of sensuality, the theatre for idle men and women, that its real greatness is forgotten. In Illowski's hands it is a moral force. He comes to destroy that he may rebuild. He accomplishes it with the raw elements themselves. Remember—'I hear the grinding of the swords, and He shall come——!'" Neshevna made a nervous gesture and disappeared through a door near the tall desk covered with music paper—the desk whereon Illowski plotted the ruin of civilization.

"Now since you have seen the dread laborator don't hang around that desk; there's nothing the you can understand. The music paper is covere with electrical and chemical formulæ, not notes- Lenyard, let's go back to Paris and dine like sens ble men—which we are not." Scheff dragged h friend out of the house, for the other was in a stupo Neshevna's words cleaved his very soul. Tl American, the Puritan in him, swiftly rose to h eloquent exhortation. All life was corrupt, he h been taught; art was corrupt, a snare, a delusio Yet—was all its appalling power, its sensuo grandeur to be wasted in the service of the worl the flesh, the devil? Lenyard paused. "Oh, con on, Len. Why do you bother your excitable, si heart with that lunatic's prophecies? Illowski is big man, a very big man; but he is mad, mad! H theories of the decomposition of tone—he only in tates the old painter-impressionist of long ago—a his affected simplicity: why, he is after the big pu lic, that's all; as to your question about what pa the human voice plays in his scheme, I may tell y now that he doesn't care a farthing for it except color. He uses the voice as he would use a instrumental combination. And he mixes h colors so wonderfully that he sometimes polariz them—they no longer have any hue or scent. H should have been a painter, not a composer. H makes panoramas, psychological panoramas, n music."

"You heard them, saw them?"

"Yes," said Scheff, sourly. "Some of the ea ones, and I had brain fever for months afterwar

"Yet," challenged Lenyard, "you deny l powers?"

"I don't know what he has written recently," w the sullen answer, "but if the newspapers are to believed he is crazy. Music all color, no rhyth no themes, and then his preaching of Nietzsch it's all wrong, all wrong, my boy. Art was ma for joy. When it is anything else it's a dangero explosive. Chemically separate certain natural e ments and they rush together with a thunderc That's what Illowski has done. It isn't art! I science—the science of dangerous sounds. He c covered that sound vibrations rule the univer that they may be turned into a musical Roentg ray. He presents this in a condensed art, an elec cal form——"

"But the means, man, the methods, the inst ments, the form?" Lenyard's voice was tense wi excitement. The phlegmatic Scheff noticed t and soothingly said:

"The means? Why, dear boy, he just hypnoti people and promises them bank accounts and an wings. That's how he does the trick. Here's e tramcar. Jump in. I'm dying of thirst. To e Café Monferino!" * * *

Paris laughed when Illowski announced the p formance of his new orchestral drama nam "Nietzsche." The newspapers printed colu about the composer and his strange career. A s used monster music hall, near the Moulin Ro on the Montmartre, was to be the scene of the c cert, and the place was at once christened "Thé du Tarnhelm"—for a story had leaked out ab the ebon darkness in which the Russian's m was played. This was surpassing the almost r gotten Richard Wagner. Concert in the dark n be indeed spirituelle. The wits giggled over t jokes; and when the kiosks and bare walls w covered by placards bearing the names of "Il ski-Nietzsche," with a threatening sword beni them, the excitement became real. Satirical so were sung in the cafés-chantants, and several fa ionable clerics wove the name of Illowski into t Sunday preachments. In a week he was popu two, a mystery; three, a necessity. The authori maintained a dignified silence—and watched. Bli ties, Bourbonism, Napoleonism, Boulangerism r is, had crept in unawares wearing strange dis-ises. Perhaps Illowski was a friend of the Vatin, of the Czar; perhaps a destructive, bomb-rowing Nihilist, for the indomitable revolution-ts still waged war against the law. Might not this usic be the signal for a dangerous uprising of me sort? * * *

Lenyard was asked to sit in a box with Neshevna at last night. Scheff refused to join them; he ore that he was tired of music and would remain town at the Monferino. The woman smiled as said this, then she handed him a letter, made a tle motion, the signal.

It was on the esplanade that Neshevna and Len-rd stood. The young man, weary with vigils, s face furrowed by curiosity, regarded the city low them as it lay swimming in the waves of a aking sun. He saw the crosses of La Trinité as olten copper, then dusk and dwindle in the adows. The twilight seemed to prefigure the ding of the human race. Neshevna walked with is dreamer to the rear of the theatre—the theatre the Tarnhelm that was to darken all civilization.
e asked for Illowski, but she did not reply; she,
o, was steeped in dreams. And all the streets ere thick with men and women tumbling up to e top.

"We sit in a second tier box," she presently said.
f you get tired, or annoyed, you may go out on e balcony and look down upon the lights of aris; though I fear it will be a dark night. There no moon," she added, her voice dropping to a umble. * * *

They sat in a dark box that last night. The autorium, vast and silent with the breath catching ence of thousands, lay below them; but their es were glued upon a rosy light beginning to eak over the space where was the stage. It read, deepened, until it fairly hummed with scar-tones. Gradually emerging from this cruel crim-n the image of a huge sword became visible.
shevna touched Lenyard's hand.

"The symbol of his power!" she crooned.

Blending with the color of the light a musical ne made itself seen, felt. Lenyard shuddered. At t the new dispensation was about to be revealed, e new gospel preached. It was a single vibratile ne, and was uttered by a trumpet. Was it a mpet? It pealed with the peal of bells shimmer-g high in heaven. No Occidental instrument had er such a golden, conquering tone. It was the ne of one who foretold the coming, and was full invincible faith and sweetness. Lenyard closed eyes. That a single tone could so thrill his ves he would have denied. This then was the ret. For the first time in the Christian world beauties of tonal timbres were made audible—ost visible; for the quality appealed to the eye, inner eye. Was not the tinted music so cungly merged as to impinge first on the optic ve? Had the East, the Hindus and the Chinese, own of this purely material fact for ages and arded it in esoteric silence? Here was music ed upon simple, natural sounds, the sounds of ds and air, the subtle sounds of silk. For cenies Europe had been on the wrong track with its lodic experimenting, its complex of harmonies.
wski was indeed the saviour of music—and Ne-vna, with her great green luminous eyes, held hand.

The sound grew in volume, grew less silken, and re threatening, while the light faded into mute, ty music like the purring of cats. A swelling
r assaulted their ears; nameless creeping things seemed to fill the tone. Yet it was in one tonality; there was no harmony, no melody. The man's quick ear detected many new, rich timbres, as if made by strange instruments. He also recognized interior rhythms, the result of color rather than articulate movement. Then came silence, a silence that shouted cruelly across the gulfs of blackness, a silence so profound as to be appalling. Sound, rhythm, silence—the material from which is fashioned the creative stuff of the universe! Lenyard became restless; but the grip on his fingers tightened. He felt the oppressive dread that precedes the fight of a nightmare; the dread that mankind knows, when sunk in shallow, horrid sleep. A low, frightened wail mounted out of the darkness wherein massed the people. Another tone usurped the ear, pierced the eyes. It was a blinding beam of tone, higher and more undulating; his heart harshly ticking like a clock, he viewed, as in a vision, the march of the nation, the crash of falling theocracies, of dying dynasties. On a stony platform, vast and crowded, he knelt in sackcloth and ashes; the heavens thundered over the weeping millions of Nineveh; and the Lord of Hosts would not be appeased. Stretching to the clouds were black, basaltic battlements, and above them reared white terraced palaces, as swans that strain their throats to the sky. The day of wrath was come. And amid the granitic clashing of the elements Lenyard saw the mighty East resolving into dust. Neshevna pressed his hand.

By the waters of Babylon he wandered and found himself at the base of a rude little hill. The shock of the quaking earth, the silent passing of the sheeted dead, and the rush of affrighted multitudes told him that another cosmic tragedy was at hand. In a flare of lightning he saw silhouetted against an angry sky three crosses at the top of the sad little hill. He reeled away, his heart almost bursting, when Neshevna grasped him.

"You saw the death of the gods!" she whispered hoarsely. He could not answer, for the music showed him a thunder blasted shore fringing a bituminous sea. This sea stirred not, while the air above it was frozen in salty silence. Faint, thin light came up through the waters, and Lenyard caught a glimpse in the deeps below of sparkling pinnacles and bulbous domes of gold; a dead sea rolled over the dead cities of the bitter plain. He trembled as Neshevna said with a grinding sob: "That was the death of life."

Lenyard's sombre soul modulated to another dream—the last. Suffocating and vague the stillness waxed and ran over the troubled edges of eternity. The Plain, gloomy and implacable, was illuminated on its anonymous horizon by one rift of naked, leering light. Over its illimitable surface surged and shivered women, white, dazzling, numberless. As waves that, lap on lap, sweep fiercely across the sky line, as bisons that furiously charge upon grassy waste, "as the rill that runs from Bulicamé to be portioned out among the sinful women," these hordes of savage creatures rose and fell in their mad flight across the Plain. No sudden little river, no harsh accent of knoll or hill, broke the immeasurable whiteness of bared breast and ivoried shoulder. It was a white whirl of women, a ferocious vortex of terrified women. Lenyard saw the petrified fear upon the faces of them that went into the Pit; and he descried the cruel and looming figure of Illowski piping to them as they went into the Pit. The maelstrom of faces turned to their dream master; faces blanched by regret, sunned by crime, beaming with sin; faces rusted by vain virtue; wan, weary faces, and the triumphant regard of those who loved—all gazed at the Piper as vertiginously they boiled by. The world of women passed at his feet radiant, guilty, white, glittering and powerless. Lenyard felt the inertia of sickness seize him when he saw the one capital expression upon these futile faces—the expression of insurgent souls that see for the last time their conqueror. Not a sign made these mystic brides, not a sound; and as in the blazing music they dashed despairingly down the gulf of time Lenyard was left with eyes strained, pulses jangled, lonely and hopeless. He shivered and his heart halted. * * *

"This is the death of love," shouted Neshevna. But Lenyard heard her not; nor did he hear the noise of the people beneath—the veritable booming of primordial gorilla men. And now a corrosive shaft of tone rived the building, as though its walls had been of gauze, and went hissing toward Paris, in shape of menacing sword. Like the clattering of tumbrils in narrow, stony streets, men and women trampled upon one another, fleeing from the accursed altar of this arch priest of Beelzebub—Illowski. They overstreamed the sides of Montmartre, as ants washed away by water. And the howling of them was heard by the watchers in the doomed city below.

Neshevna, her arm clutched by Lenyard's icy fingers, shook him violently and tried to release herself. Finding this impossible she dragged her silent burden out upon the crumpling balcony.

Paris was draped in flaming clouds, the blood red smoke of mad anarch's torches. Tongues of fire twined about the towers of Notre Dame; where the Opéra once stood yawned a blackened hole. And the air was shocked by fulminate blasts—the signals of the careless Scheff.

The woman, her mouth filled with laughter, cried: "Thou hast conquered, Pavel Illowski!"

A Von Klenner Pupil's Success.—Miss Grace Ames, a soprano singer of exceptional ability, who received her vocal training from Madame Von Klenner, recently gave a song recital in Davenport, Ia., her program being made up exclusively of compositions by American composers. Miss Ames sang songs by Bruno Oscar Klein, Sarah G. Foote Shelton, John Whiting, Edward MacDowell, Ethelbert Nevin, Arthur W. Korthner, Frank Van der Stucken and Dudley Buck. The large audience keenly enjoyed Miss Ames' artistic singing, and testified its approval in the most cordial manner. This was indirectly a great compliment to Madame Von Klenner.

Carpi.—Vittorio Carpi, the well-known baritone, will make his r'entré at a recital in Mendelssohn Hall on the evening of November 27 with a program of many interesting numbers.

FROM PARIS.

PARIS, OCTOBER 17, 1901.

IF the interest taken by the public in orchestral and chamber music concerts be a criterion of its artistic advancement, then Paris must be a very musical city indeed. Another enterprise has just been added to the many claiming recognition. It is called the New Philharmonic Society of Paris, and has for its object the creation of a series of concerts at which the programs will be divided between classical and modern chamber music and soloists, either instrumentalists or singers. One feature of this undertaking is that concerted works will be performed only by quartets or trios of instrumentalists already established as such. Some of the most famous among these organization already engaged are: Quartets, Joachim, Berlin; Marteau, Geneva, and Ysaye, Brussels. The celebrated trios of Chaigneau, Paris and Frankfort are also engaged.

Among the vocalists will be heard Mmes. Marie Brema, Felia Litvinne, Mr. and Mrs. Henschel, Madame Wülner, &c. In the list of solo pianists I notice the names of D'Albert, Harold Bauer, Cortot (of whose wonderful playing of Wagnerian scores I have already written), Busoni, Fred. Lamond, &c. Solo violinists and 'cellists of the very first rank are also announced. It is true that these concerts bear a resemblance to those given on Thursday afternoons by Colonne at the Nouveau Theatre, but the addition of such distinguished artists should make them a success, which Colonne's are not.

Thinking it may interest the readers of THE MUSICAL COURIER I send you the programs of the three orchestral concerts taking place next Sunday:

COLONNE CONCERT, AT 2:15 P. M.

"Leonora" Overture, No. 3 (Beethoven); Concerto in F, for violin (Lalo), M. J. Thibaud. Hunting Symphony (first performance) (F. Gossec—1733-1829); Concerto in A, for piano, No. 2 (F. Liszt), M. Ar. de Greef, of Brussels. Symphony in G, No. 13 (Haydn); Concerto for two violins (J. S. Bach), Messrs. Thibaud and Oliveira. Venusberg Scene, "Tannhäuser" (Wagner).

LAMOUREUX CONCERT, AT 3 P. M.

Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" (Berlioz); Dance, with chorus, extract from "Prince Igor" (first time at these concerts; Concerto in F minor, for piano (Lalo), Louis Diemer; Choral Symphony (Beethoven), Mlles. Lormont and Melno, Messrs. Feodorow and Challet. Orchestra and chorus of 250, conducted by Chevillard.

CONCERT, GRAND PALACE, 2:30 P. M.

"Lorelei" (Wallace), "Stances de Sapho" (Gounod), Mlle. Minne. First Symphony (Beethoven); Caprice Impromptu (Pierné), "Les Erinnyes (Massenet), "La Belle Fille" (G. Pfeiffer), sung by L. Bataille. "Revery" (Schumann), "La Jolie Fille de Perth" (Bizet), air sung by M. Bataille. "La Belle au Bois" Valse (Tschaikowsky). Conductor, M. L. Pister.

The director of the Royal Opera of Berlin, with the consent of the Emperor of Germany, invited Colonne and his orchestra to give a concert there October 2. Although Colonne has directed several concerts at Berlin, where he is highly appreciated, this is, I believe, the first time that a French orchestra has been heard at the Royal Opera House.

The difficulties of which I spoke last week at the Comédie Française have resulted in the formal abolishment of the reading committee, whose office it was to read and adjudicate on all manuscripts submitted to them. The onus of accepting new plays now devolves upon the director of the theatre, Claretie.

It was the fact of new pieces being received "for correction" which led to the outcry against the reading, and finally resulted in its abolishment. The theatrical amateurs of Paris are divided into two great camps on this matter, one side maintaining that actors of such reputation are fit and proper judges of new works; the other (with which, of course, are the authors) claiming that a man may be a very good actor, but very biased in his judgment of a play, and that an author's work should be performed as he himself wrote it. The affair made a great deal of commotion, and of course the columns of the daily papers were had recourse to, in order to air the different views of each party. As the sociétaires of the Théâtre Français are paid, not by fixed stipends, but by shares, it was claimed that they had a right to sit in judgment on the works to be produced, as their interests were involved. Some of the company were largely for going on strike. Among the many persons eminent in the literary and theatrical world who were asked their opinion on the matter was Sarah Bernhardt, who reveals herself so characteristically in a short paragraph that I give it. "Why do they not strike in a body?" said she. "They ought by all means to do it, and were I still a member of the troupe I would have worked unremittingly to bring this about. It is perfectly true, though," she added, "that not one-half of the company could find engagements anywhere else, not even in the provinces."

A theatrical career presents many fascinations to those unacquainted with its seamy sides. Take for instance the hardships experienced by the poorer theatrical companies on tour, especially those doing what I believe they call in the States the "one night stands." The getting up at all sorts of unearthly hours in order to be at the station for the next journey. How soon one recognizes these poor mummers, the men with their clean shaven faces and coat collars turned up; the women with a dowdy sort of pretense at finery. But pitiable as is the plight of some of the strolling companies, surely the lowest depth of misery is reached in the following description of a small company of actors going about doing a version of "The Passion" in school houses, town halls, &c., a class of performance not uncommon in Europe. It is communicated by an actor well known in Paris: "A dramatic company styling itself Parisian, on tour, gave a single performance of 'The Passion' in a small school house, and at which I was present.

"The performance was pitiful, but it is not of that I wish to speak, but of the quite unexpected epilogue at which I assisted the following day. The morning was wet, and I, with a friend, had started for an excursion in spite of the rain, when we perceived at a corner of the street a cart drawn and pushed by four poor creatures whom I recognized as being among the performers of the night before. In the cart were piled some old trunks whose age and great service allowed us to see many samples of the tawdry theatrical costumes contained therein. On these trunks a large cross was placed, carefully bound with pieces of sacking, and behind the cart followed three women carrying bundles. These women were the directress of the troupe, who, with the Virgin Mary and Mary Magdalen, was preceding the rest of the company. Being thoroughly interested we followed them to the railway station, where were already Pilate, Judas Iscariot, Simon the Cyrenian, and Barabbas, and who, on the arrival of the cart and trunks, busied themselves in conveying their belongings to the train.

"The cross, however, gave them some difficulty on account of its dimensions and weight. 'Be careful,' said the directress, 'not to let it trail in the mud. We had better wait for Jules; he is used to it.' Shortly Jules appeared on the platform, with the railway tickets for the company he had just purchased. He it was who had played the Christ the night before, but now clad in a soiled flannel suit, with goloshes on his feet, and on his head a straw hat which the rain had rendered shapeless. The other men drew on one side, and he alone raised and balanced on his shoulder the cross he bore every night in the performance. Placing it gently, and with infinite precaution among the other baggage, and assuring himself that it could not slip, he came back to the platform and rolled himself a cigarette. Who shall say if this thirteenth station of the cross, although not so widely known, is not also its pathetic side."

A vacancy for professor in the singing classes having occurred at the Conservatory M. Lassalle, who has been first baritone at the Opéra for a number of years was invited by several distinguished musicians to compete for the vacancy. Lassalle was first baritone at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, for several seasons with Grau, beginning about 1890. Although he had a majority of votes for the post he was not selected by the Minister of Fine Arts, and is consequently incensed. Verily, the ways of Government institutions are hard to understand.

"Falstaff," by Verdi, has been revived at the Opéra Comique, with Delna and Maurel in the parts of Dame Quickly and Falstaff.

In the Paris edition of the New York Herald appeared the following advertisement:

"Can any of your musical readers tell me the present address (if he has one) of Letgitregsky, the teacher of Paderewski?"

"Les Barbares."

PARIS, October 24, 1901.

"Les Barbares," the new grand opera by Saint-Saëns, libretto by Sardou and Ghensi, was produced last night at the Opéra here, before a very large and distinguished audience. A great amount of curiosity had been excited by the industry with which the columns of the daily press told of the artistic wonders in store for us by the collaboration of such masters of music and stagecraft as Saint-Saëns and Sardou.

Although in this score there are many pages of surpassing excellence, revealing the originality and practiced hand of the composer of "Samson et Dalila," the Symphony in C minor, "The Deluge," &c., still I do not think "Les Barbares" will be considered as his masterpiece. I do not mean that it is unworthy of the great talent and science of Saint-Saëns, but that it will not add one single leaf more to his crown of laurel as the foremost living French composer. I spoke of the curiosity excited before the production of the work by the activity of the press. It may be that this very zeal militated somewhat against its success. The book seems to me weak, unconnected, without sufficient interest, and generally unworthy of the reputation of a man like Sardou. The story is reduced to practically one incident—that of the subjugation by love of Marcomir the leader of the Teuton (or barbaric) hordes against the Gauls. He is conquered by the sight of Floria, a vestal whom he beholds in the exercise of her duties in the temple. A mutual love ensues, but Marcomir is stabbed by Livia the widow of a consul whom the leader of the victorious army had killed before the walls of Orange. This is really the whole of the plot.

The opera commences with a long symphonic prologue which I am sure will, as I wrote some weeks ago, way into many concert programs this winter. This phony is interrupted by the voice of the Reciter, who, newhat in the fashion of the ancient Greek chorus, de- s the events that are to follow. The Reciter does not ne on in front of draperies, as in "Pagliacci," or sing ind the curtain like the tenor in "Cavalleria Rusticana," the chorus in "Dinorah." He is discovered, on the ris- of the curtain, in the antique arena of Orange, the scene ere the work is laid. Although the music of the first seemed a little tame, yet from this point it increased beauty of melody, color and rhythm, while it culminated a very beautiful climax at the end of the second act. hough the subject is largely one of warfare, yet Saint- ns has preferred to give the more prominence to the ter side of the story. This he does by the distinction his forms, the beauty of his harmonies, and the refine- nt of his orchestration.

he performance of the work in some respects was but diocre. All praise is due to the really fine playing of orchestra, which, in my estimation, is second to none en well conducted. Delmas, fine singer and excellent or as he is, had in the roles of the Reciter and Scaurus ts scarcely worthy of his incontestable talent. Gifted h a fine, sonorous voice, of beautiful quality, which he nages with excellent art, he sang the broad, expressive ases of the Reciter in an artistic and convincing man- . Vaguet, as Macomir, showed his beautiful voice, ch is constantly improving, and his competence gen- lly in the principal tenor role. The principal female sonages were not so successful, Mlle. Heth being some- at overweighted by her part, and Mlle Héglon, beyond g possessed of a beautiful face and figure and the ity to assume statuesque and effective poses, is not iciently mistress of her vocal powers for her singing give any real pleasure, a tendency to sing out of tune g her greatest defect.

he mise-en-scène was effective, and the whole work efully conducted by Taffanel. Many notabilities in the ial, artistic and literary world were present, among n President Loubet and the directors of various Euro- n opera houses.

he conductor of the Colonne concerts, the first of ch was given last Sunday, has conceived the idea of ng an historic résumé of the symphony, foreign and ve, in twelve performances. At the first concert was en a work by Haydn and also a symphony by Gossec. s scheme will be continued, a work of a French com- er always being put in apposition with one by a for- n writer of the same period. The soloists were M. baud, who played Lalo's Violin Concerto in F with largeness of style and purity of tone for which he is arkable; and Arthur de Greef, professor of the piano he Conservatory of Brussels, who gave us the Con- o in A by Liszt. It is in this composition that one rs many passages and harmonies afterwards used by gner in the "Valkyrie." I believe it was of this bor- ing of Liszt's themes by Wagner that made the former laim: "Take what you like. The subjects that you row from my works are at least sure of being pre- ved from forgetfulness. Besides they will still be in family."

t the Lamoureux concerts on the same day an im- se house assembled to hear the performance of Beet- en's Choral Symphony. It is not necessary for me to k of the rendering of this gigantic work, the same orchestra and chorus having frequently played it under the present conductor, Chevillard. Louis Diemer, professor of the piano at the Paris Conservatory, played Lalo's Concerto in F minor. This composer figured on both of the great symphonic concerts' programs last Sunday. Diemer played with his usual care and clearness of fingering and was recalled for his meritorious performance.

At the Opéra Comique there is nothing new to chronicle, an excellent revival of "Vie de Bohême" of Puccini having formed the principal attraction.

One of those singers who do not owe any portion of their success to a fantastic, geographical name is Miss Courtenay, of the Opéra Comique, Paris.

Miss Courtenay, who has been singing leading soprano roles for nearly five years at the second lyric theatre here, made her début as Dinorah in Meyerbeer's "Le Pardon de Ploërmel." Afterward she sang all the leading parts belonging to her type of voice, as Manon, Mireille, Lakmé, Michaëla, &c., but perhaps achieved her crowning triumph when she was lent by M. Albert Carré, the director of the Opéra Comique, to the ill-fated Opéra Populaire for a revival of "Traviata." Miss Courtenay in this work made a signal success, and filled the house every night that she sang. This valuable member of Mr. Carré's troupe is an American girl who does not seem to have found nationality a bar to success, or who, possessing talent, patience and perseverance, has succeeded in spite of it. Miss Courtenay had the misfortune, when she first began her studies in Paris, to place herself under a teacher who so thoroughly misunderstood the true character of the voice as to mistake for a dramatic soprano what is one of the most beautiful light soprano voices one can imagine. The quality of Miss Courtenay's voice is rich and telling, while she vocalizes easily and without alteration the high cadenzas of Lakmé and Manon. In appearance Miss Courtenay is dark, with very bright, expressive eyes, and a face admirably adapted to portray the griefs and joys of the numerous operatic heroines she is called on to personate.

Miss Courtenay has been granted the decoration of Officier d'Académie. She is at present studying the role of Galathée in Victor Massé's charming work of that name, which is to be the next revival at the Opéra Comique, where Miss Courtenay has still a two years' contract to run.

For "Die Götterdämmerung," to be given in Paris next spring, under the direction of Cortot and Schütz, I learn that the tenor Van Dyck has been engaged, as well as Felia Litvinne, who created Isolde here. Madame Schumann-Heink, the contralto, whom you know so well in New York and other cities of the States, will sing the role of Waltraute, in which, I believe, she made a good impression at Bayreuth. Madame Schumann-Heink has not yet been heard in Paris.

DE VALMOUR.

ESTELLE HARRIS ENGAGED.—Supplementary to an engagement of another sort which is announced in these columns, the young dramatic soprano has been engaged to sing at the concert at Trinity Church, Harlem, November 19, at Newark November 10, and inquiry has come for her services at Hazleton, Pa., and elsewhere.

Frieda Stender in Concert—A Great Success.

MISS FRIEDA STENDER, whose fine voice and artistic singing attracted so much attention at the Metropolitan Opera House last season, is making her name known in wider spheres, and wherever she appears she is winning new friends and new honors. She sang at the Harmonie Club, in Detroit, October 28, and these are abstracts from a few of the more important local papers:

Her voice is a large mezzo-soprano of rich quality, and she sings like one who has had abundant professional training. Her enunciation is practically flawless, and she sings with the sympathetic quality sometimes met in German voices. * * * Her first song, the aria "Er schläft," from Lortzing's opera, "The Armorer," she gave with orchestral accompaniment, and she responded to an unmistakable demand for more by singing Victor Holländer's dainty "Untern Machandelbaum." * * * Later on she sang a group of three songs charmingly, and responded to an encore with Frank Van der Stucken's "Die schönste Blume."—Detroit Free Press.

As soloist of the evening appeared Miss Frieda Stender, an artist from New York. It would have hardly been possible to have made a better choice. She sang an aria from Lortzing's "The Armorer," "Er schläft," most beautifully. Later on the rendering of Fielitz's idyll, "Es liegt ein Traum auf der Heide" and "Mein Liebster ist ein" (Weber von Hildach) were again extraordinary fine masterpieces of singing.—Michigan Volksblatt.

Miss Frieda Stender, from New York, was the principal attraction of the evening and pleased immensely.—Tribune.

Miss Frieda Stender, of New York, was the soloist of the evening. * * * She has a very fine voice and sang excellently and had to give many encores.—The Detroit To-day.

Last Sunday Miss Stender appeared as soloist in the Mozart Society's concert in Terrace Garden in this city; on the 11th she will sing at Hugo Troetschel's organ recital in Brooklyn; on the 12th, with Tonkuenstler Society, and on the 23d at the Waldorf-Astoria, for the benefit of the Free School for Crippled Children.

MRS. HADDEN-ALEXANDER BUSY.—Mrs. Hadden-Alexander gave one of her lecture-recitals on "Music as a Language," in the Board of Education Course last week, playing the Schumann "Carneval" entire, the Schubert-Liszt "Hark, Hark, the Lark," MacDowell's "The Eagle," "To a Wild Rose," "To a Water Lily," "The March Wind," the Chopin Study in A minor, and closing with the Twelfth Hungarian Rhapsodie. Arthur B. Alexander, basso, sang several numbers, and those present enjoyed the evening.

Mrs. Alexander was also the sole attraction at Miss Walton's "Home Literary Circle" evening, this well-known Southern woman having bidden some 100 people to hear the pianist. A goodly company accepted, and a most enjoyable evening was spent with the modern composers, chief of which was Chopin. Mrs. Alexander never played better and received rousing applause. Francis Fischer Powers assisted, singing Schumann and other songs, and his wonderful control of a magnificent voice elicited high praise.

Miss Walton's Musical Evenings are features here, and redound much to the credit of this scholarly Southern lady.

KATHRIN HILKE DATES.—The season promises well for Miss Hilke, a few dates being: Madison, N. J., November 7; Wm. C. Carl recital, November 12; organ opening, R. C. Church, Newark, November 10; Lenox Lyceum, R. C. Concert, November 25; with the Saint Caecilia Society, Boston, in Bach's B minor Mass, December 3.

WHAT ABOUT MADAME VON KLENNER?

MME. MATHILDE MARCHESI, in a recent interview given out to the public, made the sweeping assertion that America held no singing teachers, and at the same time she is said to have denied emphatically that she has any representative or teacher of her method in America. About the latter statement she very probably knows whereof she speaks, but the first assertion proves her to be somewhat ignorant of what is being done in New York in the field of vocal analysis, training and artistic finish. We have in mind one teacher who alone proves the error of the belief entertained by the aged and respected authority in Paris, and that is Madame Von Klenner, who is so well and widely known on two continents, and particularly to readers of THE MUSICAL COURIER.

After graduating from a well-known university, in which she had devoted special time to systematic study of physiology, anatomy, physics, chemistry, psychology, as well as to literature and the fine arts, and naturally the regular course of instruction, Madame Von Klenner, who was already a proficient musician, went to Europe to learn everything possible having bearing on the subject nearest to her, namely, the art and science of teaching singing. It was fortunate that she always had ample means, and was thus enabled to secure the best masters and prosecute her studies without outside material worries. For one instance, she learned Italian of a teacher who had but two other pupils.

After spending some months in Berlin and carefully investigating every detail concerning the important vocal methods of the day, she decided that Paris alone could give her that of which she was in search—the best, most practical and rational method. After further investigation in Paris, although assured that Madame Viardot would accept no pupils save those of phenomenal ability, she rang her bell, sang for her, and became at once not only a pupil but almost a daughter of the house and the special delight of this grand old lady. Pretty good for an American girl still in her teens!

With Madame Viardot and her teacher-pupil Artot, the energetic young student commenced to acquire that knowledge which has made her famous while she is still an incredibly young woman. The summer and Easter vacations were spent in musical centres, where she heard everything musical from Wales to Prague in all tongues. Her renown was even then of such proportions that boxes and passes awaited her everywhere. By the way, since Madame Marchesi is herself a pupil of Garcia and Viardot-Garcia's and repudiates any representative who alleges to represent her in America, and as Madame Von Klenner is the last pupil to receive the Viardot diploma and to be authorized to represent this grand old school, does this not make of Madame Von Klenner the only representative of both Marchesi and Viardot in America? It certainly seems a logical deduction. Persons familiar with conservatory methods will know what it means when we relate that a certain conservatory in New York required a singing teacher and cabled Madame Viardot to send a representative capable of teaching her method. Madame Viardot answered that the only pupil she had at all fit for the position was a young American girl and Madame Von Klenner was forthwith engaged by cable at a large fixed salary on a five years' contract to fill this position. The move was perhaps more fortunate for the conservatory than for Madame Von Klenner, but it was the direct means of bringing her back to America wonderfully equipped, to enable us now to quarrel with Madame Marchesi's claim that we possess no teachers. Could Marchesi grasp the extent of work done in the Von Klenner studio she would be amazed, for the work is equally effective from the initiatory exercise to the "finishing" lessons, from English oratorio to music drama and back to German Lieder and French chansons. It is comprehensive, thorough, complete. But it is only fair to state that this teacher has "out-Viardoted" Viardot, for to the already marvelous method she has added the fruit of her individual, keen research and experience and brought the system to a state of perfection unknown in any studio but hers.

After translating all of Manuel Garcia's works, Madame Von Klenner, not entirely convinced on certain points, went to his house to question him. She presented his works, her opposing ideas, and he explained that what a man wrote at forty was not what he would write at eighty, and thoroughly indorsed all she had brought to light. To be more thoroughly within reach the Von Klenner studio has been moved from the now regretted old mansion on Stuyvesant street to a fashionable house at 230 West Fifty-second street. Here she will maintain a salon upon broader principles than formerly.

For fear of becoming too absorbed in her work, which is detrimental to anyone, this untiring woman is a member of the most distinguished and progressive woman's clubs of New York, and before them she reads technical papers on all sorts of subjects, and manages during the year to deliver a large number of lectures, for which the demand is constantly increasing.

The story of her decoration received at Paris is still too fresh in the minds of the public to bear repetition, but if America has no singing teachers, if Madame Marchesi is right, then the dignified body of international judges who awarded this prize must have become incompetent suddenly and mysteriously. Marchesi's own city gave the prize to an American teaching in America. Should this teacher follow the custom of many, namely, to give half a dozen lessons to one who has been Bouhy's or Delle Sedie's pupil for six years, and then claim him or her as the fruit of her own labor, she could produce pupils known the world over; but there is no Von Klenner pupil who has not taken the first and last lesson in the Von Klenner studio. Furthermore, Marchesi and others could not doubt the existence of a competent, dignified teacher here, if this great teacher would pursue the customs of lesser lights and flood the country with cheap circulars bearing the indorsement (alleged) of every great singer from De Reszké to May Irwin. No; Madame Von Klenner has stood, and now, on her merits, she avoids all of the "tricks of the trade," she simply teaches and teaches well, and she holds diplomas and documents to prove that she is skilled, capable and unique. She stands a young woman where others fifty years her senior stand; she progresses from their shoulders, and it is safe to conclude that if this ratio of advancement continues Europe will come to America to study. Marchesi is wrong; we have not many teachers, we have a few capable instructors, and foremost among them is this woman whom we have chosen to combat the edict from Paris. Doubtless it is the uneducated, untrained, ambitious, ignorant bodyguard of persons attempting to teach singing here that Marchesi had in mind, for, as in Europe, we have a large crop of tares and are bullish on wheat.

AUGUSTA COTTLOW TO PLAY IN NEW YORK.—Miss Augusta Cottlow, the American pianist, is to make her first appearance in New York since her return from Europe with the Paur Orchestra, in the Metropolitan Opera House, on the evening of November 30. Later she will be heard in a recital. Miss Cottlow, through her manager, Henry Wolfsohn, is to play during the winter with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Boston; the Thomas Orchestra, in Chicago; the Choral Symphony Society, in St. Louis, and with the Young People's Symphony, in Brooklyn.

MME. OGDEN CRANE'S MUSICALE.

MME. OGDEN CRANE gave her first musicale and tea for this season Wednesday afternoon, October 30, at Genealogical Hall. The room was well filled with a sympathetic and fashionable audience. These affairs are always enjoyable and social events. The program was well chosen and agreeably varied. Madame Crane was assisted by her pupils in receiving, and in her gracious and hearty manner welcomed each comer at the door. Madame Crane sang in several duets and was in her usual excellent voice. Miss Elizabeth Beck Petty and Miss Mary Bouton sang with intelligence and good method. The recitations by Mrs. Florence Robertson James were charmingly given, and the incidental songs showed progress under Madame Crane's tuition. She is a professional reader.

Miss Edith L. Gilbert sang "Should He Upbraid," by Bishop. It was well treated, as was also the solo from "Samson and Delilah," sung by Miss Cecilia Gruss. Miss Alma Rademacher has a contralto voice of great dramatic quality. She sang "Still wie die Nacht," by Böhm. Miss Edith Shafer has a resonant voice. Geggett, one of Madame Crane's professional pupils, sang "Ave Maria," from "Cavalleria Rusticana," with beautiful production and much dramatic fervor. Mrs. Pulsifer's sweet and telling tones charmed everyone. Proch's Recitative and Air and Variations was sung by Miss Mae Estelle Woodward, and her high, bell-like tones were readily with no apparent effort. Mrs. H. C. Davis' singing of "Salve Regina" went straight to the hearts of her audience.

Little Frieda Weigold is gaining in repose, and will bear comparison in her singing of Tosti's "Good-bye" with many a more mature singer.

The Ladies' Lyric Quartet, composed of pupils, a well matched selection of voices.

Frank Hunt was received with warm manifestation of approval. Others who sang were Miss Heuberer, Miss Ester, Miss Costello and Mrs. Eugene Freis. Miss Ester accompanied with skill. Words of praise were heard on all sides for the singing of these pupils, and Madame Crane may well be proud of them.

The second recital will be held at Genealogical Hall, 226 West Fifty-eighth street, Wednesday afternoon, November 27. Tickets may be obtained at the studio, 52 East Fourteenth street.

SARA ANDERSON IN INDIANAPOLIS.—The Symphony Orchestra has engaged Sara Anderson as soloist for the first concert, to be held on November 25. Sara Anderson sang in Indianapolis a few years ago, but as substitute for Madame Sembrich, who was indisposed. Her numbers will be:

Dich Theure Halle (Tannhäuser) ..... Wagner
Bois Epais ..... Lully
Where Be Going ..... Somervell (Old Country)
Polly Willis ..... Dr. Arne (Old English)
May Morning .....

FREE SCHOLARSHIP IN COUNTERPOINT.—A. J. Goodrich, the well-known theorist, offers a complete course in counterpoint to the most deserving young music student. Those who are expert in harmony need apply to Mr. Goodrich, at his studios, Carvel Court, 114th street, corner St. Nicholas avenue. Call November 9 or 11, 3 to 5 p. m.

The new collection entitled "Twelve Church Pieces for the Organ," op. 17, by Prof. Henry M. Dunham, the well-known teacher at the New England Conservatory of Music and organist at Shawmut Church, Boston, is artistically gotten up, and the various pieces are easy and adaptable for recitals and church use. The Prelude, Intermezzo and Elegy are specially worthy of attention.

A NEW BARITONE.—At a recital given on last Wednesday evening, October 30, in the Concert Hall of the Broad Street Conservatory, Nos. 1329 and 1331 South Broad street, Philadelphia, by some of the professors of the conservatory, R. E. S. Olmsted, the well-known New York baritone, who has just been added to the faculty, was heard in selections by Von Fielitz, MacDowell and Foote. Mr. Olmsted has a rare voice which he uses with consummate skill. His enunciation and phrasing were particularly good.

Stanley Addicks, the pianist, played a group of Chopin numbers and some compositions by Haberbier, Schütt, Moszkowski and himself. He also played the Schumann Sonata in D minor with Mr. Witzmann.

John K. Witzmann, the violinist, played the Vieuxtemps Concerto, the Russian Airs by Wieniawski, and the Hungarian Airs by Ernst. His playing was distinguished by its emotional warmth, accuracy of intonation and breadth of tone.

THEODORE VAN YORX.—Theodore Van Yorx, the tenor, continues to receive his due from the critics. Some of his recent appearances were noticed in THE MUSICAL COURIER, and now we add a few press opinions:

It is really educational to hear Mr. Van Yorx sing, combining as he does fine expression and a method equal to any of the great artists. All his numbers were exquisitely rendered, emphasizing his thoroughly artistic methods, his rare musical temperament and his wholesome, rich voice.—Hartford (Conn.) Courant.

Van Yorx covered himself with glory with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the "Prize Song."

His singing was beyond criticism, encore followed encore until he had well earned his rest.—Hartford Courant.

At the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert Mr. Van Yorx sung the "Prize Song" with remarkably fine inspiration and with excellent musical and lyric expression. His voice is clear and sympathetic and his vocal elocution admirable.—Hartford Daily Times.

A WALDORF RECITAL.—Miss Stella Newmark, after three years' study at the Stern Conservatory in Berlin, will give her first piano recital at the Waldorf-Astoria Tuesday afternoon, November 12.

Obituary.

Fenelon B. Rice.

FENELON B. RICE, musical director of the Conservatory of Oberlin College, Oberlin, Ohio, died on October 26. He was born at Greene, Ohio, January 2, 1841. His love of music was serious, and as soon as opportunity permitted he went to Boston for study, graduating from the Boston Music School in 1863. He was called to Hillsdale College as professor of music in the same year, and remained in that position until 1867. He then went to Leipsic, and after two years of study there he was made a teacher in the then youthful Oberlin Conservatory of Music.

Tew's New York Recital.

THE principal number on the program which is to be sung by H. Whitney Tew at his initial appearance in this city, Monday afternoon, November 11, in Mendelssohn Hall, will be Liza Lehmann's song cycle, "In Memoriam." Mr. Tew was the first singer to give this cycle in public and at the time the piano accompaniments were played by the composer. The other songs and arias which Mr. Tew will sing at Mendelssohn Hall next Monday afternoon will be:

Ah, Mio Cor (Alcina).....Händel
Mat Man nicht mit seinen Kindern.....Bach
Qui s'degno non s'accende (Il Flauto Magico).....Mozart
Le Pas d'Armes du Roi Jean.....Saint-Saëns
Ständchen.....Brahms
Der Knabe mit dem Wunderhorn (Fanfare).....Schumann
A Song of Flight.....Elgar

(Written on the assassination of President Lincoln.)
Little Mary Cassidy (from Songs of Four Nations).....Somervell
The Mist.....Hollins
A Memory.....White
The Border Ballad.....Cowen

HALLOCK PIANO RECITAL.—Miss Mary Hallock, pianist, will give a piano recital at Mendelssohn Hall on Thursday afternoon, November 14, at 3 o'clock. Miss Hallock was born in Beirut, Syria, educated in English, French, German and Syrian, and learned a number of Oriental dialects. Her progress on the piano in one of the French schools in Beirut was so great that, upon the advice of Rustem Pasha, the then Governor of Asia Minor, she was brought to Philadelphia to pursue her studies under the direction of Maurits Leefson. Later on she went to Vienna, where she became one of the favorite pupils of Leschetizky. Her début was made under the auspices of the Symphony Society of Philadelphia. Since then she has played with such well-known organizations as the Pittsburg Symphony Orchestra, the Knëisel Quartet and others.

HEMUS SINGS.—Baritone Percy Hemus, of whom only good things are continually heard, gave his lecture song recital in the Board of Education Course at Public School 15, last Monday, assisted by F. W. Riesberg, accompanist. He sang songs by five American composers, namely Chadwick, Shelley, Johns, Vannah and Gaynor, and a group by Elliott, Molloy, Gounod, Tosti and Schumann, making a great hit both as talker and singer. He and Mr. Riesberg have been engaged to give an evening of the "Songs of Nations," in the same course, early in December.

J. WARREN ANDREWS, of the Church of the Divine Paternity, Seventy-sixth street and Eighth avenue, gave the last Sunday evening in October Mendelssohn's "Elijah" in great part, and the first Sunday in November Mendelssohn's "Lobgesang," known also as the "Hymn of Praise." This was a good sized undertaking, especially since the number of singers is not large; nevertheless, a good performance of the difficult work was heard. Estelle Harris, Cornelia Marvin, Albert Quesnel and Gwilym Miles constitute the solo quartet, which is reinforced by an octet of selected voices. Mr. Andrews left on Monday for a week's touring in organ recitals in the West.

A. Y. Cornell, whose enterprise in giving the "Stabat Mater" with the best available soloists at Calvary M. E. Church, in Harlem, has been much commended, since it all turned out so brilliantly, is the young man who a few years ago had charge of the choir at Tremont M. E. Church, where he had also a choral society and played the organ. There his surroundings were modest, but he made the most of all opportunities, and where none existed created them. The writer recalls his giving a choral work there, with Shanna Cumming as soloist, and that this also went off with éclat. Aggressive, wide awake, this young tenor, organist, conductor and good business man combined, will bear watching.

Dr. H. R. Palmer, for many years the dean of the Chautauqua School of Music, has announced his intention of resigning that post, so that next year someone else will have to be provided for the difficult task of organizing and drilling the chorus, which forms such an important portion of the music at the New York Chautauqua. This will be all the more difficult, inasmuch as Dr. Palmer is universally loved, and has a personal following second to no one connected with the institution.

The "Singing Girls," consisting of Sally Akers, first soprano; Edith Chapman, second soprano; June Detweiler, first alto, and Miriam Griswold, second alto, have begun rehearsals for the season, preparatory to their winter's engagements. This women's quartet had some excellent appearances last season and the superiority of their singing aroused comment; they sing without the printed notes and present a charming appearance. Among their most successful appearances last winter was that at the Montclair Club, in one of their regular concert evenings. The high standard of this club is apparent, inasmuch as they last year had Shanna Cumming in vocal recitals, the Dannreuther Quartet, Brounoff and his Russian a capella, &c. Miss Akers is director and manager.

Addington Brooks and Kathrin Hilke were again associated as soloists at the opening praise service at the Roseville Presbyterian Church, where F. W. Riesberg is organist-director. Mr. Brooke sang with much feeling Mietzke's "Callest Thou Thus, O Master," and "O Heavenly Father," and appealed to all because of his fervor of delivery and refinement, as well as the good taste and control of his voice. He is one of the Francis Stuart pupils. Miss Hilke sang Schnecker's "The Earth Is the Lord's" and Rodney's "The Promised Land." Next Sunday evening, Estelle Harris, soprano, will leave her church, the Church of the Divine Paternity, Seventy-sixth street and Eighth avenue, and will sing for Mr. Riesberg at Roseville, with Heathe Gregory, basso.

Miss Alice Breen, the soprano, and Madame Fornier, pianist, have taken a studio at 138 Fifth avenue, where they are comfortably housed, in convenient location. Of Miss Breen many good things are known, she having sung and taught here actively for several years, and Madame Fornier is a newcomer, of whom nice things are said.

Fannie Hirsch's new studio in "The Niagara," on Eighty-seventh street, is artistically furnished, among other things a letter from Nordica prominently framed occupying conspicuous place. She praises Miss Hirsch as a participant in the same concert with herself. Miss Hirsch's London concert during the past season was very successful, as those who read our London letter remember.

Tenor Edward Strong has had the felicity of serving on a jury for the past ten days, but says he prefers singing in the Fifth avenue quartet, with Mrs. De Moss, Mrs. Leonard and Robert Hosea. Mr. Strong's success in Chautauqua and at Newport the past summer was pronounced and more of this tenor is sure to be known.

Clara Ludvigh, who was recently mentioned in these columns as an attractive and meritorious young singer with a fine soprano voice, has been engaged for the Daughters of the American Revolution affair at Dr. McComb's this month.

Miss Mary Mansfield has been engaged for her old position as soprano of Dr. Storrs' church, Brooklyn, which takes high place in the field of church music. Miss Mansfield is also soprano for the Friday evening and Saturday morning services at Temple Emanu-El, Fifth avenue and Forty-third street, where she has been for some years past.

Will E. Macfarlane announces a series of organ recitals on the first Monday afternoon of the months of November, December, January and February, at 4:30 o'clock, at St. Thomas' Church, Fifth avenue and Fifty-third street.

P. A. Schnecker gave the first of his series of organ recitals at the West Presbyterian Church, Forty-second street, last Monday afternoon.

The "Lira Colombiana," a typical string quartet, Colombia, South America, is now here, and the man Señor Fernando Ruiz, called on a MUSICAL COURIER They played with success at the Temple of Music, in falo, and the quintet consists of three bandolas, a tiple guitar. That second instrument sounds familiar; i too, South American?

Mr. and Mrs. Thomas J. Vivian have issued wed cards for their attractive young daughter, Miss Gl Rosewarne, to George Edmond Gordon, Saturday a noon, November 16, 4 o'clock, at Saint Matthew's Ch on West Eighty-fifth street.

The Albertus Shelley orchestral concert at the Ha Y. M. C. A. last Friday evening found a large audi gathered, who greatly enjoyed the program, presented der the conductorship of Mr. Shelley. One of the i esting features of the program was "Ten Minutes Ten Nations," devoted to the national melodies of va countries. The principal orchestral work played was overture to "William Tell," and Mr. Shelley also play violin solo.

M. Fonaroff, whose foreign pupil, Alex. Fiedeman, soloist at the Gewandhaus concert last month, desir known that Fiedeman studied later with Brodsky. Fon does not claim him as his pupil exclusively.

Elise Reimer says that "luck" brought her to the here, but I beg to disagree with her to the extent single letter of the alphabet, placing the letter P b "luck." This attractive young pianist, whose specialt accompaniment work, has a most artistic studio in negie Hall. She studied some years with Robert G beck, becoming a member of his household in Chic and comes from Ohio, where her father is a promi piano pedagogue.

Nellie Atwood Leverich, of 76 Hicks street, Brook plays accompaniments for soloists, studio work an occasions where the services of a first-class player needed. She refers to Shanna Cumming and others known.

Clara Ludvigh sang solos Sunday morning at the negie Lyceum meeting.

HEINROTH ORGAN RECITALS.—Beginning this (Wednesday) afternoon, November 6, Charles Heinroth, the organist of the Church of the Ascension, Fifth avenue Tenth street, at 3:30 o'clock will play the first of the s of monthly organ recitals. This is the program:

THE BERTHOLDT,
128 MARYLAND AVENUE S. W.,
WASHINGTON, November 2, 1901.

THE mistake made by many of the Washington musicians," said an advertising man with whom I was ersing last week, "is that they are not persistent igh in their advertising. They expect good returns a few insertions, whereas business men of experience ld never be misled.

was talking with a real estate man last week who ed my advice about the proper way of advertising of the suburbs. He said to me, 'Which is the best iod of advertising. Mr. Woodcutte? Would you use ulars, booklets and posters or would you advise me lace an advertisement of my property in the papers?' told the man to advertise in the papers the whole around, and besides this to send out circulars and klets periodically; to use pasters, illuminated station- and, in fact, everything which could be of any adver- g value, and to keep it going all the time. He took advice, using all forms of advertising, and dividing money up between them; and as a result he is doing uch better business now than other real estate men did not take all this trouble. The latest thing he was a megaphone. One of his employees stood at door and called out to every carload of people who e along that they ought to own a home in Wave t.

he musicians cannot advertise in exactly this way, it ue; but they can apply this same principle of trying ything and always keeping at it. To explain more ly what I mean, suppose that it were possible for a to arrange a series of advertisements which would t his prospective customer at every turn of his day's . Suppose that he could arrange to have a circular ed so that it would reach his man in the morning's . then have an attractive advertisement in the paper after breakfast and next a card tied on to the man's cle in some mysterious way, right on the handle bar re he would be sure to see it (of course this is a ly hypothetical case used for purposes of illustration): this, a folder containing different reading matter on same subject adroitly twisted around the knob of the 's office door, another still different device (something useful, such as a blotter, calendar or souvenir postal, bearing the advertisement) on the man's desk, and so on ad infinitum. The prospective customer might not take notice of the advertisement the first time, nor even the second or third. People are getting used to advertising schemes and are not so easily attracted as they used to be; and so it is is entirely probable that the advertisement would be entirely overlooked for awhile. Not repeatedly and continuously, however, for it has been proved again and again by successful people that constant hammering will take effect.

"When a man advertises for a little while and then stops or becomes discouraged it is a sign that he is losing confidence in himself. It has the same effect on the public as if he were to say to the public at first: 'I am a very good musician. You will like my performance, and you should engage me,' and then, after stopping his advertisement, should say: 'No; I guess I am not a good musician after all. Excuse me for making such a mistake.'

"He may stop advertising for another reason; perhaps because he is going to Europe, or because he is not ready at that exact time to accept engagements—all very poor reasons, by the way, as those affairs have no effect in increasing or diminishing the reputation he is trying to build up, while the cutting off of his advertisement has a very serious effect. The public does not know the reason for this reversal in his business policy. He has changed his methods, and has altered his former plans, and the public hears no more of him. The effect on the public, then, is the same as if he were to say: 'I thought I was a good musician, and could give satisfaction and pleasure to my audiences, but I guess I must have been mistaken, so I am not advertising any more.' In other words, just as soon as a man loses confidence or appears to lose confidence in himself, then the public loses confidence in him.

"There are a great many ways for musicians to help themselves, but many have not studied the subject and are therefore ignorant. There are a great many musical people right in this town who do not even know that there is such a thing in existence as an amusement directory, which gives the names and addresses of musical clubs all over the country. By using this book they could place their circulars where they would meet the eyes of the very people who are looking around for soloists to engage for their coming concerts.

"But one of the gravest mistakes made by the majority of Washington musicians," said the advertising man as he concluded his little speech, "is that they grow tired and discouraged too soon, and that they lack persistency and determination in studying the advertising question from all viewpoints, and in always 'keeping at it.'"

Anton Kaspar, the violinist, has been adding a number of vases and Dresden china pieces to the furniture of his artistic studio. There are many handsomely furnished studios in town, and there is no doubt that an attractive room attracts many pupils.

Some of the new teachers have hit on the plan of giving monthly recitals in their studios, and inviting those who may become future pupils. An excellent idea.

A well-known singer once said to me that the only proper way to have one's voice trained was to go to a tone specialist, being careful to avoid all singing teachers who attempted to teach a number of other things besides this one thing. I have often thought of this remark in connection with Jasper Dean McFall, who devotes himself entirely to this one object. His pupils, Mrs. Charles Bayly, Mrs. Joseph Chum, Mrs. Dana Holland, Mrs. M. K. Wiley, Miss Pickering, Miss Beulah Greene, Miss Elizabeth Alexander and Miss Adele Levers gave a little musicale at his studio last Wednesday. Mr. McFall was heard to fine advantage in an oratorio selection, for which his well placed, evenly balanced voice was eminently fitted. There was a ladies' quartet under the direction of Mrs. McFall.

The first lecture-recital in the MacReynalds-Koehle course was given on Friday. Miss Pauline Whitaker and a ladies' string quartet assisted.

The second concert of the Washington Saengerbund, under the direction of Henry Xander, will be given tomorrow evening. One of the soloists is to be Mrs. Alice Kraft Benson.

BERENICE THOMPSON.

HEINRICH MEYN, BASSO CANTANTE.—Mr. Meyn's new house at the Onteora Club, in the Catskills, is nearing completion, and will when completed be one of the largest and handsomest in those mountains. A peep into Mr. Meyn's new studio shows a handsome new Seinway baby grand (a present from Mrs. Meyn), and other artistic furnishings. Mr. Meyn, who is not to be confounded with the young tenor of the same name, has many important engagements booked, among others, in Boston with the Saint Cæcilia Society; in Washington, November 20; Northampton, Philadelphia, Pittsburg and other engagements pending.

Mr. Meyn will this year devote himself especially to concert and oratorio singing, in which fields he has made his greatest reputation. His fine style, superb control of several languages and personality go a great way to bring about his popularity and prominence.

TENOR JOHN YOUNG.—Appended are the dates so far made by the now well-known tenor: October 22, Englewood, N. J.; October 24, Goshen, N Y., "Joan of Arc"; October 28, Bloomfield, N. BAERNSTEIN RECITAL IN BINGHAMTON.—Joseph Baernstein is advertised to give a song recital in Binghamton on November 21. That city has not had a vocal recital by a star for some years, and although the prices have been somewhat advanced over regular concert fees, there are over 400 reserved seats sold. This is by far the largest advance sale known of in the little town.

WHITNEY TEW

In America
November,
December
And January.

The London Press says of Mr. Tew's singing:

The Stage—"Mr. Whitney Tew proved himself a singer of excellent capabilities. His voice, which is a bass of great compass, is delightfully sympathetic—now full of tenderness, now instinct with passion and joy. He could not have been surpassed in his rendering of Schumann's 'Der Knabe mit dem Wunderhorn' and Liza Lehmann's curiously weird 'Myself when Young.'"—July 4, 1901.

London Musical Courier—"Mr. Whitney Tew's singing was marked by a high order of intelligence. He is one of the few singers now before the public who possesses the many qualifications that mean success. Besides a voice powerful and sympathetic he has a remarkable memory, and he never fails to display an intuitive knowledge of the poetic and dramatic significance of the text. In four songs by Bach, Brahms, Schubert and Schumann he exhibited great powers of vocalization and expression, and a style in singing German so thoroughly Teutonic that it was hard at times to realize his American origin . . . Three songs in English were equally impressive."—July 5, 1901.

Ladies' Field—"That fine bass singer, Mr. Whitney Tew, gave the first of his recitals in Steinway Hall. Madame Lehmann's 'In Memoriam' was a great test of Mr. Tew's manner and inflection, and he sustained the interest of his audience well throughout it; and it is a supremely hard work for a single voice—fragmentary, passionate, moody, with its pedal-note of acute sorrow. . . . Mr. Tew is fortunate in possessing a powerful voice of fine quality, and he has both the voice and brains for success."—May 25, 1901.

Daily Telegraph—"Mr. Tew is an artist who commands attention and deserves praise. Especially has he the gift of feeling and the power of conveying it to others, while in point of intelligence he leaves but little to desire. Mr. Tew essayed last evening songs of widely contrasting kinds and of various countres, but the manner and spirit proper to each were easily revealed, and the result was a conspicuous success."—May 23 1901.

EUROPEAN NOTES.

A young violinist, Jaroslav Kocian, made his first appearance at Prague with brilliant success. His technic, as well as the soulfulness of his play, obtained general recognition.

Dr. Rochas Freiherr von Liliencross lately visited Vienna as representative of the Musical Historical Commission of Germany. He will open negotiations with the Austrian commission in order to define their separate fields of action and to come to a better understanding. He was received by the Minister of Public Instruction, Von Hartel, to whom he communicated the details of the foundation of the German "Denkmäler der Tonkunst." The Austrian "Denkmäler" has published in the last eight years sixteen folio volumes.

The dispute about Brahms' will is not yet settled. A new trial has been applied for on the ground of newly discovered evidence, namely, the draft of a will found in a drawer of Brahms, alongside the will published April 3, 1897, in the letter to Simrock.

The Polish Theatre at Warsaw, which enjoys a yearly subvention of 150,000 roubles, is to be thoroughly reformed. The ballet, on which immense sums have been spent, will be reduced. Protests are made against the high salaries paid to foreign artists. Italian opera will be discontinued and Polish opera must take its place. But where are the Polish operas?

At Cassel two novelties produced at the Hof Theatre had great success. The first, "Mutterliebe" words and music by Gustav Deppe of the Kullak Academy, Berlin, is a profound soul picture, with musical illustration of the words "Love never ceases." The characteristic independent tone painting of Deppe shows high endowments, his orchestra speaks a language which goes to the heart, while his technic is of the most modern style. The other piece, a Norwegian village story, text and music by Otto Dorn, royal music director at Wiesbaden, is very effective and presents a series of charming tone pictures.

Josef Bayer's new operetta, "The Aztek," will be performed for the first time at Moscow. The composer will conduct.

The Residenz Theatre, of Dresden, produced on October 5 the new opera, "Jadwiga," by Dellinger. The text is Scribe's libretto for the "Crown Diamonds," with the scene changed from Portugal to Poland. The music is full of melody, well harmonized and effectively instrumented. Some of the airs, such as the waltzes, will certainly be popular. On the same day the Royal Opera House gave "Das Mädchenherz," by Buongiorno, originally produced at Cassel. At Dresden it has been cut down from four acts to three, by the omission of almost all the third act except the finale, which is added to the second act. In spite of the loss of some dramatic effect, the piece was as successful as it had been at the first performance in Cassel.

A lady described as "Spanish-German" coloratura singer made her first appearance on any stage at Coburg in "Lucia di Lammermoor." Fräulein Schell was born a German, but her father was for a long time a resident of Barcelona.

The tenor Meister, accused by the Karl Theatre, of Vienna, of breach of contract, was arrested at the close of the performance at the Theater am der Wien. But peace seems to have been patched up, as he is again singing at the latter house.

A Vienna journal complains of the care and attention so zealously bestowed on Wagner's opera by the Hof Oper. The zeal is becoming over-zeal, which is not serviceable even to Wagnerophiles, and this overfeeding on Wagner is likely to produce a reaction such as took place ten years ago, when "Cavalleria Rusticana" was so bepraised. More attention ought to be paid to other composers. Works like "La Muette de Portici," "Les Huguenots," "La Juive," "Die Entführung aus dem Serail," have not appeared on its program for a long time.

In the village of Wychwatinez, in Podolia, the birthplace of Anton Rubinstein, an elementary school has been established to bear his name. The funds for it were contributed by his countless admirers. Attention will be given to training the pupils in music, especially in vocal music. It is intended also to make his birth house into a museum, and to erect a statue to him in the village.

The Arthur Sullivan Memorial Fund has not made much progress. As only $5,000 have been subscribed by a few rich men, while the public seem indifferent, it is probable that the plan of erecting a statue on the Thames Embankment will have to be abandoned.

Fräu Moran Olden, the well-known dramatic singer, intends to establish a school of opera and singing in Frankfort-on-the-Main. Her husband, Theodor Bertram, has been engaged for the next Bayreuth Festival to sing Wotan, Holländer and Amfortas.

The new Berlin music review, Die Musik, is a handsome book of about 100 pages, with numerous illustrations and many interesting articles by well-known musical writers. It is published once a fortnight.

Amie Gros, the director of the Musical Conservatory at Lyon, France, has died; as has also Giuseppe Carrili-Winter, conductor and singing teacher, whose death took place at Naples at the age of eighty-four years.

Falda, teacher of the trombone at the Verdi Conservatory, in Milan, died a few weeks ago at the age of fifty-five years.

Ernest Schmidt, director of the Schubert Singing Society, of Vienna, died September 20.

Madame Schroder Hanfstängl, formerly of the Metropolitan Opera House and, later on, in Frankfort, has accepted a position as singing teacher at the Royal Academy of Music in Munich.

In Bologna, Italy, Wagner's "Meistersinger" is announced for this season.

TOURS and CONCERTS ARRANG

R. WATKIN-MILLS.

WHAT seems a wise arrangement is being planned for a second tour in this country of the eminent Eng- basso, R. Watkin-Mills. The manager of the singer, Spencer Jones, is about to book the artist for concert, itals and oratorio for the months of April, May and e, 1902, a time when there is a dearth of concerts in Eastern cities of this country. The coming tour is to lude the principal cities of the United States and Can- . Those familiar with the musical conditions in New rk and Boston have frequently wondered why the sical season ended so abruptly—about the middle of ril, two months at least before we get the real hot ather. Anyone who has studied the field can under- nd that a judicious manager with a good artist may nt upon a successful tour during the spring and early mer. When Mr. Watkin-Mills was heard here before captured his hearers in all the cities where he sang. voice, a noble, resonant organ, is accompanied by nanly presence and a sincere and irreproachable vocal thod. An English admirer of Mr. Watkin-Mills pays this tribute:

oratorio and concert work of the higher order, his is ever the t prominent name, and has come to imply so much in taste and eral excellence upon a program that those whose duty it may o arrange recitals and otherwise cater to the music loving com- nity invariably turn to scan the engagement list of this eminent lishman, in order that they may, if possible, secure his wonder- voice for the pièce de résistance of their several events.

ideed, so pressing have been many of the invitations offered to enter upon an operatic career that he has long since de- ed the highest credit for having remained in the field of ora- o and recital work. As such he is absolutely unrivaled. The s of two continents has claimed this for him and the world endorsed the opinion. Of his versatility there seems to be no t, his ability ranging from the heaviest "Elijah" roles to the dling of the most tenderly sentimental ballad music.

Following are some of the English press criticisms:

Watkin-Mills sang his very first notes with such grandeur and ness of tone that one was tempted to think him better than . His "Deign great Apollo," from Beethoven's "Ruins of ens," was a grand piece of vocalization without an atom of per- al display at the expense of the composer. He aroused the test enthusiasm, and responded with an English song.—Bir- gham Gazette, March 6, 1900.

he high reputation of Mr. Mills was a sufficient assurance of his ess in the role of the Storm King, in which he sang with all his stomed vigor and spirit. He scored heavily in the well-known "O Ruddier Than the Cherry."—Bradford Observer, February 1900.

EDS PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY IN "THE MESSIAH."

f the soloists, Mr. Watkin-Mills most thoroughly realized he it of Händelian music. "Sound as a bell" is the epithet that ribes his voice; "firm as a rock" that which is most applicable is singing of the rapid divisions in such an air as "Why Do the ions." He sang it with a manly vigor that deserved the roar pplause with which it was received, but the compliment to the er need not have been coupled with an insult to the composer the applauders restrained their ardor for the few seconds nec- ry to play the final ritornel.—Yorkshire Post, December 20, 1900.

wo years ago, when Mr. Watkin-Mills sang with the Brooklyn Oratorio Society in "The Messiah," THE MUSICAL COURIER referred thus to his share in the perform- e:

the four soloists, Watkin-Mills especially distinguished him- His solos, "The People That Walked" and "Why Do the ons," were given with all possible distinction and beauty of ession and phrasing; moreover, the gifted English basso pos- es a most glorious oratorio voice.

Appended are other criticisms from papers in the United States and Canada:

R. Watkin-Mills had reason to feel complimented last night by the enthusiasm of the audience at his recital. Not content with the thirteen numbers on the program, appreciation was evidenced by steady and determined encores.—Washington (D. C.) Post, January 9, 1900.

Seldom have I heard a concert basso who pleased me more than Watkin-Mills, who appeared in the Artist Series of Recitals on Wednesday evening. To his robust personality of style Mr. Mills brings a powerful and melodious voice of perfect basso quality, rich and resonant in all its range of two and a half octaves. He adds the training and mentality that stamp the thorough artist. He sings the most difficult music with perfect vocalization and beauty of tone. His program was entirely in English.—Cleveland (Ohio) Town Topics, December 15, 1899.

Whether as a concert or oratorio singer, R. Watkin-Mills, with a voice of wonderful power, distinction of finish and style, and with a personality as magnetic as his voice is attractive, never fails to charm an Ottawa audience. His singing was wholly artistic and intelligent. The opinion was generally expressed after the concert that never has he been heard in better voice in Ottawa.—Ottawa (Canada) Citizen, December 28, 1899.

If hearty enthusiasm and every manifestation of intense enjoyment count for anything, the song recital in the Auditorium last evening by Mr. Watkin-Mills was a great success. Mr. Mills is probably the greatest of English bassos, and was not unknown to London music lovers.—London (Canada) Advertiser, December 29, 1899.

Never perhaps in the annals of Cobourg has a more cultivated or fashionable audience greeted any artist than one assembled last evening to hear the renowned English basso, Mr. Watkin-Mills, and no one went away disappointed. In evenness of quality, firmness of timber and beauty of tone Mr. Mills' voice is remarkable.—Cobourg (Canada) World, December 8, 1899.

The City Hall was packed with a highly respectable and cultured audience to hear England's most eminent basso Mr. Watkin-Mills. The ablest critic admits that Watkin-Mills is without a peer in his class.—Kington (Canada) News.

He was in excellent form, spirits and voice, and swayed the large audience as he willed, and last night added honors to those already thick upon him.—Toronto (Canada) World.

Expectations fulfilled in the highest degree. A grand musical success from beginning to end.—St. John (N. B.) Globe.

Scored a veritable triumph.—Halifax Chronicle.

The greatest bass voice ever heard here. The recital was one of the best ever given in the city.—Halifax Herald.

MUSICAL COURIER OFFICES—FINE ARTS BUILDING.

CHICAGO, October 30, 1901.

FROM a dramatic point of view, "Petticoats and Bayonets," the new so-called play which Ada Rehan's promising young nephew is presenting sumptuously this week at the Studebaker Hall, Fine Arts Building, has a peculiar effect upon the mind of the theatregoer.

To illustrate: It is painfully evident that the voluntaries of some organists are being "made up" as they "go along." And so it is with this play. As a theatrical improvisation it stands alone. At least that is the way you are inclined to feel about it, as you listen.

Perhaps the most absurd feature of all is the hat worn by the heroine in the last scene.

"Go, get your hat and coat!" cries the hero, who is about to escape somewhere or other with his lady love, in an hour of war time terrors.

Surely the most appropriate thing for the lady to do is to snatch the nearest antimacassar or shawl and throw it over her head. Or, better still, the heroine's brown hair might nestle (à la the second to last page of "The Crisis") in the blue coat of the hero, as gallantly—and how effectively!—he throws it round her.

But alas! No. The heroine disappears into the next room and returns with a sunbonnet, which is quite ridiculous enough to upset any dramatic situation. If it had been a picture hat with too many feathers you could have forgiven it. But the sunbonnet is mirth provoking.

A "lilac sunbonnet" did very well in a pretty story by a popular author. But that was a pretty story, and this is said to be a serious play.

Of course, the sunbonnet time being lost and gone forever, the enemics appear. But, heaven be praised! the rescuers draw nigh.

There is a tableau. Fondly the hero—you hope he is a hero, but you're not sure, because part of the time he is a spy—embraces the heroine, sunbonnet and all. But first come an array of sentences which you cannot make out. Were they improvisations? They just as well might have been. Finally, the hero says something about being perfectly contented with the "name of Ruth."

But what does he think of that sunbonnet, you wonder, as the curtain falls.

Arthur Byron is worthy of better productions than the above. Life is too short for the inartistic. The Studebaker Hall also is deserving of the best plays dramatic literature affords.

And the orchestra?

Last Monday night some of the selections which came between the acts were quite as remarkable, in their way, as the heroine's sunbonnet. "The Mikado" always is cheerful and other comic operas will do. But away with cannonading absurdities. We want music. And we hold that instruments of music must not be chastised.

It is said that when the name of Emil Liebling is carried down into history, people will speak of "Liebling and his bag." You see, Mr. Liebling teaches all day long. Letters and such things must not interrupt him. So into the little brown leather bag goes everything. And at night, when genius burns and the pen works quickly, the gifted musician replies to his correspondents or writes those brilliant and wide-awake articles which delight the great reading public. THE MUSICAL COURIER knows how Emil Liebling writes.

"Bag," did you say?

Emil Liebling's brain is his bag. It is receptive and it expands. It receives impressions of character, ideas on music, journalism, art; on a thousand and one things. Nothing that comes its way is turned aside. In very truth the world will remember Emil Liebling and his bag!

Mary Wood Chase, the well-known Chicago pianist, contributes to the October number of Music an interesting article on octave playing.

"Having recently been informed," writes Miss Chase, "that a certain adverse critic kindly called my octave work 'Playing octaves by the grace of God, and not by any possible result of Oscar Raif's teachings of octave practice,' I have been asked wherein lies the secret, if secret there were. Some attain a brilliancy and endurance in one way, some another. All I can say is that with far less hard work and almost physical suffering caused by striving after surety and endurance before accepting the Raif means to the end, I have since, through that means, attained what of result critics may find. With more willingness to expend more of vitality, the result might also undoubtedly be greater, but as technic is to me only rightly to be considered a means of interpreting the greatest musical thoughts, and not as a means of showing off wonderful physical or mental feats, which more rightly should belong on the vaudeville stage or in the circus ring, it seems useless to spend so much energy to astonish people. Teach people to love music, not to wonder at a few pyrotechnical displays. Art is too serious and too beautiful, and astonishment is cheap nowadays, with all our remarkable achievements and inventions.

"As for octaves, as one of the technical means to the end of interpreting the great tone poets, two ways of practice may be discussed. In the generally accepted method of practicing octaves, it has been held as the dominant point that the wrist needs to be more flexible, that the muscles of the forearm must be trained to raise and drop the hand from the wrist as rapidly as po and must be trained for endurance, with the musc the upper arm as support and impetus. While octave playing is frequently developed in this way, seldom, and then only by dint of most fatiguing pr that a brilliant, broad tone, combined with fluenc endurance as well as surety, are attained."

Miss Chase then gives a sympathetic and intell account of Oscar Raif's methods of octave practice.

This is not a case of "distance lends enchantment." scene is laid in the State of Illinois.

Miss Superficiality was just seventeen and she "p divinely," so her friends said. True, she was non sure of her scales, and a cruel critic once remarked: skimmed the keys." But, like Anthony Hope's Qui she had her "moments."

NOVEMBER 2, 1901.

Readers who delight in the traditional will be interested learning that at Charles R. Baker's concerts, to be held re on December 9 and 10, Victor Herbert will be invited wield the baton used by Sapio at the opening of the ditorium in 1889, on which occasion Madame Patti sang, d President Harrison was among those who heard her.

The annual faculty concert of the Sherwood Music hool is to take place at 2:30 p. m. on Tuesday, November in the Music Hall, Fine Arts Building. An interesting ogram will be given by W. H. Neidlinger, Leon Marx, orgia Kober, Shirley Gandell, Eleanor P. Sherwood, athilde Heuchling, Leone Langdon Key, Clara Murray d Mary Dennis Manning. Miss Kober and Mr. Marx ve arranged to play a Grieg Sonata for piano and volin.

An artistic studio recital was given at the Hamlin Comny's attractive Kimball Hall studios on the afternoon of tober 31. Miss Jessie Harding read "Enoch Arden," to piano accompaniment of Mrs. Mason. Miss Harding a magnetic personality, and her reading of the well-own poem was admirable, while the musical setting by chard Strauss heightened the dramatic effects. Mrs. cille Stevenson Tewksbury, soprano, accompanied by s. Leone Langdon Key, sang this group of songs, which asioned additional interest in the event: "The Willow," ring Thomas; "Until God's Day," Buck; "In Summer ne," German; "Lullaby," Henschel, and "Morning mn," Henschel.

The Spiering Quartet announces its ninth season in Chio. Three concerts will be given at the Music Hall, Fine s Building, on Tuesday evenings, November 19; Deber 17 and Jannary 21. W. C. E. Seeboeck and Sidney en will be the soloists for the first concert. At the sec- event Miss Bertha M. Kaderly and Walter Spry will st. In the third concert a pianist of distinction may ticipate.

Musicians in this city are glad to learn that Arthur Bird, a hicagoan, has won the chamber music prize in the recent lerewski competition. Mr. Bird belongs to a well-wn musical family.

The following account of the career of one of the Sher-d Music School's most prominent teachers will be read interest:

Miss Eleanor P. Sherwood, like W. H. Sherwood, re-ed her elementary instruction in music from her er, who conducted the second music school founded in America. Miss Sherwood has studied piano chiefly with her brother and theory and composition with O. T. Boise, in Berlin, where she has recently spent two years. Her work as a teacher has been under the direction of Mr. Sherwood. She held the position of resident director of music at St. Mary's School, Knoxville, Ill., for four seasons, Mr. Sherwood visiting the school as examining director.

"This musician has now become her brother's principal assistant in his school. She possesses a superior general education, and is a player of much musical ability and artistic temperament. Her development and understanding of teaching methods, including technic, touch and phrasing, have been on the same line with her brother's work for some twelve or fourteen years. Her ability as a composer has been demonstrated by some very creditable productions. She has prepared a goodly number of the best trained pupils, who have afterward attended the Sherwood Music School, and her value as first assistant teacher in the piano and theory department puts that institution on even a more thorough basis of equipment for elementary and medium grades. For the past two summers she has been Mr. Sherwood's first assistant at the Chautauqua Assembly."

The gifted baritone, Frederick Warren, of the Chicago Auditorium Conservatory, is giving an artistic series of Tuesday afternoon recitals, in his studio. The programs include "All the World Awakes To-Day," Edward German; "The Dew Upon the Lily," Edward German; "My Love and I Sat Close Together," Edward MacDowell; "The West Wind Croons in the Cedar Trees," Edw. MacDowell; "The Fountain Mingles With the River," Gounod; "Songs My Mother Taught Me," Antonin Dvorák; "The March Wind," Arthur Foote; "Don Juan's Serenade," Tschaikowsky; "Bright Are the Stars, Love," Frederic Grant Gleason; "My Heart and I," Korbay; "The Harp," Grieg; "The Danza," Geo. W. Chadwick; "Irish Love Song," Margaret Ruthven Lang; "To My First Love," Lohr; "You'd Better Ask Me," Lohr; "King Duncan's Daughters," Allitsen; "Long Ago in Alcala," André Messager.

Elizabeth Blamere, the talented soprano, who recently has come to Chicago from New York, possesses a dramatic voice of wide range, much flexibility and excellent quality. She has received careful instruction from Oscar Saenger, of New York, and her repertory is varied and extensive. The following are a few of Miss Blamere's press notices:

The second concert of the fourth season of the Woman's String Orchestra, Carl Lachmund director, was held in the Astor Gallery of the Waldorf-Astoria yesterday afternoon, and was attended by a large audience, manifestly pleased with the various musical offerings. Miss Elizabeth Blamere, a new singer, showed herself possessed of a beautiful soprano voice of expressive quality, singing the Bemberg "Concert Waltz" brilliantly, receiving a hearty encore.—New York Sun, February 21, 1900.

A large audience listened to the several numbers of "Stabat Mater," given under the capable leadership of Glenwood Preble, in Englewood, last evening. Miss Elizabeth Blamere, recently from New York, who possesses a high, clear soprano voice, rendered the solo in "Inflammatus" with finished effect.—Chicago Evening Post, March 4, 1901.

We herewith present a picture of Miss Elizabeth Blamere, who delighted the Pen Women's Club and guests last evening with her charming singing. Miss Blamere is a successful singer from New York and is a decided gain to Chicago's musical circles.—Chicago American, February 30, 1901.

The recital given this afternoon by Elizabeth Blamere, of Chicago, and Julius Seyler, of Detroit, was a highly artistic affair. The critics were unanimous in declaring these artists very talented.—Terre Haute (Ind.) Tribune, June 24, 1901.

WILLIAM A. WILLETT.

William A. Willett, of the Chicago Auditorium Conservatory, has entered upon a very busy season. On November 19 he will sing at a concert to be given under the auspices of the Rogers Park Musical Club. His other engagements include a recital at the Library Hall, Ravenswood, Ill., November 26; December 5, the Schumann Club, Chicago, oratorial lecture; recital at the Auditorium Conservatory, December 7; recital at the Kenwood Hotel, December 14.

Last Thursday evening Mr. Willett's singing aroused enthusiasm at the Hayden Hotel, in this city, when he was compelled to respond to a number of encores. The audience was essentially musical. This afternoon three promising pupils of Mr. Willett, Rose Nusbaum, soprano; Theckla Leafbourg, contralto, and Albert A. White, baritone, will take part in a musicale at the Chicago Auditorium Conservatory.

Victor Garwood, the eminent piano instructor, is engaged in teaching a large class of pupils at the American Conservatory, where Mr. Garwood's musicianship and general artistic culture rightly are held in very high esteem.

THE AMATEUR MUSICAL CLUB.

Last Monday afternoon the Amateur Musical Club, of Chicago, held its first concert of the season in the Music Hall, Fine Arts Building. A representative and appreciative audience heard the program, which proved to be an interesting one. The gifted soprano, Miss Mary Peck Thompson, sang "O, Sleep," aria from "Semele," Händel; "Fruhlingslied," Mendelssohn, and Blumenthal's "En dormant." As a concluding number Miss Thompson gave Coombs' "The Sea of Sleep." Her interpretations were worthy of high praise. Arensky's trio for piano, violin and 'cello, played by Mrs. Annetta R. Jones, Mr. Kraus and Mr. Brueckner, was an important feature. On this occasion the other competent performers were Miss Veronica Murphy, pianist; Mrs. C. Furness Hately, vocalist, and Mrs. Magnus, accompanist.

THE AMERICAN CONSERVATORY'S RECITAL.

At Kimball Hall last Saturday afternoon a recital was given by Allen Spencer, pianist; Holmes Cowper, tenor; Adolf Weidig and Miss Louise Robyn. The names of these performers are of themselves an indication that the event was a success, and the large audience present did not fail to show its approval. The program included composi-

Louis Francis Brown makes the following announcement: Burton Holmes, the eminent lecturer on travel, is to open this his ninth season in Evanston, Ill., on November 18, when he will deliver the first of his new series of lectures at the Congregational Church in that city. The following evening, November 19, he will appear in Milwaukee at Pabst's Theatre, and on the evening of November 21 will make his first Chicago appearance of the present season at the Studebaker Theatre. He will also appear in the latter place the evening of November 22, and the afternoon of Saturday, November 23. On Thursday and Friday evenings and Saturday afternoons for four weeks thereafter he will be at the Studebaker. During the season Mr. Holmes will be heard in most of the principal cities of the country, both East and West.

Mrs. St. Clair Martens.

Eunice St. Clair Martens appeared here last week for the first time since her return from Paris. The occasion was a reception given by Mrs. La Verne Noyes in honor of the North Side Art Club, and Mrs. Martens' singing made a most favorable impression. Upon the development of her voice and other equally satisfactory signs of artistic progress she was enthusiastically congratulated by many musicians present, who were not surprised to learn of the encouragement which this soprano's European teachers, Sbriglia, of Paris, and Panzani, of London, have given her. Mrs. Martens' voice is described as a dramatic soprano, the volume of which is peculiarly combined with sweetness of tone. She possesses temperament and the ability to interpret the meaning of a composer. This singer will be heard frequently in public, and it is very probable that she will meet with exceptional success.

William C. Carl's Recital.

The distinguished New York organist, William C. Carl, will give a recital at the Church of St. Vincent de Paul, in this city, on November 5. Glenn Hall, the well-known tenor, has been engaged to take part in this notable event.

Sunday Afternoon Concerts.

The Musical Courier has received the following contribution in regard to an interesting venture:

The idea of popular Sunday afternoon concerts has been tried in Chicago, but has yet failed to materialize as satisfactorily as it has in the East, perhaps due to the fact that they have not been systematically given, or that the attraction was not great enough to warrant the popular following that such an undertaking should have, yet on Easter Sunday last, Hofmann, the great pianist, succeeded in filling the Studebaker Theatre, thus demonstrating that when a true artist is advertised there is a sufficient number of music loving people in Chicago to patronize such a venture. Under these circumstances the announcement will be greeted with pleasure that a combination has been formed and arrangements concluded for a series of popular Sunday afternoon concerts, to be given on the last Sunday afternoon of each month, respectively, November 24, December 29, January 26, February 23, March 30 and April 27, in the Music Hall (formerly University Hall), Fine Arts Building.

It is appropriate to state here that one of the most successful series of popular Sunday afternoon and evening concerts ever given took place last season, under the direction of Mrs. Jean D. Ives, in Her Majesty's Theatre, Montreal, Canada.

Liela A. Breed.

Miss Liela A. Breed is one of the most competent and painstaking singing teachers in Chicago, and her pupils are forcibly illustrating that the results of her work are exceedingly satisfactory. Her studio in the Fine Arts Building is a scene of much activity.

Miss Bertha Williams, pupil of William Willett, has been engaged as soprano soloist at the First Congregational Church, Omaha, Neb.

Mrs Patrick Campbell, the English actress, will make her American début in this city on December 30.

Edmond Aman-Jean, member Société des Artistes Française, contributed to last Sunday's Tribune an article entitled "America Will Lead in Art."

Mary Wood Chase.

Mary Wood Chase, the accomplished pianist, has been engaged for the following local events: Handel Society concert, December 10; lecture-recital, Hyde Park Hotel, in December; lecture, Chicago Woman's Club, February 12, and the Temple of Music orchestral concert. Miss Chase will play at the Ithaca Conservatory, Ithaca, N. Y.; Knox Conservatory of Music, Galesburg, Ill.; before various clubs and colleges in Kentucky, Tennessee, Ohio, Iowa, Minnesota and North Dakota, and during the present season will be heard also in New York city.

A violinist who will be heard frequently in public this season is Jan Van Oordt, of the American Conservatory. Mr. Van Oordt's professional engagements embrace extensive teaching, as well as solo playing and ensemble work.

Mrs. Regina Watson.

Mrs. Regina Watson, the highly esteemed and eminently successful teacher of piano playing, is this season engrossed in professional duties which are to her a pleasure and an inspiration. Mrs. Watson directs not only her own school, on Indiana street; she has charge of the music at educational institutions conducted by Mrs. Stella Dyer Loring and Professor Coulter; also at the Girton School, in Winnetka.

The Second Orchestral Concert.

Berlioz's Overture, "King Lear," constituted the opening number at the Chicago Orchestra's concert, under Theodore Thomas' direction, in the Auditorium yesterday afternoon.

Next came Symphony in E flat, by Felix Weingartner, which on this occasion was heard for the first time in America. The work is dramatic and melodious. It is occasionally overwhelming and incongruous. Yesterday afternoon the audience seemed hardly to know what to make of it. But they liked it, that was evident. A local critic claims that it is lacking in originality. In originality of conception it may sometimes be lacking; but there is much charm and originality of treatment.

A detailed analysis of this interesting novelty might well occupy several columns devoted to musical criticism. The brilliant young musician, Felix Weingartner, possesses genius, and when he does not display genius his ingenuity is apparent.

The remaining selections were Wagner's "Vorspiel," "Die Meistersinger"; Bach's noble Suite, No. 4, in D, and Symphonic Poem, "Le Chasseur Maudit," Franck. This program was well chosen and arranged, and it was not too long. To-night it will be repeated in the Auditorium.

ZELDENRUST ARRIVES.

(Reprinted from last week's Musical Courier Extra.)

MR. EDUARD ZELDENRUST, the eminent Dutch pianist, arrived here last week from Europe on the steamship Potsdam, and will begin his concert tour in Cincinnati with a performance in conjunction with the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, of which Frank van der Stucken is conductor.

Mr. Zeldenrust will play the Baldwin Concert Grand piano, and will supplement still further the distinguished honors that have already been awarded to this remarkable musical product, for it is by this time known on both continents that the Baldwin Piano received the highest possible honors at the Paris Exposition last year, and that it has since then sustained the reputation it secured, and has been the means of placing the house of Baldwin in the very front rank of eminent piano producers.

Mr. Zeldenrust's tour has been outlined, and he will also play with other orchestral organizations in this country, and will give a series of recitals in New York and Boston.

Cincinnati is a musical city sui generis, being the only city in the United States with musical organizations that secure artists from Europe, irrespective of their performances in other cities. The great soloists that are engaged by the Cincinnati May Musical Festival are engaged for it solely, and they come to Cincinnati and return directly to Europe without appearing in any other cities. It is a peculiarity of Cincinnati in that it demonstrates its own musical judgment independent of any other city, and solely upon its own judgment and experiences. Therefore the novelty is presented to us in the case of Zeldenrust appearing for the first time in Cincinnati. We understand that for the next May Musical Festival, Ben Davis, the tenor, and Andrew Black, the basso, have been engaged to sing, and that they will then return at once to Europe, but Mr. Zeldenrust may make a tour of the country. Mr. Zeldenrust, being a native of Holland, has been invited to give a recital under the auspices of Baron Gevers, the Ambassador from Holland at Washington, and this recital will be given in January, and may be an orchestral performance instead of a recital.

As for Mr. Zeldenrust's playing, there is not anything to say regarding it at present, except that he is one of the leading solo pianists of Europe, and will ratify the good opinion held of him on that subject by his performances on this side of the ocean. His first appearance will be on November 29 and 30, and he will upon that occasion introduce himself with the Beethoven Emperor Concerto.

Florence Ranstead.—Miss Florence Ranstead, a Futher singer, who recently returned from Europe, will give her first New York recital at the Waldorf-Astoria, Friday afternoon, November 15. Miss Ranstead is a contralto. The London critics highly praised her voice and style. The young artist is a pupil of Bouhy.

DRESDEN, FRANKLINSTRASSE 20,
October 20, 1901.

ENZO BUONGIORNO'S new opera, "The Heart of a Girl" ("Das Mädchenherz"), met with an enthusiastic reception here when brought out r the first time, October 5, on the Court Opera stage. ; for the artistic success of the work, it was duly knowledged after the initial performance in Cassel last nter, when it was highly spoken of and favorably criti- ed in nearly all musical papers of the world, including e columns of this paper.

Buongiorno's rich powers of expression are especially ling in lyric episodes. The music is free from all bar- ric effects, startling progressions and abrupt changes moods. Full of melodic charm, sweetness and feeling, impresses the hearer as a touching outflow of personal periences in the composer's life, which apparently has t been spent in idle contemplation of its various freaks, : in full sympathy with its misery, such as revealed in ial and artistic circles—mostly behind the scenes—and the tramp of everyday life's happenings and annoy- es.

The composition consists of three acts and an epilogue. r the Dresden production it had been curtailed, ap- ring here—after the wise and artistic suggestions of unt Seebach—in three parts, very much in its favor, the diction (by Illica), which is composed exclusively episodes and moods in the emotional or satirical key, ot important nor interesting enough to fill four acts. a "lyric opera" (so it is entitled) it fully realizes ex- tations. Dramatic it is not, despite the deeply moving l scenes at the death bed of the heroine, whose char- er is but too dimly drawn—or was not distinctly out- d by the performer—to arouse our sincere sympathy. king backbone, and above all, passionate intensity of ing. she is a sweet, weak willed creature in the hands ate, succumbing to her own fickleness, which finally ls her into physical and psychical decline. A sad y, but a true one drawn directly from life.

udwig Hartmann, the successful German translator of Italian text, in his criticism of the opera, gives a most pathetic sketch of the plot, which—as seen through spectacles—gains much in intensity and poetic concep- . Illica's libretto is less attractive to me. Full of p stage effects without variety—a little of the "Travi- ' a little of the "Figaro"—it lives in the light of long displaying scarcely any physiognomy.

s mentioned above, the plot deals with the fate of a Alba Bonomo, who, on account of her extreme beau- er fine voice and great talent, is persuaded to go on the e. Leaving her parents, her lover, Marino, her e—everything—behind, blinded by the false splendor he world, by success and by the "protection" of an duke, she runs straight into misery. After an only short period of luck, the sad lessons of life set in, and mournful recollections begin to haunt her troubled imagination. Marino, her true lover, looms up in her memory—that same Marino, who from despair at seeing himself jilted had entered the Church—pangs of remorse and a severe illness finally so tear upon the thread of her delicate health that she one day finds herself face to face with death. A clergyman is sent for—Marino the priest enters, and Alba breathes her last in the arms of her former playmate, now the apostle of truth, forbearance and peace.

Both public and press indorsed the composer's successful welding together of sound and text, music and language. His rich melodic invention, his temperament, stage experience, sentiment and the easy flow of his musical inspiration won the audience at once. Frequent recalls followed. Personally Mr. Buongiorno's truly Southern looks, his winning ways and unassuming manners greatly enhanced the favorable impression received by his first Dresden operatic début, for the success of which he, like the audience, will be obliged to all concerned—to Count Seebach, the intendant; to Von Schuch, the soloists, the orchestra and the excellent mise en scène under the experienced stage manager, Mr. Moris.

Von Schuch's conducting gave to the performance a spontaneous air. He is irresistible. The orchestra under his baton brought out indescribable beauties contained in the score, caressing the ear in the truly Italian fashion. Among the soloists Wedekind, as Alba, did very well. Vocally she has rarely achieved a more complete triumph.

In the second and third act she really "looked" the part, Alba being described as an uncommonly beautiful girl. A pity the wig and the rococo costume in the first act were so little becoming to her. Otherwise, as mentioned above, Frau Wedekind's vocal reading was artistic. Fräulein von Chavanne, as Corilla (the rival of Alba), acquitted herself successfully. Perron made the most of the part he had to sing. Frau Staudigl, as the Mother, was equal to all demands, looking very striking in her comely, stylish dress, which fitted her à merveille. Fräulein Nast, pretty as ever, made a charming chambermaid. Dr. Rabl conducted the small orchestra which played behind the scenes during the "musicale at the court of the Duke," this scene forming one of the features of the play. He did so both to Schuch's and the public's satisfaction. Weisbaden and Brünn will be the next cities to produce it. Herrmann Seemann's "Opernführer"—an exquisite collection—contains all the principal themes of the opera, the melodic strength and the "motifs" of which are so pronounced that they haunt the ear long after the representation is over.

The programs of the symphony concerts of the Royal Orchestra are uncommonly interesting this season. Except old, well-known works by Beethoven, Mozart, Schubert, Schumann, Berlioz, Brahms, &c., novelties will be brought out from the following composers: Volbach, Sinding, Lalo, Leo Blesh, Max Schilling, Gustav Mahler, Richard Strauss, G. Göhler, Saint-Saëns, Borodin, Tschaikowsky and Jean Sibelius, of Finland, whose legend, "The Swan of Tuonela," will be played. Soloists are Paderewski, Geloso, Arimondi, Pugno and d'Albert.

Novelty composition evenings are announced by Emil Kronke, the Dresden pianist, who, with the assistance of artists such as Burmester and Lillian Sanderson, will perform music never heard before. A very praiseworthy undertaking.

The next novelty at the opera will be Richard- Strauss' "Feuersnoth." "Figaro" was given lately with a guest from Leipsic, Fräulein Seebe, who is reported to have been successful in her role as Susanna. At the Neustadt Court Theatre a cycle of Shakespeare's dramas is running at present. "Jadviga," the operetta by Rudolf Dellinger, fills the Residenz Theatre every night.

Fräulein Maria Spies, the Dresden alto singer of the Haenish school, will give a concert in Berlin November 4. Fräulein Spies is a cousin of the late Hermine Spies. Some of our critics do not hesitate to place her even above her famous relation, her interpretative powers being quite prominent.

Next week the concert season will be on in full blast.

"STABAT MATER" WELL SUNG.

ROSSINI'S "Stabat Mater" was sung last Thursday evening by the choir of Calvary M. E. Church, 129th street and Seventh avenue, under the direction of A. Y. Cornell. The chorus included sixty selected voices and these were assisted by the regular choir of the church. Miss Kathrin Hilke, soprano; Mme. Josephine Jacoby, contralto, and Theodore Van Yorx, tenor, were the soloists who impressed the audience and made it possible to admire the Rossini airs.

Madame Jacoby was in splendid voice. Her solos were heartily applauded, and in the duet, "Quis est homo," with Miss Hilke, the rich, beautiful quality of her voice blended finely with that of the soprano.

Mr. Van Yorx's sympathetic tenor seems always at its best in sacred music. Miss Hilke sang the "Inflammatus" brilliantly, as she always does. Before the "Stabat Mater" was sung a miscellaneous concert was given. The choruses sang "The Miller's Wooing," by Fanning; "Vocal Combat," for male voices, by Buck. The soloists also added to the musical success of the earlier part of the evening, Mr. Cornell adding an organ number by Lefebvre-Wely.

Goodrich Engaged by Mr. Carl.

WILLIAM C. CARL, director of the Guilmant Organ School, has engaged A. J. Goodrich, formerly of Chicago (author of "Musical Analysis," "Analytical Harmony," &c.), to give a course of twenty lessons in musical analysis and musical history at the Guilmant Organ School, Thursday afternoons at 4 o'clock, beginning November 7

The work will be of interest and benefit to all students of music, and affords an exceptional opportunity to study with Mr. Goodrich. It is important that each member of the class shall be in attendance at the first lesson.

Sebastian B. Schlesinger's Songs.

MADAME NORDICA, during her tour in this country, will introduce several of S. B. Schlesinger's new songs. A. Quinzard & Co., of Paris, have just brought out four of Mr. Schlesinger's songs with French text: "Toujours," "La première harme," "Sirène" and "Lettre à Ninon."

The same firm will publish later "Recueil de 17 Melodies," by the same composer.

MARIE WITHOW.—Miss Marie Withow, the London vocal teacher, who has been in this country since June, sailed for England last Saturday on the steamer Campania, of the Cunard Line. Miss Withow was accompanied by her pupil, Miss Margaretha Bruntsch, of Alameda, Cal. The ladies spent several days in New York last week attending theatres, sight seeing and visiting friends here. Miss Withow passed most of the summer at her old home in California. She is one of the successful teachers of London now. Her new book on "The Liberation of the Voice" is soon to be published.

ROSENTHALIANA.

PROBABLY nowhere is the deadening inactivity of the dog days felt more keenly than in the offices of a large daily newspaper. At least, so young Barthmann had just said, sitting at his desk in the reporters' room of the Berlin Mittagblatt and tapping his nose rhythmically with a loose wrist and a long lead pencil.

"A nice profession for a man of ambition, I must say," he continued to complain; "nothing but dog bites, sunstrokes and accidental drownings."

"What did you expect to do when you came here?" queried grizzled old Boetticher, laying down his pen and looking quizzically at his younger colleague.

"Interviewing," replied Barthmann enthusiastically; "the interviewing of great personages. That's where I could show my real powers. Studying a man's face and character, divining the hidden meanings in his answers; matching my wits against his; questioning, probing, counter-questioning, dodging, fencing, sparring and wading forth from the encounter with the truth triumphant, the armor of reserve, the bulwark of deceit, the breastwork of prevarication shattered and banged to bits, the naked facts standing forth——"

"Clothe those facts at once and come in here, Barthmann," suddenly spoke the managing editor, appearing in the doorway of his private room. Sheepishly Barthmann followed him.

"I happened to hear something of what you said," began the managing editor. "Those are admirable sentiments for a young newspaper man. You should succeed with such principles. You complained of a lack of opportunity. I shall give you a chance. You've done some good musical articles for us. Moriz Rosenthal, the pianist, is in town, at the Reichshof Hotel. Do you think you could get an interesting interview for us; draw out some new facts?"

"I'll try, sir."

"Find out what he thinks of his colleagues. Get his opinions on modern men and things in music. He is keen and caustic and spares no one. Lead him on to the bitterest outbreaks against everybody and everything. That will make some spicy reading in the Mittagblatt."

"Yes, sir," said Barthmann, and left the room. Like a true reporter he went to work at his assignment the moment he received it. Already he was preparing in his mind some of the shrewd questions that would force important musical truths from the caustic Rosenthal.

"It's awfully easy," reflected Barthmann as he neared the Hotel Reichshof; "like all great artists, Rosenthal will be only too glad to talk. In my hands he'll be like wax. I'll mold him as I please."

"Herr Rosenthal is dining on the terrace," announced the stately portier. Barthmann sent a card advertising himself as the Mittagblatt's representative.

Some moments later our young journalist, with his most engaging smile, faced his unsuspecting victim, who, seated before an elegantly appointed table, seemed absorbed in X sharps and Y flats stirred up by the strenuous performance of Vörös Miska and his celebrated band.

"An interview for the readers of the Mittagblatt?" asked Rosenthal, good-naturedly; "take dinner with me. Waiter, another convert. Double the order I gave you. And get that dinner here with the speed of a hunted tortoise. If you do I'll include you in my evening prayer—or give you a tip, whichever you prefer. Now I'm at your service, Herr Barthmann."

"Um-ah! oh, yes," hastened the young man, asking his last question first, "Do you think a true artist should be bound by tradition? Should he not have an opinion of his own?"

"Some have several, suitable to various climes and times," answered Rosenthal.

"Should one practice scales?"

"One should not practice scales—one should play them perfectly."

"Whom do you consider a great modern composer?"

"Strauss."

"Johann or Richard Strauss?"

"Why be particular about such a trifling detail as a Christian name? Let us hold to the main questions."

"What do you think of 'Till Eulenspiegel?'*"

"A most valuable book for young and old. A pure source of innocent delight, of healthful merriment."

"Well, then, what do you think of 'The Bat?' ('Fledermaus.')?"

"A very unpleasant animal, commonly supposed to have predilections for one's hair."

"Should pianists compose?"

"A thousand times one resolves never to write down a musical idea, then one happens to hear a pretty melody somewhere, and instantly one composes it."

"What do you think of some of our younger artists, Hofmann, Kreisler, Hambourg, for instance?"

"I consider Johannes Kreisler‡ one of the happiest delineations of that wonderful author, E. T. A. Hofmann. Hamburg, too, I like, but my favorite harbor town is Genoa."

"Do you consider d'Albert a great composer?"

"I know his opera, 'The Departure' ('A breise'). What varied thoughts are suggested by the very title! A cold, dreary day, for instance; lovers bidding each other farewell, perhaps forever; tears, kisses, vows, more tears—the mere idea is heartrending."

"Idea is heartrending," stenographed Barthmann. "But how would you classify Busoni?"

"Busoni?" cried Rosenthal enthusiastically. "How Italian sounds the very name. Truly, Italy is the real home of beauty. The Levantinic Riviera, and the surroundings about Lago Maggiore are among the most enchanting spots on earth. And lower Italy, Sicily, stately Vesuvius, with its crown of smoke, and at its feet the three ghostly, buried cities. Pliny, the ancient and celebrated historian wrote: 'For a while one could hear subterranean rolling almost as loud as thunder——"

"I believe I read that in Bulwer's 'Last Days of Pompëi.' Pardon me, but I'd like your opinion on Godowsky's arrangements."

"I think he has made arrangements for a winter tour through Germany."

"I see, but how does De Pachmann's left hand impress you?"

"It is small, white and well kept."

"Do you consider Franz Liszt the father of modern piano playing?"

"Certainly of some of his chief exponents were I to believe all I hear from them."

"Whom do you regard as the greatest living composer?"

"Fréderic Chopin."

"And the greatest dead composer?"

"My friend, Max Breitenfeld, a piano teacher in Vienna. I believe he has just been appointed professor of counterpoint at the Conservatorium there."

"What do you think of THE MUSICAL COURIER?"

"He is certainly to be preferred to an unmusical one if he possess the other necessary qualifications."

"What form of composition do you like best?"

"Square, thick print, flexible cover."

"Should a composer print his Opus I.?"

"No; he should induce a well paying publisher to print it."

"Where is the most intelligent public to be found?"

"At my concerts."

During the last few questions and answers Barthmann's face had gradually assumed a vacant, then a pained expression. He drew forth his handkerchief and mopped it nervously across his forehead.

"Aren't you well?" inquired Rosenthal, regarding the young man anxiously; "you haven't touched your dinner."

"I—I—I'm quite well, thank you. I don't care for any dinner. I—I think I'll go."

"Are you sure there's nothing else you'd like to know?" urged Rosenthal, almost eagerly.

"N—No. Except that I intended to ask you for an autograph. I wanted to ask you to write only a line—something characteristic in one line."

"H'm! let me see," mused the great pianist; "in one line. Suppose I write the repertory of some of my brother pianists?"

Rosenthal's leave taking of the young reporter was truth fraternal. "Good-bye, my dear young man," he said, "whenever you'd like information about music, informations unadorned, frank and free, without pitfalls or prevarications, always come to me. I shall be only too happy to do everything in my power for you and your esteemed paper."

Later the portier found Barthmann wandering up and down the corridor, murmuring: "De Pachmann remembers him of Italian scenery; Liszt has a small hand; Busoni has a thick, flexible cover; Chopin is alive——"

When the portier politely asked him where he was going, Barthmann rather rudely replied that he didn't know, and what's more, he didn't give a damn.

HOTEL CECIL, LONDON,
October 28, 1901.

N Saturday, October 19, Mark Hambourg gave his second piano recital in Queen's Hall.

On the same afternoon Mr. Vert's annual con- t took place. The program was of ballad type. Ma- me Albani was the bright particular star, and she ored tremendous success with Mozart's "Non Temer," o songs by Noel Johnson and Max Bruch's "Ave aria," the last being a particularly fine performance. her singers and instrumentalists were Miss Ada Cross- , Lady Hallé, Mrs. Beerbohm Tree and Ben Davies, drew Black and George Grossmith.

On Monday evening the first Richter concert was held St. James' Hall. One cannot help regretting that Dr. chter has got so much into a groove. The programs the present series contain nothing that is at all novel, l though no one can possibly quarrel with Beethoven's eonora" No. 3 Overture, Dvorák's "New World" Sym- ony, Prelude to "Parsifal," and the two usual move- nts from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony on ssical grounds, one can hardly avoid wishing that Dr. hter would treat us to something that we have not heard te so often. That they were all magnificently played s without saying.

t Steinway Hall on the same evening Edgar Sweet, eciter and singer, gave a program which covered a tinctly wide field, ranging as it did from Shelley's a Skylark" to a humorous song called "Clara pps."

On Tuesday night a remarkably interesting experiment s tried at the Queen's Hall promenade concert. The gram was made up entirely of works by living British mposers, and the results certainly justified the experi- nt. Parry's orchestral Variations, Stanford's beautiful dipus Rex" overture, Coleridge Taylor's "Ballade," slow movement from the beautiful Symphony in C nor by Frederic Cliffe, German's popular "Henry I." dances, Cowen's "Butterflies' Ball" and MacCunn's nd of the Mountain and the Flood" overture all found es and were all admirably played.

ut by far the most successful performance of all was given of two military marches by Dr. Elgar, called mp and Circumstance." These marches are all that ches should be, full of life, with well marked rhythms, llent tunes and magnificent scoring. They evoked t enthusiasm, which they fully deserved, and the second to be repeated.

n Wednesday evening a very successful performance given of Mr. MacDowell's "Indian Suite," which was played for the first time in London. Other novelties ng the week have been Reginald Steggall's dramatic ude, "Oreithyia," George Schumann's "Dance of nphs and Satyrs" and Norman O'Neill's "Ouverture nnelle."

the afternoon Frederick Dawson gave a piano re- at St. James' Hall. He was at his best in Brahms' fine set of variations on an original theme, op. 21, No. 1. Of these he thoroughly caught the spirit, playing them with excellent taste and skill. He varied in Schumann's "Fantasiestücke," giving some of them remarkably well, such as "Fabel" and "Warum," while in others, notably in "Traumeswirren," he fell short in the matter of tone and clearness.

On Friday another English pianist, Miss Fanny Davies, gave a recital at the same hall. The program was entirely selected from the works of Brahms and was admirably chosen. Miss Davies was at her best in some of the lighter pieces, playing the B flat Intermezzo and three intermezzi, op. 117, particularly well.

The Monday Popular Concerts are now defunct, but Saturday concerts are beginning again at St. James' Hall. Since Mr. Chappell's retirement they have been taken over by William Saunders and the concerts promise to be as interesting as they have always been. At the first concert, which took place on Saturday, October 25, Mendelssohn's Quartet in E flat and Schumann's Quintet in the same key were played, the executants being Fräulein Wietrowitz and Messrs. Vladimir de Pachmann, Friederich, Gibson and Fuchs, and the vocalist, Miss Helen Henschel.

Next week the Carl Rosa Opera Company has a short season at the Coronet Theatre. Since it last appeared in London it has added "Siegfried" to its repertory, and that work will be played twice.

An interesting experiment is about to be made by Miss Adela Verne, the well-known pianist. In December she announces a concert of English music, and in order to give young and unknown composers a chance of being heard, she is advertising for manuscripts for consideration. The concert should be one of unusual interest.

MYRTA FRENCH.—Myrta French, the soprano who has toured with Sousa's Band, and filled engagements as prima donna of several operatic companies, will again enter the concert field this year. The singer has signed a contract with Remington Squire, and she will be under his sole management.

NEVADA'S PRESS AGENT.—Myles J. Murphy has been engaged by Messrs. Stevens & Sutherland for the advance and newspaper work of the Emma Nevada Company. In addition to being an educated musician, Mr. Murphy has been a prominent figure in journalism for some years.

HENRY XANDER.—Henry Xander, the director of the Washington Saengerbund, presented a pleasing program at the club rooms last Sunday. Two new Xander piano compositions will be published shortly, one a romance, and the other a graceful salon piece.

COPENHAGEN.

HALBERSGADE, NO. II., COPENHAGEN,
October 17, 1901.

COPENHAGEN, the Athens of the North, as we, not altogether without some pretension to right, fondly style it, will be, fifty or sixty years hence, the centre of art, literature and science. The principal town for music in the three Scandinavian countries, Sweden, Denmark and Norway, it is a kind of Berlin en miniature.

Owing to the unusually warm summer, the musical season can hardly be said to have begun yet, as the concert going public are still lingering at the bathing places and the delightful surroundings of the city, but till a few concerts have actually taken place, and as we have already quite a number of foreign artists who have announced their intention of giving one or more concerts or recitals here, among them the noted Scotch pianist, Frederic Lamond, who gives a series of not less than four Beethoven evenings, playing seventeen sonatas of the great Bonn master, and a number of others, the musical season promises to be both interesting and of unusual variety.

Of course, the city is really never without good music, owing to the fact that the celebrated Copenhagen "Tivoli," an institution with all kinds of amusement from the ridiculous to the sublime, has its daily concerts and devotes two evenings a week to symphony concerts, from May to October. They have a most excellent orchestra under the leadership of Joachim Anderson, who has gained his experience as a conductor in St. Petersburg and Berlin.

This autumn the great chorus of Finnish singers, mostly students from the University of Helsingfors, who appeared at the Tivoli concerts, met with an overwhelming success, not alone for their really beautiful and highly artistic reading of their own melancholy folksongs and their equally joyous student songs, but also to a very high degree, simply because they were from Finland, and since the Czar of Russia has abolished the free constitution of the old principality and made it a part of the great empire, these singers have received a welcome all over Scandinavia amounting to a perfect ovation, as a protest against the action of the mighty ruler of Russia. But also looking at it from a mere artistic standpoint, these singers deserve a great deal of praise, as they sing with an ensemble second to none, a clearness of expression seldom heard in a chorus, and above all, which is truly delightful to an artist, with a faultless intonation. But as they only sing "à capella" they do not aspire to a high standing from a severe musical standpoint, no more so than the glee and banjo clubs of the universities of the United States could be counted among the higher class of music, however well and, at times with real artistic finish, entertaining they sing their joyous songs.

The season of chamber music opened last Friday night with the inauguration of a new string quartet. The new organization consists of Georg Hoeberg, first violin; Louis Witsansky, second violin; Anton Block, viola, and Ernest Hoeberg, 'cello. The first number on the program was a quartet in E flat major, op. 14, by a Danish composer, Carl Nielsen. As far as the players are concerned, they did excellent work, and the composition, particularly the first part, is one of the modern type. The two following parts, Andante and Allegro Pastorale, gave more pleasure and distinct promise that this talented composer will some time succeed in giving to the world works of more clearness and ripe artistic value than this composition, op. 14. The playing of the very difficult work was highly appreciated by the large attendance, and the applause was as much for the four gentlemen as for the encouragement of the composer.

The second number on the program consisted of songs by Händel; Aria from "Rinaldo," Brahms; "Liebestrau,"

Owing to the numerous requests for Lessons,

Grieg, Sinding and P. Heise. They were sung by Mrs. Henriette Goos-Flagstad, who possesses a rather dark, mysterious mezzo soprano of unusual charm. As No. 3 on the program we heard the well-known Quartet in E minor, by the Bohemian composer Smetana. This piece of music is too well known to need any comment here, and I shall, therefore, restrict myself to the performance only. The quartet is called "Aus Meinem Leben," and is from beginning to end full of passion, fantasie, and at times even a very melancholy mood. To put such a piece of music on the program at a first evening of a new organization is undoubtedly a great mistake, as it takes the greatest artist to understand it, and therefore must be rehearsed and understood by each player in order to give a comprehensible idea of so intricate a work. This I cannot say was done. Everybody did his very best, but instead of hearing one single mass of sound, one could easily hear and distinguish four separate parts, which made a rather unfavorable impression.

The concert given by the chorus of the Royal Opera House took place September 22, with the assistance of the Marquis de Souza, who sang an aria from "Traviata" and the cavatine from "Faust," with great success.

AUGUST HYLLESTED.

NEVADA'S HOME.

MME. EMMA NEVADA is to sail on the St. Paul of the American Line, instead of a French liner, as was first arranged. This was the news received on Monday by Messrs. Stevens & Sutherland. Two of her company, Messrs. Pablo Casals and Moreau, are booked for the same steamer and will most probably come over with the prima donna.

The latter defers sailing until the last moment, for she is devoted to her home in the Avenue de Wagram—a section of Paris where every other house is the abode of an artist. A short distance from the house of Madame Nevada lives her old friend and teacher, Madame Marchesi, who pays almost daily visits to her favorite pupil, whom she affectionately styles the "Nightingale of Paradise." Close by are the homes of Sibyl Sanderson and Emma Calvé, Sarah Bernhardt, Sir Benjamin Constant, the painter, and a host of others who are equally celebrated can be found in artistic little villas nearby.

The home of Madame Nevada seems to be the rendezvous for not only these world famed people, but for most of the great singers and musicians who visit Paris. It is not rare of a summer evening to find Paderewski, Rosenthal, Hambourg or Moreau awakening the echoes of the avenue from Madame's house, or to hear the voice of the diva herself swelling out and caught up by the evening breeze.

Madame Nevada's tour, in the meantime, is being rapidly completed. There are but a few nights left open in the Eastern States, and Messrs. Stevens & Sutherland expect to close them before the opening of the tour, at the Colonial Theatre, Boston, on November 26.

THE HEINK RECITAL TOUR.—The representative of the New York Metropolitan Concert Bureau (Edward Kimpton, manager), Harlan A. King, under whose direction Heink's tour is being conducted, will be in Pennsylvania and Ohio during the next two weeks.

The programs represent a brilliant array and variety of the best and most enjoyable of musical selections, also containing some new works of special interest that will be welcome novelties in many of the Southern and Western cities which Herr Heink will visit. We find represented thereon the name of Schumann, Liszt, Ravina, Gounod, &c., songs by Sognai, Bohm, Dudley Buck, &c., compositions by Heink himself, also the difficult Ravina study for the left hand. Heink's versatility as singer, pianist and composer, covering an extraordinary extent of musical works, is said to be phenomenal.

GERARD-THIERS MUSICALE.—A musicale inaugurated the season at the Gerard-Thiers studios last Saturday evening. Miss Braun, a violinist, played several solos, and Merle Manning, tenor, from San Francisco, delighted all with his singing.

FANNY RICHTER FUCHS.

FANNY RICHTER FUCHS, who has been declared to be the most sympathetic woman pianist now before the public, has the honor of being re-engaged by the New York Liederkranz for their next concert.

She will play the C minor Concerto of Beethoven, and the society gives her the assistance of the members of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, who will play under the direction of Dr. Paul Klengel.

While studying abroad she was requested to play this same concerto with the grand orchestra of the Philharmonie, at Berlin, on the occasion of Beethoven's Jubilee on two days' notice only. She accepted at once and during the concert Manstaedt, the famous leader (Emperor Wilhelm's favorite), now at Wiesbaden, laid down his baton, and she led the whole orchestra and received seven tremendous recalls. All the papers, musical and otherwise, declared her a most intelligent musician.

Madame Fuchs will play before the A Capella Club, at Milwaukee, on November 18, and on the 21st she will give a concert of her own in the same city, and in December she will play at the German Hospital concert in New York city.

Of her playing Reginald de Koven, the composer, said: "At the concert on Tuesday last a young lady pianist, Miss Richter, made her appearance, who, if one mistakes not, will be heard of again in pianistic and artistic circles, as her merits as a pianist deserve public recognition. Miss Richter has been studying with Eugen d'Albert for the past four years, before with Liszt, Stavenhagen, Barth, Lessmann, and made a successful début in Boston in the spring of 1895 under the direction of Gustave Lange, when she played Beethoven's Concerto.

"Miss Richter possesses not only a really remarkable technic with a wonderfully sympathetic, firm and authoritative touch for a woman, but she has also real musical intelligence, and plays with a finish and refinement of feeling and expression which are wholly admirable and enjoyable. Her selections on Tuesday afternoon were confined to the modern romantic school, Liszt, Grieg and Paderewski. She played Grieg's "Carneval" and a polonaise of Paderewski's with really commanding virtuosity, but one would be glad of an opportunity to hear her in something more classical, where one feels sure that her artistic temperament would have even fuller scope. Miss Richter is certainly a credit to her master to whose technical correctness and solidity and breadth of style she can add her own sympathetic and really artistic temperament."

NORDICA HERE.

MME. LILLIAN NORDICA reached New York Sa urday on the American Line steamship St. Louis f her first transcontinental recital tour under the sole rection of Manager Loudon G. Charlton. Madame Nord is in superb health, having enjoyed a long summer's rest the Black Forest, and fresh from her triumphs in Muni where she sang the roles of Isolde in "Tristan und Isold and Elsa in "Lohengrin," in the Prince Regent Thea in September. Since then until she sailed, October Madame Nordica has been in Paris, where she augment her wardrobe with some gorgeous gowns, which she w wear on her forthcoming tour, and where she prepar with great care, her recital programs.

On her arrival in New York Madame Nordica found cable announcing that her conditions had been accept and the engagement closed for her to sing the Wagneri roles in the Covent Garden season next year, commen ing in May. This is another triumph for the great American singer, similar to that accorded her in t Munich engagement, where she made such a sensation success that she was immediately re-engaged for Se tember, 1902. Paris tried to get Nordica for "Trista and "Götterdämmerung" next summer, but the dates London (during the Coronation) and in Munich later w preclude the possibility of her singing in France.

Madame Nordica's tour, which commences Novem 14, will cover 80 or 100 recitals, and will extend Canada, Texas and Pacific Coast points. She will travel a private car, "Brunnhilda," and from all present indi tions her American season will be a long series of bi liant ovations.

All rumors and statements to the contrary notwithstan ing, Madame Nordica will not sing in opera once this s son, her recital tour having been so fully booked and such long duration that she will return to New York ju in time to sail for England to fill her Covent Garden dat

Amy Murray.

MISS AMY MURRAY has a number of dates New Jersey for the month of November. Nove ber 18 she will give a Scottish song lecture-recital at Su mit and the next evening she will open the lecture cou of the Town Improvement Association at Glen Rid The title of her Glen Ridge lecture is "Historic Songs Scotland." The program will be diversified by a Hig land piper and dances. This evening (November 6) M. Murray will give a lecture at the Alfred Corning Cla Neighborhood House in this city. November 11 M Murray will give a lecture recital in Public School N 133, Borough of Brooklyn.

Miss Murray's "Historic Songs" program includ many songs which are rarely heard—"The Bonnie E o' Moray," "Prince Charlie's Welcome to Skye," "H Johnnie Cope" and "The Bonnie House o' Airlie"—songs connected with chapters in Scottish history.

CONFEDERATES CHEER VON GRABILL.—S. Becker v Grábill, the pianist, closed the Confederate Reunion Petersburg, Va., October 25, with a piano recital. T most distinguished guests of the South being present. M. Von Grábill was enthusiastically cheered; the entire au ence arose to contribute a most glowing ovation.

Von Grábill also played at St. Mary's College, Rale N. C., and the National Park Seminary for Women, n Washington, D. C., during the week.

Harold Bauer.

HAROLD BAUER, the pianist, returned to Paris on October 31 from a very successful tour of Spain, and the day after left for Holland, there to give six recitals, his engagements elsewhere not permitting him to give more.

On November 14 he will play at the Hallé concerts to be given in Manchester, England, which Richter will conduct, subsequently appearing with Ysaye at the concert of the Nouvelle Société Philharmonique in Paris. Following the latter engagement Mr. Bauer will return to England for the purpose of playing at the concert of the Liverpool Philharmonic on December 3, under the direction of Cowen. Later, on December 6, he will give a recital in St. James' Hall.

GREGORY HAST A SUCCESS.

GREGORY HAST, "the tallest tenor in England," and one of the foremost concert singers in Britain, reached New York Sunday morning on the Umbria for his American tournée under the direction of Loudon G. Charlton. Mr. Hast had a delightful journey across the ocean after the first three days, which were very rough, and he frankly expressed enthusiastic interest in his first visit to this country.

He completed a concert tour of the English provinces only the day before he sailed, and he has other engagements abroad which will limit his American visit to November and December only. Unlike the majority of tenors, Mr. Hast is commanding in figure, appearance and bearing, and his European reputation, which has preceded him, gives promise that his voice and his art will command for him a like pre-eminence in this country. He left immediately for Milwaukee, where he filled his first engagement Monday night. He will be heard in oratorio, concert and recital in most of the large cities of the East and Middle West.

Mr. Hast's début in Milwaukee was an emphatic success. THE MUSICAL COURIER wired for news of the concert and received the following reply:

"Hast scored big success. Niebuhr, the prima donna of the evening, made a good impression. These two the favorites."

Minnie Tracey in Stockholm.

"MISS MINNIE TRACEY, a young American singer, appeared on Tuesday at the Musical Academy before a well filled auditorium. Applause was not restrained as the concert progressed, and its warmth induced the lady to give an extra number.

"After the first number it was clear that we had a great soprano with remarkable dramatic power."—Stockholm Journal Dagen, October 15, 1900.

"Miss Tracey's voice is that of a genuine soprano, with warmth of tone and clearness. Her piano is especially effective."—Nza Dagliel Allehandes, Stockholm, October 16, 1901.

"The American singer has a strong voice of great compass (soprano) and a well developed technic; the mezza voce is her specialty. The applause of the public was warm, and the singer's success indisputable."—Stockholm Afton Bladet, October 16, 1901.

"Miss Minnie Tracey gave yesterday evening a concert at the Musical Academy. Her voice is a strong, full and extensive soprano, with a metallic tone of great power in the forte. Her piano, pianissimo and mezzo voce are remarkably full. Born in America Miss Tracey completed her studies in France. She gave what was a novelty to most of the audience, Wagner's youthful piece, 'L'Attente.' written by him in Paris."—Stockholm Svenska Dagblatt, October 16, 1901.

"The concert last evening introduced us to an American singer, Minnie Tracey. She sang numbers from Brahms, Schubert, Schumann and others, the opening number being from Gluck's 'Alceste.' Her voice is strong, remarkable in the lower and middle register."—Stockholm Tidengen, October 16, 1901.

In all departments this company is strong and success is following it. The advanced booking has been faithfully done. Americans want to hear opera in the vernacular when it is sung by such artists as Miss Shay and her associates.

HARLEM PHILHARMONIC MUSICALES.—The first musicale of the Harlem Philharmonic Society will be given at the Astor Gallery, Thursday morning, November 1 The artists engaged as soloists for the occasion are Ev Williams, tenor; Gwilym Miles, baritone, and Mrs. Mc ris Black, contralto. December 12 is the date of the ne musicale. The dates of the musicales after the New Ye are January 16, February 6 and April 3.

GERMAN HEADQUARTERS OF THE MUSICAL COURIER,
BERLIN, W., LINKSTRASSE 17.

October 22, 1901.

WITH much éclat the first of the annual ten Nikisch concerts burst upon the season. Unfortunately, however, the éclat was lent by the vast audiences, consisting of representatives from n's best social circles.

hen Nikisch first began his fortnightly trips from ic, in order to conduct these Philharmonic concerts famous by Hans von Bülow, everybody felt that the conductor had undertaken a vast, a serious responsi- . We hucksters of phrases all vied with one another oin such euphonious epithets as "Molder of Berlin's cal taste," "Heir to a great art heritage," "The new w," &c. We all agreed that Nikisch had a "mission." d so he had. The Philharmonic concerts were become erious, too pedantic. Real music lovers went there not ntertainment, but in order to learn.

kisch, the magnetic, soon changed all that. The music ne less, the man more. The prices for admission rose. real music lovers, who never can afford to pay much, shut out and society came in.

writer in your columns said last week: "What have nd fashion in common?" Very true.

kisch is still a man with a "mission," but the nature s "mission" has changed. The Nikisch concerts are vate enterprise, and they are a paying enterprise. So have art and fashion in common. Society started the ch cult, and society must keep it up. If society de- Nikisch, then someone will lose money. Therefore ty must be pleased. It is all as plain as day, and any- who doubts need only study the scheme of the Phil- onic programs as they will be presented this winter.

e first concert opened with Mendelssohn's overture, resstille und glückliche Fahrt." It received a very nctory reading, and was rewarded with exceedingly applause.

en followed "Barbarossa," a symphonic suite, in three , for orchestra. The composer delights in the feudal of Siegmund von Hausegger. "Barbarossa" re- d its very first production in Munich, at the Kaim rts, on March 21, 1900; and its first Berlin produc- at the Wagner Society concert, in the Philharmonie, mber 3, 1900. The latter performance was fully re- d at the time by our conscientious O. F. He gave also a review and analysis upon which it were im- ble to improve.

course, you all know the "Barbarossa" legend. If don't trouble to acquire it. The story is about irich II., of the Hohenstaufen family, and a misty stor of our present Kaiser Wilhelm. Friedrich and court were sleeping one of those endless Rip Van cle sleeps on the Kyffhäuser Mountain. For why, ry saith not, nor does tradition. Friedrich sat at a table, and there sat he so long, chin in his hands, his beard grew through the table and into the earth. he meantime the Popes Innocent IV. and Gregory were playing ducks and drakes with the rights of lrich's people. Suddenly, for some unexplained n, the sleeping monarch and his court awoke, seized swords and waged terrible and successful war upon apal oppressors. And thus, say the German school ries, "was laid the foundation for that glorious Ger- empire which to-day," &c. A point that has always ed me was the disposition of Friedrich Barbarossa's d. How did he get away from that table? Was the d clipped? I expected this matter to be cleared up on Hausegger's music, but he labeled his three parts ly "Need of the People," "The Enchanted Moun- and "The Awakening." Of these I can truthfully that when Barbarossa finally awoke, after much loud music for forty-five minutes, most of us were very nearly asleep. Apropos, if you do not believe the Barbarossa legend, you can easily convince yourself of its absolute truth by going to the Kyffhäuser Mountain, in Westphalia, where the stone table and a few strands of beard will be shown you by a most obliging castellan. You must not be disturbed by the fact that the strands are gray, while Geibel's "Barbarossa" poem speaks of a "long, golden beard."

At the Nikisch concert the suite was very coolly received. I could detect a few hisses mingled with the scanty applause. That was unfair, for as O. F. has already said, Von Hausegger is talented, and promises well for the future.

Madame Carreño played Rubinstein's faded D minor Piano Concerto, of which only the first movement has any musical value. The so-called "lioness of the piano" was meek as a lamb last Monday. This is evidently the somnolent season for lions. Madame Carreño's technical facility is much impaired, and her vaunted strength seemed puny, handicapped as it was by the large hall of the Philharmonie and the overloud orchestra. Only a Rosenthal and a d'Albert ever held their own at these concerts. In the slow movement Madame Carreño's tone was cold and hollow. In the finale, she was lamentably lacking.

Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, in a reading full of Nikisch mannerisms, ended a rather joyless evening.

Ernest Schelling is a technician, first, foremost, and all the time. At his piano recital in Beethoven Hall this was even more apparent than at his orchestral concert the week before. An orchestra is a cloak which covers a multitude of musical sins. Without this noisy partner, Mr. Schelling's playing is denuded of all poetry. He seems unable to lose himself in any composition. He cannot go below the surface. He has admirable technic, refreshing strength, and unshakable confidence. These be not the sole qualities that make a great pianist, however. Neither in Schumann's majestic C major Fantaisie, nor in Beethoven's Sonata, op. 57 (Appassionata), did the pianist reveal the necessary dramatic qualities. It was always the player we heard, never the composition. This is excusable only when the performer can boast of a distinct individuality, which Schelling cannot. In a group of Chopin numbers he displayed his faultless technical mastery. Liszt's Sixth Rhapsodie furnished the bait with which the pianist secured two encores, Chopin's C sharp minor Valse, much distorted in rhythm, and the same composer's "Aeolian Etude" played on an automatic harp.

We have here an orchestra of about sixty musicians, known as the "Tonkünstler Orchestra," which has for several years been in the habit of giving very popular concerts in the extreme eastern part of the town, and in summer at the open air pavilion of the Zoological Garden.

There are persons in Berlin who do not believe that the sun rises and sets in Nikisch and Weingartner as orchestral conductors. These persons have an idol of their own, and his name is Richard Strauss.

For him the "Tonkünstler Orchestra" was reorganized, the membership was enlarged to 100, and one fine day we read announcements of six symphony concerts, to be directed by Richard Strauss at the New Opera House, formerly Kroll's Theatre.

Later Strauss published his purpose. A reactionary always, a man of flesh and blood, a modern of the moderns, a fighter, in plain terms if you will, it is his avowed intention to free the public from the fetters of convention and habit. Other leaders might serve up their perennial Beethoven and Mozart, and Wagner, and Haydn, and Schubert, and Mendelssohn, if they liked, but he, Richard Strauss, would have none of them, thank you. He would give us works we rarely or never get, and these works should be by great composers to whom our neglectful generation is not according proper recognition. A sturdy resolve, a noble program, a self-imposed "mission."

For his first concert Strauss selected Liszt's first symphonic poem, "Ce qu'on entend sur la montagne" ("What one hears on the mountain"); Bruckner's D minor Symphony, No. 3, dedicated to Richard Wagner, and Sgambati's Second Piano Concerto, op. 15, with Emil Sauer as the soloist. And on Monday, October 21, this great genius, Richard Strauss, played for us the first of his six concerts, played with what is technically termed a "scratch" orchestra, and achieved for himself, his program and his men a unanimous, frenzied triumph, such as staid, stolid Berlin has rarely known in all the many years of its musical history.

Whether the new venture succeeds or fails, whether the Weingartner and Nikisch subscribers become converts or remain sceptics, all musical Berlin must acknowledge the tremendous personal triumph of Richard Strauss. He performed an undeniable miracle, for with less than a month's rehearsing he molded this raw orchestral material into shape, and made of these odds and ends of musicians a body of players that can compare favorably with the very best symphony organizations. You smile at my enthusiasm, perhaps? I wish you had been at the concert. And to think that all this was done, not with classical symphonies that are a part of every German musician's musical alphabet, but with relatively "new" works, works of supremest difficulty, almost absolutely unknown to players and public.

Liszt built his piece on the Victor Hugo poem of the same name. The "mountain" is in Brittany, hard by the sea. The poet stands high above the earth and its troubles and turmoils. He hears two voices. On the one side the voice of the sea, of Nature; on the other, the strenuous hum of human existence and endeavor. Men live, and love, and fight and die. The sea echoes their screams. There is a storm. The two voices mingle. Then a lull. Again the sea, alone. The poem is over, the story told. Only a Hugo could hear such things on a Brittany mountain, and only a Liszt, with his phantasy, his command of orchestral resources, and his intellectual superiority, could fittingly interpret in music such a beautiful, philosophical poem. Not as "popular" in character as the "Préludes," this first symphonic poem of Liszt needs only to be heard more often in order to win a permanent place on the programs of our symphony societies.

The Bruckner work is an inspiration. It needs columns of description by itself, and I shall devote to it next week a special article for our leading American conductors. Here is a "novelty," gentlemen, as interesting as Tschaikowsky's "Pathétique" symphony, and that is saying much. I call it an inspiration, because Bruckner was so blessed with matter that he didn't have much time to think about form. All is spontaneous music making for the pure love of the task, the expression of an irresistible need. And Strauss as the interpreter of such a work!

Sauer played Sgambati's uninteresting Concerto with bravura and finish. Other qualities the music gave him no chance to display.

Without any doubt, Leopold Godowsky is one of the most significant pianists of our time, and possibly of all times. It is not that he excels in any one direction, that he is a specialist in technic, in sentimentalism, in classicism, or in eccentricity; his is well balanced art, healthy, complete and eclectic, dignified in conception and faultless in execution.

Godowsky impresses the intelligent listener, before all things, with the absolute seriousness and legitimacy of his endeavor. He has a purpose in music, and this purpose is never sacrificed. The true key to this purpose is the man's supreme musicianship.

Technic? Shades of Liszt, yes! But with Godowsky it seems a sine qua non. With furious fleetness, and fleetness unerring, he races over the keyboard, in scales of single notes, thirds and sixths. Brahms, the massive; Chopin, the agile; Poldini, the tricky; Tausig, the bold—he conquers them all with the most consummate ease. For him the book of technical difficulties contains no sealed pages.

With academic correctness, and yet with independent artistic spirit, Godowsky played Beethoven's "Les Adieux" Sonata. How is such a parodox possible? you ask. Hear Godowsky play. He is a dealer in musical paradoxes.

To my mind the pianist's best performance was Brahms' F minor Sonata. He completely understood and exposed all its poetical possibilities. The big grasp, the soaring grandeur of the first movement; the dreamy, dusky color of the andante espressivo, with its muffled gust of passion at the close; and the sardonic humor of the cyclopean scherzo, were all musical moments that I shall treasure among my most valued musical recollections.

In a group of Chopin numbers, four preludes and four etudes, Godowsky achieved his greatest outward success. Here his intentions were more readily appreciated and understood by the majority of his hearers. The Preludes in B flat minor and in D minor were played with what seemed almost demoniacal virtuosity. In these two pieces Chopin evidently could have used a few more octaves of tones on both ends of the piano. Godowsky quite made this felt.

The Studies, G sharp minor (in thirds) and D flat major (in sixths), belonged to the realm of transcendental piano playing.

Four Concert Studies, op. 19, by Poldini, a wealthy Viennese amateur, are among the most original productions of recent literature for the piano. They are full of bright, sometimes whimsical ideas, melodious, well worked and exasperatingly difficult. Godowsky shook them all out of his sleeve, as it were, and even indulged in such a dangerous luxury as a staccato passage on black keys for the thumb of the right hand. More about this particular digit of Godowsky's on another occasion.

I wish I had space to tell you of the beautiful things in some Gluck transcriptions, and in the F sharp Impromptu and C sharp minor Scherzo of Chopin. Godowsky might well have spared us the concluding number, however, Tausig's ugly "Hungarian Airs." The program would have been too long even without them. Too much is never as good as too little.

One German critic said: "In the Brahms Finale there was apparent quite a lack of intellectual grasp." There was, Mr. Critic, but on whose part?

Among the admiring pianists in the audience I noticed Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Hugo Mansfeldt, Josef Hofmann, Gottfried Galston, Professor Jedliczka, Ernest Schelling, Ferruccio Busoni, Emma Koch, Anton Foerster, Albert Friedenthal, Felix Dreyshock and Prof. Franz Kullak.

At his second concert in Beethoven Hall, Henri Marteau played two new violin concertos, one by Tor Aulin, a well-known Swedish violinist, and the other by Christian Sinding, that gifted son of Norway. [See "Violin Echoes" in last week's MUSICAL COURIER.—ED.]

Hugo Kaun, of Milwaukee, Wis., is a composer of skill and ambition. He has studied much and studied well. He handles his pen with the air of a man who knows what he wishes to say and who understands how to say it. So far, so good.

But what does Mr. Kaun wish to say? I must confess that in his songs I could not follow his flights at all. It seemed as though he had laboriously tried to be original, and I must acknowledge his complete success. The thoughts are artificial, the melodies barren of charm and the harmonies annoyingly unconventional. The voice is given little opportunity, and only at rare moments did Miss Polly Victoria Blumenbach, the singer, seem to be able to get into touch with her audience. I hardly think that her interpretation was at fault.

In his numbers for orchestra, directed by himself, Overture, "The Painter of Antwerp," and two symphonic episodes based on Longfellow's "Hiawatha" poem, Mr. Kaun is much more at home than in the realm of song. He has an intimate knowledge of orchestral technic and color, and many characteristic touches, descriptive of moments in the poem, gave eloquent testimony to his aptitude for applying this knowledge. He knows his Wagner well, but nowadays that is hardly a reproach. Mr. Kaun announces a further series of tone-pictures, to complete Longfellow's beautiful Indian legend. When finished, this symphonic suite should easily become a standard work in the repertory of our good orchestras. A brilliantly orchestrated version of "The Star-Spangled Banner" brought the concert to a resounding close, and made the many Americans present swell out their chests and look aggressively patriotic. Mr. Kaun's works were received with every mark of favor, and he was made the recipient of an enthusiastic demonstration after the close of the concert.

Later in the week Arthur van Ewyk, an American baritone, sang some of Mr. Kaun's songs at a recital in Bechstein Hall. These pieces, "Das Mondlicht," "Königin der Nacht," "Wetterleuchten," "Der Sieger" and "Schneidermär," made me think better of Mr. Kaun as a song writer. They are natural in expression, and give the performer some chance for vocal display. The audience liked the numbers immensely, and rewarded both Van Ewyk and the composer, who accompanied delightfully, with enthusiastic applause and recalls.

Herr Weingartner, a man above criticism, does not honor the press with tickets for his concerts at the Royal Opera House. I won't offend him by discussing the work of himself or his orchestra.

Frederic Lamond is not a great piano virtuoso; that is why he gives recitals devoted exclusively to Beethoven compositions. His is a quiet, studious nature, that would far from the field where such men as Paderewski, Rosenthal, Godowsky and d'Albert are engaged in fierce Titanistic combat. I would hardly insinuate that Lamond is not able to enter such a fray—with what chance, is a matter by itself—but suffice it to say, he does not. He is a pianist for the student and the musician, and of the worthy class the greater part of his audience was composed at Beethoven Hall last Tuesday. Five sonatas is heavy musical fare. I tasted of two and one-half, and felt satisfied. What I heard was well done. Lamond is a first-rate musician, whose chief intention is to be faithful to the aim of the composer. In this he succeeds admirably. The form and the melodic and harmonic lines of the works were presented with rare truth and clarity. In Berlin Mr. Lamond will find quite a large public for his form of musical entertainment.

Emile R. Blanchet, a pupil of Busoni, played Saint-Saëns' G minor Concerto, Bach's D minor Concerto (arranged by Busoni) and Liszt's E flat Concerto. In all three performances Blanchet left nothing out and put nothing in. I suppose he must be given credit for a good memory and for some degree of technical facility. But for the rest of me, I could find nothing else in his playing. It was colorless, pallid, devoid of blood and pulse, bare of beauty, an empty shell.

Prior to her departure for America, Lilli Lehmann, assisted, gave a song recital at the Philharmonic. The prices were popular—with Lehmann. They probably enabled her to pay her passage to New York, with enough left over to buy several new varieties of leek and cabbage for the kitchen garden in the Grunewald. Lehmann's voice is gone entirely. The raucous remnants gave more pain than pleasure. Not even her warmest admirers could get up any genuine enthusiasm. Of course her recitation was excellent, although those of us who know her tricks of delivery are thoroughly aware of the woman's musical insincerity. She indulges in an incessant piano in order to avoid fatiguing climaxes and sustained fortes. It is well to do. Anything is more bearable than her forte. Bach was sung distressing scandal shocked Vienna musical circles week. Gaston Lhérin, twenty years old, the most talented pupil of Leschetizky, was found by his teacher in Ischl, Tyrol, under circumstances that were irrefutable. Leschetizky reproached the young man bitterly and rushed from the house. Some hours later Lhérin shot himself. The aged maestro has instituted divorce proceedings against his wife. Lhérin had been a protégé of Saint-Saëns, in Paris.

Godowsky has transferred the date of his fourth piano recital to Gabrilowitsch, who will thus be able to give a Berlin concert this winter. Such fraternizing among artists is as delightful as it is rare. Mr. and Mrs. Godowsky, by the way, are succeeding in establishing the most interesting musical salon that Berlin has known for many a day. At their informal Sunday afternoon receptions in the tasteful Luitpold Strasse home one can nearly always find Josef Hofmann, Hugo Kaun, Gabrilowitsch, Busoni, Dr. Pohl and many other musical celebrities. Among the artists who never pass through Berlin without a visit to the Godowsky salon are Moriz Rosenthal, Arthur Friedheim, De Pachmann, Marteau, Sinding and Petschnikoff.

There are many persons who would rather hear Heinrich Gruenfeld, the Berlin violoncellist, tell a story than play a violoncello solo. I am among the number. Recently Gruenfeld was asked "What do you think of critics?" "Critics," he replied, "might be divided into two general classes, the good and the bad. The good ones are those who write well about me; the bad ones are those who do not." There is candor for you.

Paderewski is to begin his German tour in Dresden on October 25. There are not wanting discerning persons who insist that the Polish pianist will play in Berlin this winter. Paderewski's manager says that he knows nothing of such a plan.

Colonne and his Parisian orchestra have been invited to give their orchestral concert, November 2, at the Royal Opera House. This distinction, together with the recent decoration of Saint-Saëns, another Frenchman, clearly shows which way the wind is blowing in the old Schloss on the Spree. Emperor Wilhelm is a shrewd statesman, to make music serve politieal purposes.

Waldemar Sachs, one of Berlin's best accompanists, has left town rather hurriedly, in order, it is said, to escape the pressing attentions of his creditors. Sachs is now settled in Zurich, Switzerland, where he should find a large musical field.

Miss Geraldine Farrar, whose successful début here as Marguerite ("Faust") I chronicled last week, has been engaged for three years by the Berlin Royal Opera. The contract is to go into effect on January 1, 1902.

"Feuersnoth," the new opera by Richard Strauss, will be produced at Dresden early in November. I defy anyone to translate into sensible English the word "Feuersnoth."

Fräulein Plaichinger sang Elizabeth ("Tannhäuser") at the Berlin Royal Opera several days ago. It was a creditable performance, but by no means a great one. The management should have courage enough to invite Madame Nordica for several Wagner roles.

Stavenhagen's appointment as director of the Munich Conservatory seems to have brought new life into the moth-eaten old institution. There have been many changes in the personnel of teachers. Frau Professor Schröder-Hanfstaengel will conduct the vocal department, and Prof. Martin Krause has been added to the piano staff. The composer Beer (!) Wallbrunn will teach harmony and counterpoint. (The fact that Herr Wallbrunn is named Beer, and lives in Munich, should suggest an interesting psychological study for James Huneker.) The board of directors are also negotiating with a violinist of international reputation.

Messrs. Felix Weingartner (piano), Rettich (violin) and Warnke ('cello) have formed a trio which has re-

Wilhelm Klatte, the musical critic of the Berlin Lokal Anzeiger, announces a series of lectures on "The History of Music." To find out what Herr Klatte does not know about music, one need only read his column of criticism each morning. Thus, by an inverse process we gain knowledge and save the price of the lectures.

Conrad Ansorge, who formerly lived in New York, will give piano recitals here during February and March. He is to play also in Frankfurt, Leipsic, Munich, Stuttgart, Hannover, Dresden and Hamburg.

At the first of this season's Bohemian String Quartet concerts Risler, the pianist, will assist.

On October 7 there was opened a new municipal conservatory in Dortmund. Already over 100 pupils have registered. That is America's crying musical need—in every city a conservatory under municipal control. Then would our wandering students remain at home.

Alexander Friedemann, of Odessa, recently played a Vieuxtemps Concerto with the Leipsic Gewandhaus Orchestra, and was hailed as a great technician.

The famous Kaim concerts in Munich are to have the following artists this season: Mesdames Behr, Destinn, Münchhoff, Pregi and Wedekind, and Messrs. Burmester, Messaert, Petschnikoff, Ysaye, Reisenauer and Stavenhagen. Another series of orchestral concerts, under Professor Zumpe's direction, has been arranged by the Munich Musical Academy. Their artists will be: Mesdames Langenhan-Hirtzel and Huhn, and Messrs. Hugo Becker, Hermann Gura, Marteau, Sapellnikoff and Von Possart (recitation).

Burmester, the renowned violinist, has begun his annual winter tour. This season's engagements will include appearances in Berlin, Dresden, Munich, Vienna, Budapest, Warsaw, Lisbon, Paris and numerous smaller cities.

Smareglia has completed his opera, "Oceana." It will shortly be produced in Vienna and Carlsruhe.

Two works by Pirani, a Berlin music critic, are to be given in Prague this winter. The one is an opera, "Hexenlied" ("Witch's Song") and the other a ballet, "Künstlertraum" ("Artist's Dream").

Richard Strauss has been elected as president of the German Association of Musicians. This body is out with the rather premature announcement that its next festival meeting will be held in Crefeld, June 7 to 10, 1902. There are to be six concerts.

At his four Beethoven recitals here Frederic Lamond will play some pieces rarerly heard in public. Among these will be thirty-three Variations on a Theme by Diabelli; Rondo e Capriccio, op. 129; thirty-two Variations in C minor; six Variations, D major, op. 76; fifteen Variations and Fugue, op. 35, and Rondo, G major, op. 51.

Mme. Schumann-Heink has been engaged for the Parisian production, next spring, of Wagner's "Götterdämmerung."

The New York World, singing the praises of a Western girl violinist, says: " * * * The girl's power lies in the fact that as soon as the notes of her violin steal through the house, a strange lethargy seizes the audience, and they drop into a waking slumber." It is no doubt very wonderful to put an audience into waking slumber, but I know several Berlin violinists who put their audiences into real slumber.

Heniot Lévy, a talented German-American composer, has just gained a prize in competition at Warsaw. The successful work is a sonata for piano and violin. At present Mr. Levy is teaching in Halifax, N. S.

A petition is being prepared, praying the Reichstag to prolong the copyright of Wagner's works, and to guarantee the Bayreuth monopoly of "Parsifal." Many prominent Berlin musicians have refused to sign the paper.

Lortzing's 100th birthday is being celebrated all over Germany by cycle performances of his operas. They are great celebrators here in Germany. I suppose that after the present revival Lortzing's works will be pickled and shelved until the 200th anniversary. The Royal Opera and the Theater des Westens will give us this week: "The Two Archers," "Czar and Carpenter," "The Poacher," "The Armorer" and "Undine."

"Louise" is to be the next operatic novelty. Following its performance here, Charpentier's work will immediately be produced in Wiesbaden, Hamburg, Cologne, Leipsic, Bremen, Magdeburg, Elberfeld and Nuremberg.

Sam Lamberson, of Coshocton, Ohio, formerly a pupil of Barth, has joined the piano class of Madam Stepanoff. Mr. Lamberson found Professor Barth too gentle—also too modern.

Miss Martha Hofacker, of New York, about whose vocal achievements O. F. has often written in his "Berlin Budget," recently achieved exceptional success at the Strassbourg Opera, where she sang the role of Christine in Brüll's "Golden Cross." The Post speaks of Miss Hofacker's winsome presence, her sweet soprano voice, and her spirited acting. She is called a "valuable acquisition to Strassbourg's stage." The Neueste Nachrichten also is enthusiastic about Miss Hofacker's pleasing personality, her unusually intelligent acting, her vivacity, her splendid voice, and her fine musicianship. Both papers tell of an ovation after the opera, of flowers galore, curtain calls and demonstrative applause.

Anton Hekking, the famous solo violoncellist of the Philharmonic Orchestra, contemplates a series of "Popular" Quartet evenings. Admission is to be 1 mark; tables will be provided, and thirsty souls can have beer with their Beethoven, or vodhka with their Tschaikowsky.

The other night, at a dinner, Josef Hofmann was asked by an American girl: "Do you consider the people of Baltimore musical?" "I don't know," he answered; "none of them were at my recital there." "Oh! Mr. Hofmann," objected his questioner, "that is very unfair. You know you had great success in Baltimore." "Indeed?" asked the imperturbable pianist, "that must have been when I was in New York. I am like Wieniawski, the great violinist. you know. When he played in Paris he had great success in Warsaw, and when he played in Warsaw he had great success in Paris."

There were only thirty-seven concerts in Berlin's large halls last week, as against thirty-nine the week before. This won't do. The musical season is simply going to the dogs.

Alma Stencel, of San Francisco, and Minnie Methot, of New York, are two Americans who will be heard next week. Miss Stencel will play, at Beethoven Hall, piano concertos by Sauer and Liszt (E flat), and Miss Methot will sing at the Philharmonie an aria by Mozart, and Liszt's "Lorelei." HARMONICA.

A Big Soprano Position Filled.

THE Townsend H. Fellows Choir Exchange has added another to the long list of singers who have been placed in prominent churches through his Church Choir Exchange. The following letter just received at his offices in Carnegie Hall speaks for itself:

DEAR MR. FELLOWS—I write to let you know that I have been appointed soprano soloist in Dr. Paxton's old church, the West Presbyterian, of which Peter Schnecker is organist and director. The arrangements are most satisfactory to me, and I wish to thank you most heartily for the assistance I have received through your exchange.

The other members of the quartet are Mrs. Carl Alves, contralto; W. H. Reiger, tenor, and Ericsson Bushnell, basso.

Very sincerely yours, MRS. PENNINGTON HAUGHEY.

NEW YORK, November 5.

GREGORY HAST'S DEBUT IN AMERICA

MILWAUKEE, November 5, 1901.

GREGORY HAST, the English tenor, made his American début here last evening at the first concert of the Ball de Concerts given under fashionable auspices. The English artist covered himself with glory, although it was impossible for him to rehearse with the other singers who appeared with him. The ship from Europe was overdue, and this delayed the singer in reaching Milwaukee. Mr. Hast, however, scored a complete victory with his limited numbers. It is many a day since we have heard so artistic a tenor, and his success was instantaneous. We shall want him here again at the very first opportunity.

Miss Niebuhr is on the second round of the ladder of reputation only because the societies as yet have not heard her widely. Possessing a voice of great beauty, well trained under Bouhy, Miss Niebuhr instantly made a place for herself in that hard field, a Milwaukee audience, always though critical, recognize the efforts of an untiring student.

The local critics praised Mr. Hast without stint. His range and quality his voice is remarkable, his method irreproachable, and altogether his singing reveals the intelligence which wins admirers at each appearance. Those who heard Mr. Hast here predict for him great success in this country. There are, after all, not many tenors singing in concert, and when they reach a high plane of artistic excellence, as in the case of Mr. Hast, vocal art has the respect which it deserves.

Paragraphs from the Milwaukee criticisms, referring to Mr. Hast, follow:

There were some delightful features, chief among these being the singing of Gregory Hast, an English tenor new to us here. The artist Mr. Hast deserves every good thing that has been said of him—his voice and his art are equally remarkable. The range of voice, its wonderful sweetness and the splendid style with which he sings were given adequate opportunity in "Where Is Another Sweet as My Sweet?" "Phyllis Has Such Charming Graces," "Edward Gray" and the delightful bit of old French song; . . . ballads that will live long in our memory as interpreted by a wonderful singer. His clean pronunciation of such lines as "Sweet she was and I thought her cold" and "Phyllis has such charming graces" was little short of remarkable; and his perfect singing of the "mezza voce"—where every tone was like the vibration of a far distant bell—was a delight that we rarely have an opportunity to experience. He was repeatedly recalled.—Milwaukee Evening Wisconsin, November 5, 1901.

Gregory Hast, the English tenor, scored a distinct triumph in this his first appearance in America. Milwaukee is fortunate in getting hold of this artist during his short stay in this country. His singing is artistic in the highest degree, and he has a voice of great resonance and sweetness. His "mezza voce" is of exceptional beauty. His interpretation of Maude Valerie White's song "Sweet Mary," was wonderful, and the artist's touch was not more prominent in the rendering of "Ma Vie," one of the daintiest little French song we have listened to for a long while. In all of his songs we were charmed and delighted in great degree.—Milwaukee Free Press, November 5, 1901.

Gregory Hast is a finished artist in every respect. He secured the audience from the moment he opened his mouth. He has a tenor voice equal to all demands, and he uses it with a finish and refinement that are simply captivating. In the softest tones the words are distinctly understood, and the use of his sotto voce is very remarkable. The Brahms song, "Mainacht," was sung with intensity of feeling and grandeur that aroused the audience to real enthusiasm; and, too, the old English song, "Phyllis Has Such Charming Graces," was a gem of pure and beautiful shading and tone production seldom heard; in short, every number was enthusiastically received, and after three recalls he responded with another song. He is one of the great tenors of the world.—Milwaukee Journal, November 5, 1901.

The most interesting and artistic singer of the evening was Gregory Hast, an English tenor of fine appearance physically, possessed of a beautiful lyric voice, superbly trained. His control of the mezza voce is remarkable, and diminuendos and crescendos were given with phenomenal smoothness and ease. There were refinement, feeling and tenderness in his efforts, and it is not too much to say that Mr. Hast is, by all odds, the greatest tenor who has been heard here in many years.—Milwaukee Sentinel, November 5.

MUSIC IN BROOKLYN.

HAT prosperity at once the wonder and envy of European nations was illustrated by the 2,000 Americans who attended the Boston Symphony concert in Brooklyn last Friday night. Since those who have the power to ate in social and musical matters across the bridge have ed the question of clothes as a factor in the present ical season, it seems necessary to dwell briefly upon the important subject, particularly since the musical pro- m proved so unsatisfactory. Interest in the visits of the ton Symphony Orchestra to Brooklyn waned until last son, when the listlessness threatened to cut off the night certs, as the matinees were cut off two years ago. Dur- the summer a man who is clever, though he may not it, suggested that the assistance and co-operation of ain prominent women be enlisted in the cause of bring- the Boston Orchestra to Brooklyn once a month. The nen responded nobly, and, woman-like, they introduced fashionable note—the note that makes the "wheels go nd"—even if superior minds seem indifferent to the dates of the modistes from Paris and Vienna. Last k the writer paid a tribute to the good taste in dress played by the women of Brooklyn. The social success the concert Friday night has startled Brooklyn, and se who did not go to the concert missed seeing one of the t brilliant audiences ever assembled in the old Academy Music. The entire orchestra and balcony were arrayed vening dress, and with it all there was no vulgar glit- or extravagance. Besides paying attention to their own arel, the ladies decorated the lobby and foyer, and in- y way emphasized the night as a festive occasion.

he Wagner program presented is the one the orchestra given on the tour. On another page of this issue of e Musical Courier there is a report of the perform- e at Carnegie Hall on Thursday night. We have heard German or original version of "Tannhäuser" and we were favored with the Paris version, and now r all these weary years we are obliged to listen to the ton version, as Mr. Finck has aptly put it. If Mr. icke were conducting Mendelssohn he could not have ded his baton with a gentler or more soothing hand he did during the "Bacchanale." All the solemnity grandeur were crushed out of the "Funeral March" n "Die Götterdämmerung" and not even the superb ing of the orchestra could atone for the lack of pas- and climaxes. The singers, Miss Milka Ternina and son van Hoose, who sing with the orchestra on the this month, appeared at the Brooklyn concert. In ra Miss Ternina is an artist who sways her audience ugh her intelligence and dramatic gifts, but unlike te of her associates in opera she does not or cannot herself justice in concert. The Venus music is not a voice of her timbre at all. Last Friday night her notes were unpleasantly shrill and there was neither suousness nor beauty in her singing of the "Tann- ser" music. She was more in her element in "Die terdämmerung" excerpts.

r. Van Hoose has discovered the secret of using his e beautifully. Resonant, pure and delightfully true is tenor, and he astonished his admirers by singing with ion in the "Tannhäuser" duet. His singing of the ize Song," from "Die Meistersinger," was one of the delights of the concert. Again, he showed that he has ied faithfully, when he returned and sang with Ter- in "Die Götterdämmerung."

Dr. Henry G. Hanchett gave the closing lecture in the series on "Musical Contrasts," in the Assembly Hall of Adelphi College last Thursday night. He was listened to by a large audience. The Maxwell House Orchestra, Miss Susan S. Boice, soprano; Miss Susan L. Eastman, contralto; E. Ellsworth Giles, tenor, and Albert E. Andrews, basso, assisted in the illustrations. The program was rather long, but Dr. Hanchett abbreviated several numbers. The sub-topic of the lecture was "The Lyric and the Symphonic." The illustrations played and sung were:

Overture to Stradella.....Flotow
First movement of Symphony in C, op. 21.....Beethoven
The Maxwell Orchestra.
Qual Mare, Qual Terra.....Verdi
Miss Boice and Mr. Giles.
Adagio grazioso, from Sonata, op. 31, No. 1.....Beethoven
Fantaisie Piece, op. 3, No. 1.....Dayas
Theme, Variations 1, 2 and 11, and Finale, from op. 13.....Schumann
Dr. Hanchett.
A Song of Thanksgiving.....Allitsen
Mr. Giles.
Intermezzo, from Cavalleria.....Mascagni
Serenade.....Moszkowski
The Maxwell Orchestra.
O Hush Thee, My Baby.....Sullivan
Where Are You Going, My Pretty Maid?.....Caldicott
Miss Boice, Miss Eastman, Mr. Giles and Mr. Andrews.
Coronation March (from Folkunger).....Kretschmar
The Maxwell Orchestra.

There is to-day no higher work in music than that which is instructing the people in the foundations of orchestral and piano music, and Dr. Hanchett has done his share to raise the standard of musical knowledge. The most important feature of the lecture-recital was the orchestral performance. While the playing lacked some things, the aim of the players was high and in evident sympathy with the lecturer, who was also the conductor. The singers pleased the audience, and they, too, sang as if they had been infused with the serious import of the occasion.

Last Monday evening the Venth-Kronold String Quartet gave a concert at Wissner Hall. The program was published in The Musical Courier last Wednesday. A review of the concert will be published in the next issue.

Hugo Troetschel opened his series of organ concerts at the German Evangelical Church last Monday evening with this program:

Sonata Pascale.....Lemmens
Solo, Lamb of God.....Jacoby
Miss Frieda Stender.
Prelude and Fugue in A minor.....Bach
Vision de Jeanne d'Arc.....Gounod
Scherzo (from Fourth Symphony).....Widor
Soli—
Lento espressivo.....Lassen
Evening Song.....Schumann
Karl Grienauer.
Souvenir de Lucerne.....Breitenbach
(Fantaisie pastoral and tempest in the Alps.)
Good Friday Spell (Parsifal).....Wagner
Solo, A Dream of Paradise.....Gray
Miss Frieda Stender.
Marcia Villereccia.....Fumagalli

The German Evangelical Lutheran Church on Schermerhorn street recently celebrated its sixtieth anniversary. The musical programs for the services were under the direction of Mr. Troetschel, a musician of lofty ideals. At the morning service the musical numbers were:

Organ Prelude, Festklange.....Hartmann
Mr. Troetschel
Twenty-third Psalm.....Becker
The choir.
Opening hymn, Lobe den Herren..... ——
Choir and congregation.
Organ, Interlude, Fugue in E major.....Bach
Mr. Troetschel

Alex. Rihm, piano; Max Bendix, first violin; Ernst H. Bauer, second violin; Jacob Altschüler, viola; Leo Schulz, 'cello.

Mrs. Florence Brown Shepard, who managed the joint recital given at Memorial Hall by Sara Anderson and Joseph Baernstein, expects to bring these artists to Brooklyy again in the spring. It is rare that one hears at a song recital two voices so equal in beauty. Both voices are rich, and both artists have temperament and a wide knowledge which provides for them both a big repertory. The patrons of the recital and many other music lovers crowded the pretty hall. The names of the patrons crowded out last week follows: Mr. and Mrs. William C. Bryant, Mrs. Henry Smock Boice, Mr. and Mrs. James D. Bell, Dr. and Mrs. William E. Beardsley, Mr. and Mrs. Charles B. Bartram, Mr. and Mrs. David L. Buckman, Mr. and Mrs. William C. Black, Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Beatley, Miss Maude

FROM VIRGINIA.

Richmond, Va., November 8, 1901.

THE "Princess Bonnie" was given at the Academy, Monday evening, by amateurs.

Miss Rhonie Hutzler made a charming Princess Bonnie; she not only sang well, but her acting was excellent. The lullaby, "Slumber So Gently," and "Love, First Love," created enthusiasm in the audience. Miss Blanche Harding Hecht sang, acted and danced beautifully as Kitty Clover. Mrs. Morris Asher had a dual role; in the first act she was Aunta Crab, the spinster, and in the last she was Donna Pomposo, the wife of the admiral. Tom Mitchell in the part of Shrimps surprised his friends by the finished character of his work.

Charles P. Crump, while taking the part of Captain Tarpaulin, sang in a style which would have been creditable to a professional.

The roles of Admiral Pomposo, Count Falsetti, Roy Sterling, Salvador, Captain Surí and Lieutenant Fuzee were sung by Edward Bosber, Aaron Jacobs, William Heller, Alfred Abrams, Henry Schwartzchild and Sydney Gunst. These gentlemen sang and acted as if they had long been on the stage.

The concert given by Mme. Katharine Fisk on Thursday was the first of the MacLachlan series to be given in Richmond, and was a most artistic musical treat. An interesting feature of the concert was the sympathy between the artist and the accompanist, Miss Sally Sherwood Betts. The program was divided into four suites, illustrating folksongs, ballads, children's songs and oratorio. The children's songs were exquisitely rendered, and in her interpretation of ballads and folksongs Madame Fisk aroused much enthusiasm. Perhaps the success of the evening was the singing of the arias from "Samson and Delilah," but the range and power of her voice and the intense sympathy were finely illustrated in the songs "Fair Spring Is Returning," "Oh, Love, of Thy Power" and "Softly Awakes My Heart."

Mary Howard Bruce.

Mary Hissem de Moss.—Mrs. Mary Hissem de Moss sang a fortnight ago with the Kneisel Quartet in Brooklyn. Some of her other engagements for the season include concerts at Orange, N. J.; soloist for the performance of "The Holy City" in Philadelphia on November 7; in the same city on April 16 in Bach's Mass in B minor; soloist at the concerts of the Pittsburg Symphony Orchestra, the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, at concert in Chicago, in St. Louis at the Bach Christmas Oratorio, with Detroit Symphony Orchestra, concert in Albany, and soloist at the concert of the New York Banks' Glee Club.

Los Angeles, Cal., October 29, 1901.

THE musical season in Los Angeles is fairly in swing, and from now on events of greater and lesser importance will, if indications count, crowd each other more closely than they ever have in past seasons. The first affair of musical note—this was unintentional—was the opening concert of the Imperial course of entertainments, given by "The Californians" at Simpson Auditorium October 15. Over 500 people were turned away, and the artistic talent that gave the concert appeared before an appreciative audience of over 2,000. Among the contributors to an evening of excellent music were Mrs. Minnie Hance Owens, contralto, and Charles A. Bowes, baritone, both of the Church of the Unity choir, and prominent factors in musical work here; Miss Miriam Barnes, pianist; Louis Angeloty, violinist; Paul Jennison, 'cellist, and Miss Mary O'Donoughue, accompanist. The second concert of the course will be given November 26 by the First Congregational orchestra, William R. Mead director. Mme. Genevra Johnstone-Bishop will be the assisting soloist.

The success of Sullivan's perennial "Pinafore," which has been playing a unique and successful engagement at the Chutes under Blanchard & Venter's management, has led to the establishment of what will doubtless be a very capable permanent company for the production of light opera. A novel feature in the staging of "Pinafore," and one incidentally that should advertise our balmy climate, was the cleverly carried out scheme of producing the nautical operetta in the open air; 'board ship in real water. In the pretty little artificial lake a substantial looking man-o'-war was built, and upon the deck of this ample room was afforded for the purposes of the performance. The orchestra, under Mr. Marten's direction, occupied the forecastle, while the lower deck forward and the cabin at the stern furnished dressing rooms. The nightly large audiences occupied the seats and "boxes," which lined the shore opposite the craft.

The company was composed almost wholly of local people and excelled most of the traveling companies that have visited us, and the chorus, at least the feminine portion, was a happy combination of good looks and excellent voices. The principals included the Misses Collett, Bryant and Gordon, and Charles A. Bowes, formerly of the Castle Square Opera Company; Forrest Dabney Carr, formerly of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Phin Nares, Joseph Dupuy and Mr. Peterson. The new company will be substantially the same, and will be strengthened by some additions.

The Royal Italian Band opens a brief engagement [illegible] November 1, Hazard's Pavilion. The prices, unlike those of the Grau aggregation which follows a week later, are "popular," and doubtless the work of the excellent forty musicians will be likewise.

An event that is being looked forward to with pleasant anticipations by local music lovers is the coming of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra. The enthusiastic praise received by the organization in the East has induced Blanchard & Venter to undertake the management of its Southern California engagements. The orchestra will visit us the latter part of February. Besides its own instrumental concerts, the orchestra will, unless plans miscarry, be heard in conjunction with our local oratorio society in the production of one of the oratorios.

Frank H. Colby's pupils will give a series of organ recitals during the season at Simpson Auditorium, the first to be given late in November by Mrs. Florence Eakers, Redlands, and Miss Ada Showalter. The character of Mr. Colby's pupils' recitals in the past should assure some interesting programs.

Clarence Cook, violinist, assisted by Miss Clara Bo[illegible]shell, pianist; Forrest D. Carr, basso, and Paul Jenn['cellist, gave a well rendered program of the classic Blanchard Hall, October 22.

Miss Lulu Barker, assisted by Miss Rita Green, sopr[illegible] and others, gave a creditable piano recital at Blanc[illegible] Hall on the evening of October 24.

The Los Angeles Symphony Orchestra, Harley Ha[illegible]ton director, is preparing for a season of excellent w[illegible] The creditable presentation of the highest class of orc[illegible]tral music by this organization entitles it to the re[illegible] and substantial support of the community. The first [illegible]cert will be given November 15. Mme. Charlotte [illegible]conda, soprano, will be the soloist.

Pupils of Mrs. Jennie Twitchell Kempton will give a[illegible]cital the latter part of November at Blanchard Hall. [illegible] Kempton numbers among her pupils not a few of the [illegible] prominent singers of Los Angeles, and her recitals par[illegible] of the character of artistic concert work rather than [illegible] of the usually amateurish efforts to be heard in recita[illegible] the sort.

Commencing November 17 the excellent choir of [illegible] Church of the Unity will give a series of monthly Sun[illegible] afternoon vesper services.

Ogden-Crane Pupils.—Miss Edith Hutchins, onc[illegible] Mme. Ogden Crane's especially successful pupils, has [illegible] engaged by Henry W. Savage for the prima donna ro[illegible] "King Dodo," and signed a three years' contract. Mad[illegible] Crane is Miss Hutchins' only teacher, and feels pro[illegible]tionately proud of the steady advancement her pup[illegible] making in her chosen profession.

Harry Pray, also a pupil, has the second tenor par[illegible] the male quartet with the "Helmet of Navarre" comp[illegible] Miss Mae Murphy has signed with Francis Wil[illegible] "Strollers" for the season. Both Mr. Pray and [illegible] Miss Murphy have never had any teacher save Mad[illegible] Crane. These few facts simply prove how successful Ma[illegible]ame Crane's pupils are in obtaining engagements.

CINCINNATI, November 9, 1901.

HE first faculty concert of the College of Music on Friday evening, November 8, was given in the Odeon Ernest Wilbur Hale, pianist, assisted by Edmund xander Jahn, baritone. Mr. Hale is fast forging to front among the best pianists of the city, and it is ays a pleasure to listen to him. His individuality at n hearing asserts itself more and more. This, added hose traits which are distinct results of the training ch he received from the distinguished teacher Albino no, make up an artistic totality that is bound to as- itself to success. His numbers were the Liszt tran- ption of Schubert's "Sei mir gegruest"; the "Fantasia romptu," C sharp minor, of Chopin; "Humoreske," g; "Fruehlingsrauschen," Sinding; "Marche Gro- que," Sinding, and the "Lucia" Fantasia, Donizetti- t. In the Schubert transcription he sustained the melody ne song with all the charm of poetry. The reading of the pin Fantasia was smooth, with light and shade, and ght appreciation of the tempo rubato. He put genu- characterization in the "Humoreske" of Grieg, and e was a delightful touch of genuine novelty expressed he Sinding numbers. The character of the "Marche tesque" was finely and humorously marked. Mr. Hale hed with the brilliant "Lucia" Fantasia, Donizetti- t.

r. Jahn was not in good voice on account of the ef- s of a bad cold, and it would be unfair to criticise out allowance. Still his interpretation of "Thus h the Lord," from "The Messiah," was very unsat- tory. It lacked in force and dignity, and the senti- t was much exaggerated. His enunciation, too, was etimes affected and sometimes positively bad. The ctions from Jensen's "Gaudeamus" would probably been more enjoyable had Mr. Jahn been in better e. The song of the "Traveling Students" was a very , uneven performance.

iss Clara B. Turpen, soprano, and Mrs. Maud W. Donald, alto, were in the city during the week, and for Mr. Van der Stucken in the Odeon. Miss Tur- sang two oratorio numbers, "Hear ye, Israel," and usalem"; Mrs. McDonald, among her other things, e of the gypsy songs by Dvorák. Miss Turpen's e asserted itself gloriously. In temper, expression quality it is particularly well adapted to the concert e. It is a voice that vibrates with dramatic feeling, is absolutely true to the pitch. Mrs. McDonald's e has the genuine alto quality—deep, resonant and . Both are pupils of Harry B. Turpen, of Dayton, o, to whom they owe their entire vocal training. Turpen has reason to be very proud of them.

iss Bessie Tudor, soprano, gave a song recital on nesday evening, November 6, at David Davis' school, ge Building. She presented the following program:

Songs, op. 55.....Dvorák
Mother Bids Me Bind My Hair.....Haydn
Is Sylvia?.....Schubert ice.....Tirindelli
e Song.....Hibler
The Bird and the Rose.....Horrocks
The Solitary Tear.....Fesca
The Sands o' Dee.....Clay
Spring Song.....Henschel
Marinella.....Randegger
The Gypsy Maiden.....Fesca
Recitative and air, Lend Me Your Aid (Queen of Sheba)....Gounod

Miss Tudor has a soprano of the purest quality—a voice that she uses with perfect ease, and yet is far reaching in its carrying power. To the gypsy songs she imparted a genuine bohemian flavor—the true spirit of the brown faced and untamed tribes. In the miscellaneous numbers she presented a variety that was thoroughly enjoyable, because she succeeded in bringing out the spirit of each song. An expression of sweet simplicity was noticed in the Haydn favorite. Miss Tudor is a pupil of David Davis. During the past summer months she was coached by Randegger, in London.

Miss Krippner, Miss Ungeheur and Miss Beck sang last Monday evening for the Y. M. C. A. convention, and made quite a favorable impression. They are pupils of Miss Emma Heckle, soprano, formerly of New York city.

An entertainment by pupils of Miss Emma Mae Cropsey, assisted by J. Stuyvesant Kinslow, basso, was given Friday evening, November 8, in the Columbia Opera House for the benefit of the Children's Hospital. Miss Cropsey is the elocution teacher of the Zilpha Barnes Wood Music School and Mr. Kinslow is one of her vocal pupils. The following program was entertainingly presented:

Music.....Selected
Asthore.....Trotere
J. Stuyvesant Kinslow.
The Silent System.....Dreyfus
Miss Bessie Kirk and William Keller.
Song of Hybrias, the Creton.....Elliot
Mr. Kinslow.

The first of the series of three chamber music concerts to be given this season by the Marien String Quartet, of the College of Music, will take place in the Odeon Wednesday evening, November 20. With the exception of Ralph Wetmore, who succeeded M. A. Snyder as second violinist, the personnel of the quartet remains the same as last season, and comprises José Marien, first violin; Ralph Wetmore, second violin; Richard Schliewen, viola, and Lino Mattioli, violoncello. Mr. Wetmore, the recent addition to the quartet, has been heard in concert in Cincinnati and vicinity a number of times, and his appearance at the chamber music concerts will be quite familiar to local patrons of high class music. Since entering the College of Music, under the instruction of José Marien, Mr. Wetmore's musical ability has matured wonderfully. The beautiful ensemble now obtained, a result of constant rehearsals, together with the work done by these players, even since the quartet's organization, is assurance of an artistic performance. The program is as follows:

Kaiser Quartet, for strings, op. 76, No. 3.....Haydn
Quartet (La Volga), for strings.....Afannasieff
Quintet, for piano and strings, op. 81.....Dvorák
Sig. Romeo Gorno, by request, will play the piano part of the Dvorák Quintet.

"Hebrew, Greek and Roman Music" will be the subject of the second lecture in the history of music course, which will be delivered by Prof. A. J. Gantvoort, next Monday afternoon, November 11, in the Lyceum of the College of Music.

Miss Jerree Pollard, a former pupil of Signor Romeo Gorno, of the College of Music, and who received a certificate at the college in 1899, has been re-engaged to teach piano at Union College, Barbourville, Ky., this season.

Miss Leona Rudy, pupil of Signor Lino Mattioli, of the College of Music, sang at the First Baptist Church last Sunday.

The fact that graduates of Cincinati music schools are in demand as teachers in other cities argues well for the efforts of our local institutions. The most recent engagement of this kind is that of Miss Helen A. Wilkinson by the Asheville Conservatory of Music. The Asheville Citizen speaks of Miss Wilkinson's engagement in the following terms: "Miss Helen A. Wilkinson was selected from a large number of applicants from various parts of the United States to come on trial for the positions of solo soprano at the First Baptist Church of this city and teacher of voice culture in the Asheville Conservatory of Music, and so unanimous was the verdict in her favor that contracts have been made for twelve months, and Miss Wilkinson enters upon her duties at once. Miss Wilkinson is a strong addition to the conservatory forces, being highly recommended as a teacher by the Auditorium School of Music, Cincinnati." She received her training at the College of Music and later at the Auditorium School, where she graduated. Miss Wilkinson was a protégée of Miss Helen M. Gould.

Miss Nettie K. Oppenheimer's success as a reader is recognized abroad as well as locally, as her bookings for the season show. Miss Oppenheimer will open the season with a reading at Hamilton on Tuesday evening, November 12.

The first of a series of lectures on the "Anatomy and Physiology of Voice Production" at the Auditorium School of Music will be given Friday, November 22, at 2:30 p. m., by Dr. W. C. Harris. This lecture will be illustrated, and will be of interest and benefit to singers and students of voice culture.

Signor Pier A. Tirindelli, violinist, will be the soloist at the first Orpheus Club concert, December 5. The chorus will sing his Notturno with viola obligato and tenor solo.

At the pupils' recital of the Conservatory of Music this afternoon a concerto for three violins, by Antonio Vivaldi, the Venetian violinist of the eighteenth century, was played by the following pupils of Mr. Tirindelli: Miss Cora Mae Henry, Miss Gretchen McCurdy Gallagher and Miss Daisy Mae Seiler. The cadenza was written by Mr. Tirindelli.

J. A. HOMAN.

ANTON KASPAR.—Anton Kaspar, the young violinist who made such a splendid success in his Southern concert tour last spring with Carrie Bridewell, is now booking engagements for the coming season, and may be reached by a letter addressed care of THE MUSICAL COURIER. Here is what the Washington Star had to say of his solo work at the Georgetown Orchestra concert, one of the principal musical events in Washington last May:

Mr. Kaspar played Vieuxtemps' concerto for violin and orchestra, and in brilliancy of technic, beauty of tone and artistic interpretation proved his thorough mastery of the instrument. Mr. Kaspar has made rapid strides within the past year and has possibilities of becoming the foremost of violinists at no distant day. He has all the qualities necessary—great industry, perfect knowledge of the capabilities of the violin, excellent schooling and a thorough artistic temperament.

WE are having ideal weather in 'Frisco, despite the advance of the year, and in the middle of the day it is still uncomfortably warm. People are very slow in adopting the winter styles, as the heat makes it seem somewhat ridiculous to appear in anything but summer garb.

Tivoli grand opera has given place to the clever children of the Pollard Company, and the engagement bids fair to be a big success. The stage manager, who has graduated from the ranks, is but nineteen years of age, and it is a sight to see him drill his company of tots, following every move, up, down and across the stage with his own example even to facial expression, and he works like a tiger. One little Miss of five years was heard to declare: "Aw, yes, I like travel, you know, but I abominate the stage, don't you know, and I detest music, but I like to tyke in the sights, and I enjoy traveling about." They are all Australians, are under twelve, and speak with the most pronounced English "awkcent." They have their regular schoolmaster and music teacher, as well as traveling physician, and miss nothing in the way of educational advantages by their roving life.

Apropos of the last week of grand opera, Anna Wilson, a San Diego girl by nativity, made her début in solo parts during this season, first as Frederic in "Mignon," and this last week as Michaela in "Carmen" with unqualified success. Though it is but a few weeks since the little lady had undergone a most severe and dangerous operation on the ear, her work bore no evidence of nervousness or physical weakness. Her stage presence is particularly engaging, being fair of face and a pretty figure, and her voice, a sweet mezzo-contralto of fine range, won for her instant recognition and prolonged applause. Much has been said and sung of Collamarini's "Carmen," many pronouncing it vulgar, suggestive and what not? "Honi soit qui mal y pense!" Collamarini's Carmen is a perfectly consistent character, and with any degree of coquetry, or if you like, "suggestiveness" left out, simply would not be Carmen. She is perfectly gorgeous in the part, and small wonder it is that there are those ready to declare that hers is the greatest Carmen on record. Those who worship at Collamarini's shrine are looking forward with eager anticipation to the advent of Calvé, with whom the part is inseparably connected.

Mention must be made of the Don José of delightful little Russo, whom everybody likes, and who gave us in the part a most satisfactory and realistic interpretation. These people, nearly all of them belonging to the stranded Lombardi Italian Opera Company, on account of their limited English, meet with many disagreeable experiences. People otherwise reasonably intelligent will insist on using "Pidgin English" as a means of communication, and the results are not always satisfactory—to the aggressor at least. Russo appearing on the ferry in his hunting clothes (he is a great sport) was asked by one of our recent clerical visitors "What you shootee? You likee shoot? Me shootee bird—what you shootee?" Poor little Russo, taken at a disadvantage and feeling the slur of being addressed like a Chinaman, replied in the only word he had at hand for his reverence briefly and to the point: "Ebbyting!" Afterward entreating his companion to tell him if he looked like a "Japanaise."

We have had our usual allotment of concerts this week, the first, on Tuesday afternoon, being an autumnal program, with excerpts from the "Persian Garden" of Lehmann and other appropriate subjects. The program was furnished by pupils of Mrs. Marriner-Campbell and the stage of the Y. M. C. A. Auditorium being tastefully decorated with the leaves and fruit of the beautiful "Flaming Tokay" grape and autumn leaves. The entertainment was under the auspices of the California Club. Tuesday evening a testimonial concert was given to Harry Wood Brown, a young student baritone, assisted by some of our local talent, the concert taking place at Sherman-Clay Hall.

The Orpheus Concert Company, Roscoe Warren Lucy, pianist and director; Miss Grace Davis, soprano; Mrs. Sedgeley Reynolds, contralto; J. F. Veaco, tenor, and C. Van Linghem, basso, gave their first concert of the season, 1901-1902, at Sherman-Clay Hall on Thursday, October 31. A good audience was in attendance and a fine program rendered. Mr. Lucy gave three Chopin numbers, the two etudes, "Butterfly" and "Revolutionary," and the Tarantelle, the last being really his best number, as the etudes were given at a much slower tempo than is customary. His accompaniments to the concerted and solo vocal numbers were good work, and showed him to be a natural accompanist. Miss Grace Davis was, as always, satisfactory in her solo work. I did not so well enjoy the duets between her and Mrs. Reynolds, probably because the tremolo in Mrs. Reynolds' voice causes a tendency to flat. Mr. Veaco has a fine, powerful voice with an agreeable sweetness of quality that is considerably marred by a strong nasal tone. Mr. Van Linghem gave a bass solo from "Dinorah" in a voice of good weight and pleasing quality. It is a basso pure and simple, and he uses it well. The quartet work was much more successful, taken as a whole, than the solo work, and received enthusiastic recalls. The voices are well balanced and work well together. What individual faults there are can easily be remedied, and the ensemble work is pleasing enough to make the concert series a success.

Norah Sandy, a young pianist of fourteen, who makes no pretension of being anything but a conscientious student who has accomplished something creditable, gives a concert on the 7th at Sherman-Clay Hall, with the assistance of Katherine Black, D. Manlloyd, S. J. Sandy, Rocco a Raja, Louis von der Mehden, Jr., and Signor Martinez, who is her instructor.

The concerts of Enid Brandt, the eight year old pianist, begin on Tuesday the 5th, and continue for six consecutive every Tuesday evening and Saturday afternoon. The child has been declared greater than any known pianist of her age, and those who have heard her are unanimous in declaring that the technic, power and interpretation she displays would be declared impossible for such a baby had they not been an eye witness to her wonderful achievements. After the local concerts an Eastern tour is being considered.

Saturday afternoon at Sherman-Clay Hall, a matinée concert was given by Mrs. Sedgeley Reynolds, contralto, and Frederic Biggerstaff, pianist, assisted by Arthur Weiss, 'cellist. The program opened with a sonata for piano and 'cello in three movements, by Nicode, and embraced further selections from Schubert, Brahms, Nevin, Chadwick Rogers and D'Hardelot, vocal; Polonaise de Concert, for 'cello, Popper, which was given with Mr. Weiss' usual thoroughly artistic finish, and Chopin, Glazounow, Schumann Moszkowski, for piano. Mrs. Reynolds' singing was marked by a bad vibrato, and her enunciation was very imperfect. The lady has a good natural voice, but has not the concentration of tone and proper use of her breath to display what the real voice is capable of becoming. Mr. Biggerstaff has not deteriorated since I heard him last year. He would never be a great artist, as he has not the masculine force of character to produce great effects. His playing is effeminate in its delicacy, but his technic is meticulously clean and true. His "Variations on the Name Abegg," which I have never heard played here before, were sparkling, clean cut and bright in its execution as drops of water flung into the sunlight. His numbers were all taken in strict tempo, and left a very satisfying impression on the listener. In accompanying the songs Mr. Biggerstaff proved himself also to be a very sympathetic accompanist.

Mrs. Oscar Mansfeldt leaves to-morrow morning for a much needed recuperation before the recitals of Hortense Mansfeldt in December, at which she is to assist. Mrs. Mansfeldt will go to Nevada for her vacation, and be gone a month.

The first concert of the twenty-fifth year of the Loring Club was given at Native Sons Hall the evening of the 31st ult. As usual, the house was packed; not a seat to be had after the program began. One of the most comfortable features of the concert was that there were programs enough for all, which heretofore has not been the case, and as they are beautifully gotten up, those who have been fortunate enough to procure them have retained them as souvenirs. The club, directed by David Loring and accompanied at the piano by Miss Ruth Loring, was assisted by Miss Anne Louise Daniels, soprano; Joseph Willard, first violin; Theodore Blake, second violin; Chas. A. Gwyn, viola; Leonard M. Waterman, 'cello; B. Spiller, bass, and Jacob B. Levison, flute. Miss Daniels gave a number of solos in a voice of rather good quality, but cloudy tone. Of the solos I liked "Im Herbst," Franz, best, and the "Danza" by Chadwick, was a very pretty number. To an encore she responded with "The Sweetest Flower That Blows"

Herbert Medley does not ex- l. His voice has a boyish quality, inconsistent with a one of mature years, and though of agreeable quality some strength, is wasted by poor method. His tremolo sagreeably marked. Why don't these people who want ing learn proper breath control? The club work was good; not enough tenors, perhaps, to balance well, rwise an improvement over last year, and the program extraordinarily good. MRS. A. WEDMORE JONES.

Mme Doria Devine's Musical Matinee.

LAST Friday morning the usual repertory class session was supplemented by a program rendered by the pro- ional pupils who have been brought out under Madame ine's able instruction. These were Miss Blanche Duf- , whose successful singing the past two seasons with sa's Band is well remembered.

iss Josephine Mildenberg, sister of the pianist and poser Albert Mildenberg, and Mary Louise Gehle, con- o of St. Stephen's Church, this city. In all that this arkable trio were heard ample evidence was given of artistic finish which is only acquired by hard and per- nt study.

liss Duffield has gained more breadth and volume, yet execution is wonderfully agile and certain. One of the t marked features of this young artist is that whatever sings seems to be reflected in her expressive counte- ce as well as in her charming voice.

liss Mildenberg was heard in Mignon's song, "Know- Thou the Land" and Hahn's "Si Mes Vers," and she, is a charming singer. Her smooth legato was always evidence, and "Pussy Willow," a new song by Albert denberg, was a gem.

lary Louise Gehle has a rich contralto voice. Her ren- on of Gluck's "O tu del mio Dolore" was remarkable good phrasing and evenly balanced, sustained effort.

William Bauer, Pianist.

PROMINENT among the younger artists in this coun- try is William Bauer, the gifted pianist now touring n Leonora Jackson. He had his early training in ope, studied later with Joseffy and finally with Mad- de Wienzkowska. He is a prime favorite, as the fol- ing brief press extracts from recent concerts show:

. Bauer's playing was a delight in every sense.—South Bend .) Daily Tribune.

ss Jackson is exceedingly fortunate in her piano soloist and mpanist, William Bauer. One will go to many a high class ert and not hear his equal.—South Bend (Ind.) Daily Times.

r. Bauer played Rubinstein's Polonaise from "Le Bal" in a erly manner, displaying a splendid technic. His work entire very enjoyable. His style is sympathetic and scholarly. After endition of Moszkowski's "Etincelles," which was magnificently n, the applause was so enthusiastic that he was compelled to an encore. His work also as accompanist was very artistic, blended beautifully with both violin and voice.—Fort Wayne .) Daily News.

r. Bauer proved a master of his instrument. His technic and sing are excellent and he is a most finished and brilliant per- er.—Saginaw (Mich.) Courier-Herald.

PHILADELPHIA, November 3, 1900.

FRITZ SCHEEL, conductor of the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra, returned last week. He is in excellent health and enthusiastic over the outlook for the orchestra. While in Europe Mr. Scheel attended the Wagner festival at Bayreuth and also visited the new Prince Regent Theatre at Munich, which has been modeled after the building at Bayreuth. The theatre was erected for the purpose of producing Wagner's music dramas in the same manner and on the same scale of magnificence as those given under the direction of Cosima Wagner. The moving spirit in the enterprise is the general manager, Possart. Scheel speaks very highly of Possart's ingenuity and said that the stage settings surpassed anything he had ever seen in that line. The weak spot of the organization seems to lie in the conductor of the orchestra, Zuppe. He is the composer of "Farinella," an opera somewhat on the style of Offenbach, and he seems to think that Wagner should be conducted in the same way as his own light composition. The consequence was that Munich was favored with a performance that brought to mind the old fable of the ass in lion's skin. There was some talk of offering Zuppe the post of conductor at the next Bayreuth festival, but since the Munich performance this has all disappeared.

For various reasons there is some reluctance displayed in giving the names at this time of the foreign players that have been secured for the orchestra, but this much I can say, that for concertmeister of the orchestra Mr. Scheel has engaged Kosman, the concertmeister of the Lamoureux Orchestra in Paris, and friend of Ysaye. Kosman was given first prize for violin playing at the Paris Conservatoire upon his graduation. At the Glasgow festival this year he played with Ysaye and Joachim. Mr. Scheel considers him an acquisition. He has also secured Ary Van Leeuwen, first flute player of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra. The orchestra will produce a number of new compositions this season, among which is the symphonic poem "Barbarossa," by Siegmund Von Hansegger, which created a furore at the Berlin Philharmonic concerts last season. Hansegger is a rising young composer of Munich, and was brought into prominence by the work just mentioned.

The one thing that is troubling the orchestra management at the present time is how to find a room large enough and near enough to the Academy of Music to serve for the purpose of rehearsal. It might be said in passing that here is a fine opportunity for the public spirited citizens to help make Philadelphia a great musical centre. They can best do this by assisting the orchestra in every way that lies in their power.

The pupils of Frederick Maxson, assisted by Miss Katherine L. Tegtmeier, soprano, gave a concert at the Central Congregational Church on last Tuesday evening. The performance was an artistic success, and Mr. Maxson starts another season having given substantial proof that he is competent to bring out the best of organists. Following is the program:

MISS PELTON ENTERTAINS.—Last week Tuesday, Miss Katharine Pelton gave the second one of her monthly musicales in the handsome studios, which she shares with Miss Henriette Weber, at No. 60 West Thirty-ninth street. A number of prominent society people, as well as well-known musicians, called during the afternoon to enjoy Miss Pelton's charming hospitality, and to hear some excellent music.

Miss Pelton sang in her usual artistic manner some German, French and English songs, among which was the beautiful "Chant Hindu," of Bemberg, with 'cello obligato, played by Charles Russell, who also gave some brilliant solos on his own account. Miss Florence Gale, the pianist, gave several delightful numbers that were much enjoyed, Miss Weber played the accompaniments, and also a few solos.

FREDERIC MARINER.

NOTED North, East, South and West as "The Technic Specialist" in piano playing, Frederic Mariner has chosen to leave New York and locate, at least for the present season, in the up to date and thrifty little city of Bangor, the smartest city in the State of Maine.

The reputation that Mr. Mariner has won for himself in the past ten years in New York is an enviable one and has been gained by no end of hard work.

To-day there is no teacher in America who has produced greater pianistic results than Mr. Mariner through his many pupils.

Miner Walden Gallup, for two years and a half the protégé of Mr. Mariner, who gave him his entire musical instruction, is known from South Carolina and Georgia to Maine through his various piano recitals in these States.

This young lad in a short time gained a technical equipment that many a so-called artist player might well envy.

In applying this great technic to the acquiring of a repertory, Master Gallup has now thoroughly memorized more than fifty standard compositions of sufficient variety to allow of a great number of concert programs to be arranged.

How was all this advancement possible? The only answer is—a pupil with well balanced ability unhampered with faults the outcome of years of bad training; a teacher who is willing to give up his life to a cause; a method that permits of correct results from the first lesson.

Miner Walden Gallup was the pupil, Frederic Mariner the teacher, and the Virgil method, correctly applied, the vehicle used.

No teacher in the world is better qualified to instruct pupils in the art of piano playing by means of the Virgil method or to impart to piano teachers the secrets of this most modern of piano methods, so that the greatest and best results are gained, than is Mr. Mariner. Not only has he brought to public notice many a talented player, but almost every State in the Union can claim one or more piano teachers who have gained their knowledge of Virgil training through lessons with this indefatigable man. Among the many, no better names can be mentioned than those of Robert Colston Young, C. Virgil Gordon and Wilbur Sanford Blakeslee, employed at present in the Virgil Piano School, New York, all three of whom received their training in the Virgil method and gained their teachers' certificates through the direct instruction of Mr. Mariner.

Employed as a teacher in this piano school from 1892 to the present season, Mr. Mariner leaves the school taking with him the highest praise from the many students who have gained from his instructions.

In locating in Bangor, the musical centre of Eastern Maine, Mr. Mariner has undoubtedly made a move in the right direction, not only to his own gain, but to that of New England.

To many students the long and expensive trip to New York to receive instructions from Frederic Mariner has proven an impossibility, but now, with a man of his renown in their very midst, the Virgil method of piano instruction cannot fail but be introduced into heretofore impossible localities.

As a centre for summer instruction Maine is incomparable, having a climate the very antithesis of the average climatic conditions attending summer sessions in New York.

During the summer of 1902 a special opportunity to study in Bangor will be given teachers who are desirous of combining the pleasure of a Maine summer resort with the possibility of gaining a knowledge of how to impart Virgil training.

In founding the Bangor Piano School Mr. Mariner has had the able support of Miss Abbie M. Garland, who during her teaching of many years in Bangor has gained a widely known reputation as a successful teacher. For the past four years she has used the Virgil method of piano instruction almost exclusively, and admits fully its superiority in gaining greater and better results over any previous teaching. Miss Garland has given her substantial aid in forwarding every musical movement of any note in Bangor, and her generous energy and great executive ability are now to be used in the interests of the Bangor Piano School. As a prominent instructor in the school, the influence of her strong personality will aid greatly toward making this new enterprise a strong lever toward Bangor becoming the musical centre of Maine.

Already the Bangor Piano School is an assured success, having enrolled enough pupils to fill almost every teaching hour available. The Thursday afternoon recitals (lessons in public performance), instituted by Mr. Mariner in New York, are continued in Bangor, and with a greatly increased attendance, the various rooms of the school being taxed to the uttermost each Thursday. Great public interest in the new school is certainly indicated in the cordial and generous support given Mr. Mariner in his undertaking, and by the large number of pupils not only from Bangor proper but from many of the surrounding towns throughout Eastern Maine.

Mr. Mariner also attracts to Maine a number of his former pupils who have studied with him in New York. Already Mr. Mariner is receiving many letters of inquiry regarding a summer session in 1902, and the indications are that a summer school is sure to be well patronized by former pupils who wish to escape the summer heat of the South and West.

Arthur Beaupré, the little twelve year old boy pianist who was brought out in New York last season, continues his work under Mr. Mariner's guidance in Bangor, and is making quite a success of public playing. At this early date he has appeared at no less than eight recitals, and is engaged for a number more through December, making a tour of several nearby towns, commencing at Milo on December 17; Dover, December 18; Guilford December 19, with other towns to follow.

Early in January Master Beaupré will undoubtedly play a recital at Asbury Park, N. J., as negotiations are being made at present to that effect. In this case he will be heard in New York, giving his many friends and patrons an opportunity of listening to the rapid progress he is making under Mr. Mariner's instruction.

CARL ORGAN CONCERTS.—In response to many requests for an afternoon recital William C. Carl has announced that the second recital of the series now being given by him at the "Old First" Presbyterian Church, Fifth avenue and Twelfth street, will occur at 4 o'clock in the afternoon on Tuesday of next week. This will be the only afternoon concert of the series, and the succeeding ones will continue at the hour of 8:15 in the evening, November 26, December 3 and 10. At the recital next Tuesday afternoon at 4 o'clock, Mr. Carl will be assisted by Charles Schultze, harpist, and the program will be devoted to compositions for the organ and harp. The recital will be free to the public, and no tickets issued.

EDUARD ZELDENRUST.

AT the home of the Dutch pianist, Eduard Zelden[rust] in Paris, France, among a valuable collection, w[hich] includes many rare works of art, is, or was, a silk [cov]ered pillow. It is beautifully delicate in coloring, and [orna]mented with an elaborate design of exquisitely wro[ught] needlework, into which is deftly woven the two ini[tials] "E" and "O."

Second only in importance to his beloved piano—in[deed] more rightly speaking, ranking with it in his affectio[nate] regard—is that downy, delectable, alluring pillow—the [one] representing activity in his life, the other repose.

Wherever he goes, whether to the Holland coast s[um]mer resort, Scheveningen, for his vacation; to England over the Continent for a recital tour—wherever pleasur[e] his profession calls Zeldenrust—there the piano and the low go, too. The function of the former is obvious; of the latter, with its elusive suggestion of intimate a[s]ciation, is more evasive and uncertain, but no less inte[r]ing on that very account.

Much has already been written of Zeldenrust, and though he now visits America for the first time, his n[ame] and his fame have preceded him.

It has been told of him, of course, that he is maste[r] his instrument and of his art; that he has a broad and orous mentality; that he is far from being ill favored in matter of looks, is about thirty years old—and a bachel[or] but heretofore there has been no hint of a romantic tachment.

Now, with the entrance, so to speak, of this sedu[ctive] pillow comes a suggestion which savors strongly of "affaire du cœur," around which there is a fascinating of mystery—mystery always interesting, but doubly hanced by a flavor of romance, and rendered still more tent by the admission that the lady in the case is an An[er]ican beauty.

Although Zeldenrust has never before been in this co[un]try, either professionally or otherwise, he has naturally and known many of the Americans who visit Europe e[ach] year. Of this number, not long ago, was a lady betwe[en] whom and the eminent pianist a cordial friendship g[rew] from the first formal meeting.

Who she is, or what part of this broad continent she c[alls] her home, even her name, is part of the mystery; but seriousness of the attachment may be surmised by the f[act] that the pillow, so apparently one of Zeldenrust's choic[est] treasures, was a gift from this incognita, the work of own hands, and the initial "O" is the first letter of given name, even as the "E" is of his.

Upon hearing him play, so the story goes, she was stantly and deeply interested in the famous Hollan[der]. At a reception later the same evening he was present the attraction was mutual, and quickly developed int[o] regard which, so far as is known, has never diminished either side.

Just before her departure for America she sent Z[el]denrust the pillow, with the request that he "use it co[n]stantly and think of the giver all the time it was in us[e]" He seems to have done so. But whether or not th[ere] are other tokens as significant, the possession of wh[ich] have not as yet been divulged, or whether the char[m] of the one fair American will be superseded by those [of] others now he has reached this side, are matters conjecture. At all events the pillow is here with him.

The great Hollander is said to possess the same gi[ft] of personality that have proven so irresistible to the f[air] sex in the great Pole. Who shall say what will be the Heinebund Concert.

New York Heinebund gave a concert last Sunday at Terrace Garden, under the direction of the reg- onductor, Louis Koemmenich. The society had the ance of an orchestra, a vocal quartet and Leopold ler, pianist. Members and their guests enjoyed the ng, which, musically, proved one of the best in the y of the society. The male chorus sang "Rose and tingale," by Pache, with orchestral accompaniment, hree numbers a capella—"Jagdmorgen," Rheinberg- "Abendfeier," by Attenhofer, and "Maedel wie t's," by Schwalm. The Ladies' Chorus sang "In " by Slunicko. Winkler played the beautiful Per- air, transcribed by Joseffy, and the Schubert-Tau- Military March." The orchestra played numbers by abini, Wagner, Pierne and Gillet. The vocal quar- omposed of Miss Rosa Wald, soprano; Miss Martha engel, contralto; William Bartels, tenor, and Carl gel, baritone, sang the quartet from "Rigoletto." concert closed with the singing of Gade's "Erlkoe- Tochter" by the two choruses, with solos for so- , alto and baritone, accompanied by the orchestra.

THARINE FISK IN RICHMOND.—Of a recital given by Katharine Fisk, the eminent contralto, at Richmond, November 4, the Times, of that city, spoke as follows:

no easy task for one artist to sing nineteen numbers and an audience enthralled to the very last, but that is what ne Fisk did. Her program was excellently arranged so as to her facility and skill in various styles of singing.

. Fisk has a contralto voice of rare quality of tone and of range. It possesses much warmth and color, and while it is and full is really most attractive in the pianissimo passages. Auf Wiedersehen" of Nevin and "L'Esclara" of Lalo were the avorites.

COPENHAGEN.

HOLBERGSGADE, 11-4; OCTOBER 17, 1901.

THE past week has been unusually quiet, as, with the exception of one orchestral concert and the violin evening given by a young Hungarian artist of considerable merit, nothing of any consequence has taken place. However, this state of affairs will only last up to about November 1, from which date there will be concerts galore.

The orchestral concert referred to was that of the Imperial Russian Marine Orchestra from one of the passing Russian men-of-war, and consists of about sixty members, all of them artists. The leader, or, as he is styled, the imperial chapelmaster, is a picturesque looking gentleman, dressed in a splendid uniform and decorated with numerous medals and other decorations. Of the eight numbers on the program half were by Russian composers, and it was not uninteresting to hear those pieces performed by Russians, mostly from the interior of the vast empire, as it stands to reason that some of them have at some time come in touch with the composers. The first number, an overture by Glazounow, was fairly well performed, but the members of the orchestra were not "warmed" up to the occasion, as was the case in the five following unique pieces from Tschaikowsky's ballet, "Casse Noisette." I do not remember having heard these five pieces played with such spirit as this orchestra displayed, and I wonder if the composer himself has not had a great deal to do with the careful study of all these five most excellent small pieces, as it certainly sounded as if every member was inspired with a desire to do his very best. Then followed the overture to Glinka's opera, "Ruslan and Ludmilla," which had a less careful interpretation, and then came variations on two Russian folksongs by the conductor, Mr. Hlavác. This proved to be both interesting and musicianly, but without any deeper worth. The second half of the program was devoted to Scandinavian composers, the first being N. W. Gade's "Ossian" overture, which, of course, was of interest here in Denmark, where the performance of this masterpiece, under the baton of the great leader and composer himself, is still remembered by nearly all music lovers of Copenhagen. Then came Grieg's "Peer Gynt" suite (I.), which has also been heard here quite often under the genial composer's own leadership, and the march, "The Entry of the Bojars," by the Norwegian composer, Johan Halvorsen. This last piece was delightfully read, and, being half Russian and half Scandinavian, will undoubtedly be heard with great pleasure in the United States, as I do not remember having seen it on one of your concert programs. The solo clarinetist, Mr. Romishowsky, who played Weber's well-known concert piece, showed himself an able artist, and he was recalled several times, as was also the conductor of the orchestra, Mr. Hlavác, at the finish of the performance.

It was indeed a pleasure to listen to the young Hungarian violinist, Arthur Hartmann, last Tuesday evening, October 15. The young man brings out a beautiful tone, and, like almost all of his nationality, has a special love and talent for his chosen instrument. Of course it is rather hard to prophesy how such an artist will develop in the future, but as far as his performance last Tuesday is concerned he certainly gives promise of developing into something out of the ordinary, as he possesses remarkable talent and seems to be an intelligent student. He was assisted by a local singer, Mrs. Holstein-Berg, who sang songs by Grieg, Sinding and local composers. She has a powerful and very dramatic voice, and knows how to use it to great advantage.

To-night the Scotch pianist, Frederic Lamond, gives his first of four Beethoven evenings.

AUGUST HYLLESTED.

Amy Murray in New Jersey.

THE Scottish recital singer, Miss Amy Murray, was welcomed by friendly audiences in Newark, N. J., and Montclair, N. J., where she recently appeared. Hervey in the Newark Sunday Call in his report referred as follows to the recital:

To hear Miss Amy Murray sing Scottish songs is to get a clear idea of the beauty and effect of the traditional songs of Auld Scotia, for she sings them as the Scots themselves sing them. * * * Miss Murray sang Jacobite songs, ballads or story telling songs and folksongs, and ended with a thrilling delivery of "Caller Herrin'." * * *

Her voice is pure and powerful, and in the dramatic or story telling songs she acts them as well as sings them. The recital was not only delightful but instructive as well.

In several songs Miss Murray played her own accompaniments on the clarsach, the ancient Gaelic harp.

These extracts are from reports in the Montclair papers:

The recital at the Montclair Club Monday evening was very enjoyable and pleased immensely the large audience which filled the hall. Miss Murray has a very highly cultivated voice, of remarkable sweetness and sympathetic quality. Added to this she has a clear enunciation and a thorough sympathy with the sentiment and spirit of Scots song, and, to crown all, a bright and gracious manner which puts her immediately on good terms with her audience. A fitting climax to the evening's enjoyment was the heartiness with which all joined in the singing of "Auld Lang Syne."—Montclair Herald, October 31, 1901.

* * * Miss Murray is an attractive woman with a superb soprano voice, and shows originality and individuality in the treatment of her subject. Her natural enthusiasm for Scottish songs and story carries her audiences with her.—Montclair Times, November 2, 1901.

MANUSCRIPT SOCIETY.—The Manuscript Society has in view for the season a series of very interesting musical entertainments, and announces that the first of its private meetings will be held at the National Arts Club, in West Thirty-fourth street, on the evening of November 20, when the program will be made up entirely of compositions by women composers, of whom the society has a very notable list, both in this country and in Europe. The locality chosen for the meeting will offer a unique combination of music with the fine arts and social refinements represented by the two organizations.

JESSIE SHAY.—Miss Jessie Shay will play in Pittsburg with the Pittsburg Symphony Orchestra, November 22 and 23. Miss Shay will make her first New York appearance this season at the Kubelik début at Carnegie Hall, December 2. On that occasion she will play with the Paur Symphony Orchestra the Henselt Concerto.

BOSTON, November 10, 1901.

PERHAPS you remember that in 1895 a "Lyric Stock Company was installed" here. It was known as the Castle Square Company, and its fame spread far and wide. The theatre was praised by W. D. Howells, the most intrepid of all discoverers; Mr Apthorp wrote a rhapsody in French inspired by a performance of "The Mikado"; Professor Paine was deeply moved by the amiable prima donna, Clara Lane, and B. J. Lang approved of the scheme and gave it his pontifical blessing, aye, in the sight of the people.

The theatre had its own peculiar audience, which was devoted to the chief singers. The managers rewarded this devotion by giving plenty of electricity in various forms—at the bar and on the stage. "Faust" was an electrical exhibition with incidental music by Gounod. Mephistopheles was a walking battery. There was an electrical discharge when Faust embraced Marguerite at the window. The duel was fought as in a thunder storm.

This audience did not care whether the score used was that of the composer or any Mr. Huidekoop or Ramsbottom, whether the oboe of Bizet was replaced by the trombone of Johnson. The favorites and the tunes were the thing. Miss Lane often sang prettily, and showed herself a woman of unfailing good nature, amazing industry and considerable versatility. There were others in the company who had various gifts. There was a tenor, Mr. Persse, who had a strong voice and incredible endurance; he would sing for fifty or a hundred nights in succession. He was a pleasant, unassuming man, known as "the Broncho Tenor." There was Mr. Murray, the husband of Miss Lane, a baritone with a sympathetic voice and an easy presence. There was Miss Edith Mason, who sang agreeably in various parts, and there were laborious comedians who disdained the simplicity of texts by W. S. Gilbert.

The theatre was comfortable; the prices were low; the scenery and the costumes and the stage management were far superior to the endeavors of strolling companies of high pretensions, world famous tenors and polyglot repertory. The repertory of the first year included operettas by Suppé, Offenbach, Millocker, Sullivan, Auber and like works, as well as "Lucia," "Faust," "Il Trovatore," "The Huguenots," "Carmen," "Aïda," "Rigoletto," "Cavalleria Rusticana," "Pagliacci," "Tannhäuser," and it is my impression that "Lohengrin" was given. For these operas the company was strengthened—W. H. Clarke, Payne Clark, William Schuster, Charles Bassett, William Mertens, Mary Linck, Fatmah Diard (although Miss Lane was Elisabeth in "Tannhäuser"). There was a second year and then the Castle Square was given over to the drama. As you know, the name was retained by Mr. Savage, who planted his companies in various cities.

Several reasons were given for the change in policy. They were connected with business. The audience was not weary or remiss.

Do you ask, Why this excursion into ancient history? Because last week saw an attempt to revive the plan that promised to be successful at the Castle Square. There are many men and women here who are eager to see opera, light or romantic, at reasonable prices and in English. And some of them are now, for a time at least, furnishing a guarantee for the benefit of Messrs. Murray and Gilbert, the managers, who have taken the Bijou Theatre for their purpose. Mr. Murray is our old friend of the Castle Square, and Miss Lane is again the prima donna.

The opera chosen for the first night, November 4, was "Il Trovatore," which even to-day is one of the strongest operas on the stage, whatever language may be used. Again was I impressed by the wealth of melody, by the sweep of passion, by the greatness of the fourth act and by the truth of the emotional melody put into the mouth of Manrico when he curses Leonora in the prison scene. Never did composer fit more direct and irresistible declamatory phrases to words. There is no finer instance of musical declamation in "Aïda" or "Otello" or in any of the music dramas of Wagner.

But I was shocked when I looked at the program. Our old friend, Ferrando, the follower of the Count di Luna, had disappeared and in his place was one Fernando. Not the same, not the same. There is a Fernando in "La Favorita" who breaks a sword and properly refuses to marry the mistress of the king and sings a justly admired song, which he usually repeats. But there is only one Ferrando, the follower of the Count, who tells the story of the good di Luna to "chase the slumber from the heavy eyelids" of the servants. The real Ferrando should look as though he might begin a story, "When I was a pirate." In the palmy days of Italian opera he wore a superb slouch hat and his belt was full of assorted knives and daggers. There should be a swagger in his walk; his voice should be cavernous and slightly bronchial, as though he were the victim of night air; a man accustomed to fearsome deeds, one that would gladly apply the torch to Azucena. But this follower of Monday wore a helmet and he was a compound of Marcel and the Priest in "Aïda," and he sang pontifically and as though he led an exemplary life and looked after his throat.

The performance was better than could have been reasonably expected. The tenor, Mr. Tallman, has an excellent voice, clear, free, virile, alternately lyric or heroic I am told he came from Chicago by way of New York. He phrased well and he sang with dramatic as well as musical intelligence. His personality is pleasing, and experience will no doubt give him greater ease in actio

Miss Lane was the Leonora, Mr. Murray the Count Miss Ladd, Azucena. The chorus was generally effe and the orchestra was generally under the control of Winne.

The small theatre was packed with a most applaiv audience, which was made up of musicians, as well as scribers to the Grau Company, concert-goers and th goers, who are not conspicuously fond of music. Aria ensemble numbers were alike applauded, and there many encores. To-morrow "Iolanthe" will be given

There was no concert last week with the exception song recital given by Whitney Tew, the basso, who i duced Liza Lehmann's "In Memoriam," a cycle of exc from Tennyson's poem.

There was once an Englishman named Richard Sim who set all of Shakespeare's sonnets to music, and afte death Mrs. George A. Macfarren saw to it that some published. I have never seen them; I have never kn man or woman that has sung them. Whatever Mr. S son's understanding of these much discussed poems, v George Moore once professed to prefer to the plays—b is such an unconscious humorist!—I should not like to them for the stretch of three-quarters of an hour cycle, whether it be written by Beethoven, Schu Brahms, Von Fielitz, is boresome even when indiv songs are of rare merit. Liza Lehmann was first know this country as the composer of "In a Persian Gar which was supposed for a season or two to furnish a to the poem of Omar-Fitzgerald, and at the same tim furnish an opportunity for respectable persons to enj tincture of diluted blasphemy. I once in a Western heard a young man with an exceedingly high collar, otherwise of Byronic appearance, sing the tenor solo other extracts from the "Garden," and I was told by neighbor that he sang most appreciatively, "because—it very sad—because he was inclined toward atheism." T are some meretriciously pretty things in this "Garden," the music is no more in the vein than are the pictures signed by Elihu Vedder. There is this difference: Ve has wild and genuine imagination, while the English poser sees Persia from the front window of a subu villa.

Her "In Memoriam" has the greatest of faults—it is She tries hard to be effective; she experiments consta but, like one frightened, she seeks refuge in certain ph that are dinned out over and over again. Perhaps the cerpts that she chose are not well adapted to music. not think they are; neither are the finest poems of S burne, but they are not dull even when they are elegaic or mystical. The cycle is weak, melodically harmonically. There is no authoritative stroke, there i irresistible cry of distress or entreaty, there is no se thought of consolation.

Mr. Tew also sang Charles Wood's "Ethiopia Saluting the Colors" and "O Captain! My Captain!" Plu Greene sang the "Ethiopia" here in 1899.

Is there any Whitman catalogue?

Some years ago F. L. Ritter wrote melodramatic m for the recitation of "Dirge for Two Veterans."

There is Villiers Stanford's "Elegaic Ode" (18 which contains the beautiful "Come, lovely and soot Death."

Charles Wood (born in Ireland in 1866), after wri incidental music to two plays by Euripides, and set Shelley's "Ode to the West Wind" and Swinburne's " to Music," turned his attention to Whitman.

William Henry Bell wrote a symphony in C mi "Walt Whitman," which was produced at the Crystal ace March 10, 1900. The symphony bears the title My Own Folk." Among the movements are an e and a burleska.

Edgar Stillman Kelley has set "O Captain! My C tain!" for four voices; and a setting of "Weave in, audiences are small in Chickering Hall. The lectures he Lowell Institute are on German song writers, not Wagner.

But when 'Tristan' or 'Siegfried' is produced there, an almost ideal cast, everybody goes to the Kneisel artet." Mr. Finck has written this statement many s, and he no doubt believes it. He reminds me of Dick, with his head of Charles the First. Whether Finck discusses the superiority of Gounod's orato-over "The Messiah" or "Elijah" or dismisses mod-French song writers without mentioning Fauré or ussy, there is always before his eyes the awful ap-tion of "Siegfried" neglected by the Bostonians.
one occasion when "Siegfried" was sung in Mechan-Building, with Jean de Reszké as the hero, there was mparatively small audience. The opera on other oc-ons has always drawn well, and so has "Tristan." At last performance of "Tristan" in this city last season
dreds were turned away.
Mr. Finck was vexed because Mr. Gericke's version st of the Phrygian worship of Cybele.

fter Mr. Armbruster is through with his lectures on gner would he consider a course of lectures on Verdi his works?
do not mean a course in which slavish attention is merely the "three styles" of the composer, for the of Verdi was one of constant development; but lec-s explanatory of libretto, music, and ethical as well esthetic purpose. Examination papers would test the intelligence and the memory of the hearer. They might be drawn up after this manner:

"Ernani."—(1) Is the horn to be taken symbolically or literally and would you conclude that Ernani and Donna Elvira had been married? (2) Describe the old man's picture gallery and give all instances known to you of pictures used in opera. (3) Why is Castilian honor like Castilian soap?

"Il Trovatore."—(1) Give some account of the parents of Leonora. (2) To whom did the Palace of Aliaferia belong—Leonora or the Count di Luna? (3) Why was Manrico called the Troubadour and was he of kin to "Gaily the Troubadour"? (4) Should electricity be used in the Anvil chorus and how many firemen appeared in this chorus at the Peace Jubilee in Boston? Do firemen keep better time in striking than union musicians? (5) What is the meaning of "Here is the tower where the state prisoners groan"? The tower is at the angle of a wing of the palace of Aliaferia. Was it the custom for the jailer to release tenors that they might respond to an encore? (6) Name the precise form of death administered to Manrico and give in a few words an account of the last years of the Count di Luna.

"Un Ballo in Maschera."—(1) Give the year in which Richard, Count of Warwick, became Governor of Boston, Mass. (2) Was Renato, a Creole, allowed in the leading hotels? (3) Give the full names of Samuel and Tommaso, those stern old descendants of the Pilgrims. (4) How were masked balls regarded by the citizens at large. (5) Quote from a contemporaneous account of the stabbing affair published in the Evening Transcript.

"La Traviata."—(1) What was the game played in the third act? (2) Would it have been proper for any gentleman present to have helped himself to the money thrown so rudely by Alfredo at Violetta? (3) Where did the Doctor get his degree? (4) Might not a closer student have saved Violetta? (5) Is a tendency toward coloratura necessarily a symptom of vice? (6) Compare the characters of Violetta and Elsa.

These questions are as important as many I have read in pamphlets by hysterical Wagnerites. By the way, has anyone determined positively how long Siegfried was with Brünnhilde on the mountain from the time of deliverance to farewell? From the performances I have seen he was there long enough to raise a full beard. Was it a habit of the Hunding family to sup? or was the abstinence on that evening in "Die Walküre" due wholly to Siegmund's loquaciousness? Mr. Runciman is always insisting that Wotan is the hero of "The Ring." I am inclined to believe that Hunding is the hero, the unlucky Hunding, as unlucky as Murad or Romeo. Sieglinde was never a good wife to him—and if she had fondled him a little he would have trimmed his hair and washed himself. Sieglinde was probably a poor provider. She went about mooning; she doped her husband and threw herself into the arms of the first stranger with a plausible story. Even after Hunding's righteous vengeance the people in the sky did not let him live—a melancholy, dismal figure, but never a bore. And where did the Flying Dutchman get that chest full of money and jewels, doubloons, pieces of eight, altar furniture? At the last performance of the Trilogy in Boston Wotan, in "Die Walküre," was shy in his left eye; in "Siegfried," as the Wanderer, he was shy in his right eye. Was this in the true Wagnerian spirit? Had he obtained from Erda the power of shifting the good eye? I wish that Mr. Armbruster would give a supplementary lecture to make these things clear.

Vittorio Carpi.—The date of Mr. Carpi's recital is November 29, in the evening, at Mendelssohn Hall.

THE PEOPLE'S SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

THE People's Symphony Concerts, which were so successfully inaugurated and carried out last year at Cooper Union, with F. X. Arens as conductor, and which were recognized as an important educational factor, are to be continued this season under more favorable conditions. The following dates have been arranged for the concerts, which are given with the co-operation of the People's Institute, the University Extension Society, and the University Settlement Society; December 13, 1901, and January 17, February 21, March 21 and April 18, 1902, at Cooper Union Hall, with a supplementary concert at Carnegie Hall.

The purpose of these concerts is to present an opportunity to students, wage workers and the people generally of hearing music of the highest order at prices within their means, the rates of admission being from 10 to 50 cents for single concerts, and from 5 to 25 cents for the entire season. As was the case last year, Mr. Arens will have under his direction an orchestra of forty-five performers carefully selected from the best musicians of the city, while vocal assistance will be given by eminent artists. The programs will be drawn from the works of the best composers, and in their general scope will be fully equal to those of the more pretentious concerts offered in the uptown halls.

In connection with the announcements of these People's Concerts, it will be of interest to the public to know that a society has been organized for the purpose of placing the enterprise on a permanent basis. The Hon. John G. Carlisle, ex-Secretary of the Treasury, is the treasurer of the organization; Lucien J. Chaffin, the secretary, and Miss Nora Godwin, Mrs. Gilbert Jones, Albert Stettheimer and J. Eugene Whitney, the executive committee, with Severo Mallet-Prevost as chairman. The advisory committee includes some fifty of the most prominent men and women in the financial and social circles of the city. An effort is to be made to raise a permanent fund of $100,000, the interest of which is to be employed in meeting the expenses of a series of annual concerts. The office of the secretary of the organization is at No. 26 East Twenty-third street.

Harry J. Fellows.

HARRY J. FELLOWS, the popular tenor, now touring with Leonora Jackson, wins ovations wherever he appears. The following are brief extracts from recent concert notices:

Mr. Fellows won his audience from the start. But few have ever gained such favor here.—South Bend (Ind.) Daily Times.

He sings with musicianly feeling and artistic taste. He was recalled enthusiastically after each of his numbers and, obliged to give encores.—Fort Wayne (Ind.) Journal-Gazette.

Mr. Fellows rendered all his numbers in a manner which made him one with his audience at once, and he was a great favorite. He responded to several encores, one being especially taking, "When I'm Big I'll Be a Soldier."—Saginaw (Mich.) Courier-Herald.

He completely captivated the audience. His voice is of a clear, resonant timbre and under perfect control.—Albion (Mich.) Daily News.

He was very popular, as the spontaneous applause which greeted every number indicated. His voice is smooth, powerful, even and shows high cultivation.—Elyria (Ohio) Daily Chronicle.

The tenor was superb.—Tiffin (Ohio) Daily Advertiser.

Signor A. Buzzi-Peccia.—Signor A. Buzzi-Peccia, the eminent voice teacher, has removed his studio to No. 683 Lexington avenue, where he will be pleased to receive his pupils.

HOTEL BELLEVUE,

BOSTON, November 9, 1901.

THE announcement that Miss Aagot Lunde will soon remove to New York, where she will make her home for the future, will be a matter of surprise and regret to her many friends and acquaintances in this city. During the time that Miss Lunde has lived in Boston she has become well known both in musical and social circles, where she has achieved a larger measure of success than many others. At the moment Miss Lunde's plans are about as follows: Early in December she will give a farewell concert in Boston at Steinert Hall, and immediately after leave for New York, where she will give a concert about the middle of December. During the season she will sing at public recitals and concerts, as well as in private drawing rooms, in and about New York city, and early in the spring leaves for Europe, where a concert tour of Norway, Denmark and Sweden is being arranged for. Miss Lunde is well known as a singer in Europe, her many flattering press notices testifying to her position in the musical world of that continent. In her professional career Miss Lunde will be under the management of Mrs. Knupfel, the European tour also being under that lady's auspices. While regretting her absence from this city, her friends should congratulate Miss Lunde upon the prospect of a successful professional career.

On Monday evening a reception was given at the studio of Arthur J. Hubbard to Miss Ruby Cutter upon the eve of her sailing for Europe. Many of her fellow students were present, as well as other friends and acquaintances, and the evening was greatly enjoyed, as it gave the opportunity of hearing Miss Cutter sing once more. Miss Cutter will go almost directly to Paris, where she expects to study with the ultimate intention of appearing in opera, but has made no decision as to a teacher until her arrival in that city.

All who have heard Miss Cutter sing remember with pleasure the exceptionally brilliant voice, the ease and charm with which she uses it and the modest manner with which she receives the highly complimentary encomiums for her work.

Hearty wishes for a happy and brilliant future were extended by all her friends, who reluctantly said "good-bye" to her.

Mme. Caroline Gardner Clarke announces three musical afternoons, to be given at her residence, 1070 Beacon street, on Monday, November 25; Tuesday, December 3, and Tuesday, December 17, at 3 o'clock.

At the first Madame Clarke will be assisted by Mme. Helen Hopekirk, Charles Joseph Dyer, of New York; Sol Marcosson, violinist, and Mrs. J. E. Tippett, accompanist. Madame Hopekirk will accompany her own songs.

The second will include "Catrina," a pastel in music; "Fêtes Galantes," a series of poems by Paul Verlaine, in French, and "Sketches with Musical Programism," by Edwin Star Belknap and Harvey Worthington Loomis, of New York. Songs composed by Miss Harriet A. Shaw will be sung by Madame Clarke, with harp accompaniment by the composer.

At the third Madame Clarke will be assisted by J. Hoffmann, first violin; J. Theodorowicz, second violin; F. Zahn, viola; C. Barth, 'cello; G. Gerhardt, double bass, and E. N. L'Africain, cornet, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A feature of this program will be the rendering of three poems by Tennyson, with an instrumental accompaniment—"Blow, Bugle, Blow!" "Ask Me No More" and "O, Swallow, Swallow!" Other assisting artists will be announced on the programs.

Mrs. Hunt, pupil of Mme. Gertrude Franklin-Salisbury, will give a concert at Chickering Hall, Tremont street, on the afternoon of December 4.

Miss Edith Torrey's pupil, Miss Josephine Morrisey, gave a program of songs at Miss Torrey's music room on November 4. Songs by Moir, Hawley, Beach, Cowen, Hans Schmidt and others were given with well poised voice and good taste.

Miss Mazie V. Hastings, pupil of Bruce W. Hobbs, was one of the soloists at the concert given for the benefit of the Abington Public Library on October 30. Miss Hastings was highly complimented for the marked improvement she has made under Mr. Hobbs' teaching, and it has been arranged that she will be heard at one of the large Boston clubs during the winter.

Bruce W. Hobbs was one of the soloists in "The Persian Garden," at the Second Church last Friday evening, the others of the quartet being Miss Miller, Mrs. Brooks and Mr. Phillips. Mr. Tucker was at the piano.

Five little tone pictures, with words by C. W. Krogmann, have just been published by the B. F. Wood Company. They are "The Raindrops," "Two Little Honey Bees," "The Ninepin Regiment," "The Cricket" and "Good-night." The music is bright and capitally suited to the words—just such songs as children love to sing.

Mrs. Anne Gilbreth Cross gave one of her delightful talks on the music of the different nations at the Hotel Vendome before the Abbot Academy Club on last Saturday afternoon. On this occasion her subject was Norwegian music, and the lecture was illustrated by a small string orchestra, violin solos and songs. Mrs. Cross' afternoons with this club last winter made everyone anxious to hear her again; the result was a large attendance of members with guests.

On the evening of November 12 Miss Marie L. Everett will give a song recital at her apartment. The program will be a fine one and will serve to introduce two pupils who have never appeared on any program before, all their studies having been under Miss Everett. Miss Everett will also give a song recital in Worcester on the evening of November 14.

James W. Hill, organist and pianist, is having an unusually busy season. In September he gave organ recitals in Hampstead and Haverhill, and on November 5 on the fine new organ at Phillips Church, Exeter, when he was assisted by Frederic Martin, both artists making a great success. Mr. Hill has three recitals in Haverhill, November 14, December 5 and 19. The following artists will assist at these recitals: Miss Adelaide Griggs, Mr. Van Vliet, Miss Shorrock, Stephen Townsend, Karl Ondricek and others. During the season Mr. Hill will give organ recitals in Lawrence, Lowell and several of e Maine cities.

Heinrich Schuecker will play a Fantaisie, op. 89, y Alvars; Mazurka and "Wiegenlied," by E. Schuec and Gounod's "Spring Song" at Miss Woltmann's cital on November 20.

Pupils of the Faelten Pianoforte School appeared in a cital in Huntington Chambers Hall last evening befor a large and enthusiastic audience, and played a very in esting program in a manner which reflected great cr upon their instructors. Those who took part were: Ed H. Jose, Jr., Cambridge; Alice Constable, Milton; Gla Adella Copeland, Melrose Highlands; Lucy Lee Coll Brookline; Anna Faelten, Roxbury; Miss Anna C. H nett, Jamaica Plain; Miss Estelle B. Heineman, Mer Wis.; Miss Emilie Jenks Bray, Medford, and Miss Ina Edgerton, Greenwich, N. Y., besides those who playe the ensemble numbers.

The competition for the free scholarships of the Sc of Opera, under Signor Bimboni, at the New England C servatory of Music, has resulted in the awarding of prizes to Miss Mabel Shanaway, of Boston, and M Clara Sexton, of Springfield. The prize consists of a y of free instruction under Signor Bimboni and other structors in the School of Opera. The judges were Di tor G. W. Chadwick, Signor Bimboni and Prof. Wal Goodrich. There were twenty competitors.

Portions of J. Varley Roberts' sacred cantata, "Jon were sung by the quartet choir at Harvard Church, Bro line, last week. The selections were as follows: Sopr solo, "Sing, O Daughter of Zion"; bass recitative and a "Whither Shall I Go from Thy Spirit?"; quartet, " Lord Hath Taken Pleasure"; contralto solo, "The Lor Full of Compassion; prayer response; quartet, "Ble Are the Merciful."

he series of concerts which have been given for the six years under the auspices of Yale University will ontinued this year by the New Haven Symphony Or- tra, under the leadership of Edgar Stillman Kelley, who is taking Professor Parker's place in the school of music.

A large company of guests enjoyed a musicale October 30 at the home of Mrs. A. M. Voorhis, Broadway, Nyack, N. Y. The program was given by the pupils of Miss Mary Riker, under her direction, assisted by Frank Angus, tenor.

The first song recital in Saginaw, Mich., was given by Miss Ella Morris Jones, soprano, assisted by Herbert Milliken, violinist; Mrs. H. C. Barnes, pianist, and Mrs. H. B. Burdick, accompanist, at the Germain Temple of Music the end of last month.

The Conservatory of Music connected with the Troy Seminary gave a concert at Troy Association Hall on October 31. An excellent program was presented by Christian A. Stein, Robert E. Foote, Thomas Impett, Miss Olive Pulis, James McLaughlin, Jr., and Allan Lindsay.

The first of the series of three salon concerts to be given this season by Mrs. Evelyn Choate, pianist, Miss Bertha Bucklin, violinist, and Miss Lillian Littlehales, 'cellist, was given on October 29 at the residence of Mrs. Eugene B. McClelland, 308 McBride street, Syracuse, N. Y.

The first concert of the musical season at Williamsport, Pa., was given at Association Hall on October 28, under the management of H. S. Krape. Miss Mary Hallock, pianist, and Harry C. Saylor, baritone, were the soloists. The Haydn String Quartet played, and Miss Edith S. Reider was the piano accompanist.

In the series of concerts which were given at the Atlanta, Ga., fair under the auspices of the music committee of the State Federation many local artists appeared. One of the concerts was conducted by Miss Rose White Steinhagen. The soloists were Mrs. Mary F. O'Brien, J. M. Marshbank, Miss Theodora Morgan, Miss Linnie Blosser, Miss Westmoreland and Miss Steinhagen.

G. Sauvlet gave a piano recital on the evening of October 24 at the Presbyterian Church, El Paso, Tex., which proved a musical treat to art lovers in that place. He played a number of his own compositions, and Chopin, Paderewski and Scharwenka were included in his program. The pianist had the assistance of two local singers, Miss Anne Martin and Miss Lelia Trumbull.

Wenham Smith gave the inaugural recital on the rebuilt three manual organ in St. Columba's Catholic Church, Newark, N. J., Sunday evening, November 10, assisted by Miss Kathrin Hilke, soprano, and Miss Ethel Cecilia Smith, violinist. He is also engaged to open the new organ in the Methodist Church, Belleville, Thanksgiving night, November 28, and the new three manual electric organ in the Second Presbyterian Church, Elizabeth.

At the Westminster Presbyterian Church, Broad and Fitzwater streets, Philadelphia, on Sunday morning, November 3, Myers F. Hall, organist, was assisted by Miss Josephine Leone Rhoades. Official organist of the National Export Exposition (1889), solo organist for Innes and his band, the Carlisle Indian Band and the Damrosch Orchestra, Mr. Hall is rapidly becoming well known throughout the States, and deserves praise for his commendable work. Miss Rhoades sang the slumber song, "Sleep Thou, My Son." by Piccolomini, with simplicity and care.

MUSICAL CLUBS.

The Mount Vernon (N. Y.) Musical Society will open its season December 13 with Mendelssohn's "Elijah."

The Musical Club of Richmond, Ind., presented at its last meeting a fine Schumann and Schubert program.

Mrs. J. H. Webster, president of the National Federation of Women's Musical Clubs, will spend the winter in Germany.

The Ladies' Musical Club, of Galveston, Tex., has engaged Madame Schumann-Heink as soloist for a concert in December.

Mme. Charlotte Maconda will be the soloist at a special concert December 2, arranged by the Ladies' Matinee Musicale, of Spokane, Wash.

A new oratorio society has been organized at Honolulu, Hawaii, and Händel's "Messiah" will be the first work for consideration at the rehearsals.

The Cecilia Club at Waterville, Me., has organized for this season's work with the following officers: Prof. C. B. Stetson, of Colby College, was re-elected president; Principal F. W. Johnson, of the Coburn Classical Institute, vice-president; Joseph H. Murray, of Fairfield, secretary.

The Music Study Club organized this autumn at Cortland, N. Y., by W. E. Chamberlain with eight members, has now a membership of thirty-eight. The growth of the new club is due mainly to Mr. Chamberlain's able efforts. Excellent programs are being planned for the meetings and musicales.

The Arion Club, of Providence, R. I., will present Verdi's Requiem November 19, with Miss Effie Stewart, Miss Rosemarie Campbell, Ellison Van Hoose and Andreas Schneider as the soloists. Jules Jordan will conduct. At the second concert of the season the club will sing Verdi's "Aïda" in concert form. At the third concert Gounod's "Redemption" will be sung.

The members of the South Paris, Me., Musical Festival Chorus have elected the following new officers: President, Mrs. James S. Wright; Miss Sue Wheeler, secretary, and Miss Grace Thayer, treasurer. The executive committee includes Mrs. John Emeley, Mrs. Lula Smiley, Mrs. I. F. Barnes, Hal R. Eaton, Mrs. Annie Fletcher and Miss Hattie Leach. Mrs. George Briggs will be director this year.

The Matinee Musicale, of Lincoln, Neb., has entered upon what promises to be a very successful season. The first program by the members of the club was given October 21, the chief number being Nevin's song cycle, "Captive Memories." The first artists' recital under the auspices of the club took place on the evening of October 29, when Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler aroused the audience to a degree of enthusiasm unparalleled.

ANDREW CARNEGIE, who is the first Rector of St. Andrews University, Scotland, is at the same time President of the New York Philharmonic Society. Millionaires are apt to mix up conditions.

WILLIAM CASTELMAN, the American tenor, has made a success in opera at Algiers, Africa, but they claim that his French accent is too dark and that it is also Anglo-Saxon. What do they want in Africa?

AN out of town friend asks us what the time limit of a concert should be. It is our opinion that all concerts and recitals should begin at the advertised hour. Song recitals given by one singer, without assisting artists, should not last over one hour. One hour and a half is quite long enough for a piano recital. Indeed, too long sometimes. No orchestral concert should endure for more than two hours, and that allowing for an intermission of ten to fifteen minutes.

ANOTHER important triumph has been achieved by pianos of American make in Europe, and this time it is the Mason & Hamlin grand, just used in a successful tour by Harold Bauer through Holland. After artistic triumphs here Mr. Harold Bauer follows them up with similar successes in Holland, using the same piano—the American made Mason & Hamlin. It must also be remembered that the production of the Mason & Hamlin piano is an artistic result, not a commercial one purely, and that it therefore counts for vastly more than the merely mercantile successes of American products abroad.

ANDREW CARNEGIE, who is in Pittsburg this week laying plans for the great technical institute he is about to endow, declared in one speech: "If Shakespeare and Wagner, the mountain peaks of literature and music, were taken out of my life it would be poor indeed."

If there were more millionaires who craved culture what a boon it would be to art! The majority of rich men buy books as they do other furniture. They never read them and hence do not enjoy literature. The same men go to the opera, but that is only an incident in the hours of social life. They do not enjoy music any more than they do books.

THE newly elected Mayor of San Francisco, Eugene E. Schmitz, is a violinist and until recently was leader of a theatre orchestra in the City of the Golden Gate. Both the father and uncle of Mr. Schmitz are musicians and he received his musical training at home. His father, a German, was a pioneer in the building up of San Francisco. The mother of the new mayor was Irish. A number of other interesting musical features were introduced during the recent campaign in New York. The day after the election Justice Jerome, the District Attorney-elect, entertained his friends, who called to congratulate him at his country home, with an organ recital. Jerome is an accomplished musician.

THE following paragraph from the London Standard is old, yet still goes the rounds of the press:

"The skull of Mozart, which, since the death of Professor Hyrtl, who kept it in his house, has been transferred from one place to another, has now found its final home in the museum at Salzburg. The relic was handed over on Sunday last, with all the solemnity befitting the occasion. An attempt was made some time ago to substitute another skull as that of Mozart's for the one preserved by Professor Hyrtl, but the fraud was discovered, upon which, in some mysterious way, the spurious skull disappeared and the genuine one was restored to its place. Every care will be taken at the Salzburg Museum of what is the only known portion that is left of the great composer's remains. The place of his grave is forgotten, and even for the authenticity of the skull there is only the evidence of a gravedigger, an engraver and the late Professor Hyrtl."

What Mozart skull is this? Not the skull of the composer Mozart. What antiquarian fairy tale is this?

A LETTER from Weber to Meyerbeer has been published, which shows how he was treated by his publisher. He received for "Der Freischütz" the sum of 220 thalers for all right of reproduction, arrangements, &c., reserving only the performing rights. It has been calculated that the sale of the overture alone brought into the cash box of the lucky publisher 100,000 thalers. In 1824 Moritz Schlesinger proposed to Weber's widow to give the sum of 1,000 thalers for a new edition of his five operas, but claiming also the delivery of the autograph scores. This last condition prevented the bargain being concluded. The performing rights of "Der Freischütz" did not exceed 4,000 thalers; the Royal Opera of Berlin, to which the first hundred performances of the work in Weber's lifetime brought 90,000 thalers, paid the author only 600 thalers. At that time the author had no performing rights and the theatres purchased their rights in a lump at easy prices. These were the "good old times."

AS long as there remain people who are willing to pay to hear singers whose names are famous and foreign, such pitiful exhibitions as the one which took place at Carnegie Hall last Friday afternoon are apt to occur.

There are hundreds of young American singers with fine voices and talent who cannot get a decent for their efforts because managers won't take them up, but let comes a well-known lady from Germany, who has been before the public for years and her manager has the effrontery to charge admission, and there are some people silly enough to pay to hear her.

HOW SAD.

Does not Madame Lehmann know better than to lay herself open to ridicule, or does she really think that artistic powers are still at her command? It is hardly possible that she cannot realize the vast difference between what she was and what is now remaining of her art. Again—can it be possible that this community anyone will believe that the applause of her audience was sincere on last Friday or is a New York audience so unmusical in the midst of all the opportunities to hear and see?

At the outset of the musical season it is discouraging to have to chronicle the fiasco which a once esteemed artist permitted herself to walk into. In another column will be found the criticism of this affair.

A COMMITTEE for erecting a Lortzing monument has been formed in Berlin. Subscriptions will be received by the president of the Allgemeinen Deutschen Musik Verbandes, Herr Ernst Vogel, Berlin, S. W., Besselstrasse 20.

Lortzing's memory has been celebrated by a Lortzing week at the Leipsic City Theatre, and its example will be followed at Vienna. Moreover, two volumes of his unpublished and forgotten works will be published by the Lortzing student, Georg R. Kruse, and other celebrations of the centenary of the birthday of the artist to which the German operatic stage owes so much have been held or are planned. "But," asks M. Stern, "is it not being overdone?" Without at all underrating the merits of Lortzing that gentleman thinks that the pendulum that swung too far in one dir-

while the artist was alive is now swinging too in the opposite direction. "When we compare figures of the season 1899-1900 and find that zart is represented by 5 operas and 500 pernances and Lortzing by 4 operas, with 600 pernances, we must confess that the composer of ir and Zimmermann' does not deserve to be ed before Mozart, and that he has only attained place because his operas make less claims on ience and artist than those of Mozart."
ome other things Herr M. Steuer wants to have e explanation about. In musical history and ical criticism Lortzing's romantic opera, "Un-," is regarded as his weakest work. How comes ien that in these days the "half failure" "Un-
" holds the first place, with 180 performances,
e "Czar and Zimmermann" and "Wildschütz"
167 and 105 respectively? How comes it that "Waffenschmied" stands higher in the public r than the "Wildschütz," and that the pretty iden Schützen," with nine performances, seems ave fallen into rank disfavor?

n the occasion of the Pyrmont festival there was lished a volume of the sentiments of living art-Here are some of them. Otto Lessmann es: "To reckon Lortzing among the really t names of music, as has been done several s, I regard as a great misapprehension of his ts and abilities." Humperdinck writes: "With-agreeing with that exaggerated cultus which out much reserve places Lortzing on a level the first artistic appearances, &c." Weinner writes: "I regard Lortzing's 'Wildschütz'

His other operas appear to me already to felt the tooth of time." Robert Radecke's dpoint is the juste milieu: "Lortzing was a of eminent talent in the field of comic German a; for the romantic opera his talent was not cient; in fact, he displays a good deal of what ilettante in his work, and this arises from the that he lacked regular study. Still his talent of ntion comes to the front and covers the weak-of the workmanship."
conclusion Herr Steuer hints that the Lortzcult is a revolt from too much Wagner. "If it vs that we cannot live by 'Tristan' alone it will done its duty. But we must not forget that e are still Auber, Boieldieu, Donizetti and rs."

A GOOD deal has been written of the master's deafness, but little has been said of his sight. The Beethoven home at Bonn, among a lot of truck, pens, scissors, visiting cards and the like, a pair of spectacles. About his shortsightedness Schindler in his biography says little, but Gerhard von Breuning, who saw him often in the last years of his life, expressly says that he wore a double glass, with a ribbon round his neck, in the street, elsewhere he used a monocle. Usually, however, he did not wear spectacles. All the accounts of his piercing glance, the vivid expression of his eyes, prevent us from supposing that he usually wore them, and, it may be added in confirmation, that there is no representation of him with such glasses to vision. But as a pair is lying with other objects we may conjecture that he used them when reading and writing down his compositions. These glasses were never examined till lately. The character of his extremely fine music script, such as is seen in his autograph of the "Moonlight Sonata," shows that he was shortsighted and wore concave glasses. To what extent he was so cannot be determined. In a letter dated August 2, 1823, two years before his death, he wrote: "Excessive work and with it over two months' trouble with my eyes, which are not yet quite well, prevented me," &c. Grillparzer, who met him in 1805, describes him as follows: "Beethoven was thin, dark, and, contrary to his later habit, very elegantly dressed and wore spectacles, which I remarked particularly because in later years he never used these aids to weak sight." To this Frimmel adds in a note that Beethoven wore glasses as late as 1817. His eyes were brown.

WAS BEETHOVEN SHORTSIGHTED?

LILLI LEHMANN is writing a book. She told a Sun interviewer all about it. "Most prima donnas have somebody else to write their books," she declared with all the charitable delicacy of a true Wagner interpreter. Her remarks about the friendship that Richard Wagner bore her mother reveals the most charming tact. Her consideration for fellow-singers in the Wagnerian vineyard is evidenced by the following extract from the above interview, which appeared in last Sunday's Sun:

A VERSATILE VEGETARIAN.

"Now the Prince Regent's Theatre in Munich is to attempt to rival the Bayreuth Theatre in the performance of the Wagner operas. I cannot see that either of these theatres will have any effect on the other. Strangers who go to Bayreuth will also go to Munich and vice versa.

"If either theatre suffers it will not be Bayreuth's. Madame Wagner may be the absolute ruler at Bayreuth to-day and that may not be the best thing for the performances; but she at least attempts to get the best singers in Germany. That Ernst Possart, the director at Munich, will never do.

"He is a stingy impresario and will not pay artists, and will not get them to sing for nothing even though it be at the great Prince Regent's Theatre. This year he was only willing to pay 300 marks for the Isolde in his performances of that opera.

"I declined the proposition that he made to me as the amount was absurd. Now that will not do for more than a year or two. Then the public will see that good artists are not to be engaged there and stay away. No. Bayreuth will never suffer from the rivalry of Munich. Siegfried Wagner's latest opera was not a success. I never had the opportunity to hear it, as it was sung in but few cities. The first one really had some genuine success, although it seems incredible that a man who had prepared himself for another profession should suddenly devote himself to music with practically no preparation for it.

"And the fact that he also writes the text of his operas, poor as it is, is astonishing enough. The family physician at Bayreuth told me that in the school Siegfried could not write an ordinary German sentence correctly.

In all these sweet-tempered remarks we find one item of interest—Lehmann was offered the correct amount for her services. No wonder she prefers America, where the daily papers hail her as the only living lieder singer—how about Nordica and Sembrich?—and a gullible public actually pays to hear a woman whose voice has vanished! As a matter of record Von Possart paid his Isoldes much more than 300 marks a performance. When Lehmann, or her secretary, approached Von Possart he was embarrassed. He had once admired Lehmann, as we all had, years ago, but would not dared to have engaged her for the Munich season. So he temporized—he offered a low compensation, thus disengaging himself from a trying position.

Munich is in high feather just now over the fact that the $60,000 receipts of the opera season at the Prinz Regenten Theatre not only cover all expenses but even pay the Wagner heirs royalties amounting to $200 a performance. All the costs for mounting four operas are defrayed, though Bayreuth had a deficit of 80,000 marks. So Madame Lehmann's spiteful comments on Von Possart's "stinginess" do not hold water. Besides, the lady lives in a glass house of her own devising in the matter of nearness—to use a good S word. According to a friend, now dece still wearing her old operatic wardro tights included. This, if it be economical gifts of Salvini and In the matter of the veget prevention of cruelty to Lehmann is only seeking to emulate the late R. Wagner, of Bayreuth. She has declared her intention of leaving her property to the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. Would that she could remember the object of this society when she sings in public.

ONCE in a while we read in the daily papers that the musical program played at the church wedding was arranged by the bride herself, who at certain rare intervals happens to be a musician and woman of taste. There is need of reform in this matter as in many others along the line of musical endeavor. Long ago the superstitious bride forbade the organist to play that hackneyed, threadbare bridal chorus from "Lohengrin," which some of the young society reporters on the daily press describe as the "Lohengrin Wedding March." But as the conventional brides outnumber the superstitious and thoughtful brides, we presume wedding guests must continue to be tortured with those maddening strains from Wagner's opera.

MUSIC AT THE MARRIAGE CEREMONY.

Now, the organist, poor man, is the one who can change all this, if he will. Let him tell the bride, if she insists on the Wagner music on entering and the Mendelssohn on going out, that the original wedding at which the bridal chorus was sung terminated unhappily. By all means tell the lady preparing to don the white satin, tulle veil and orange blossoms the story of Elsa von Brabant and Lohengrin, Knight of the Grail. Mendelssohn's "Wedding March," usually played as a recessional at church weddings, is appropriate music, it being, as well all of us know, from the "Midsummer Night" music, written when the composer was only seventeen years old. But even that becomes tiresome when it is played at every wedding where music is a feature.

While the organist may not succeed in persuading the bride to depart from the conventional bridal chorus and wedding march, he can, and should, be held responsible for the remainder of the musical program. As is the custom in the case of a church wedding, the organist plays while the ushers seat the guests. Brides are usually late, and so the guests who arrive in time must hear a concert. There are of course organists who play appropriate compositions for the place and occasion, but there are other men who show poor taste and a decided disregard for their art and the solemnity which should surround a church wedding. Once upon a time, and not many moons since, either, the writer witnessed a fashionable wedding in a Brooklyn church, where the organist played the usual bridal chorus, and added to the agony by playing very softly during t ceremony selections from "Cavalleria R As all readers of THE MUSICA this time this is a fierce litt libretto founded upon trayal.

STELLA MARIS.

BY J. A. SYMONDS.

Fair is the sea; and fair the sea-borne billow,
Blue from the depth and curled with crested argent.
Fair is the sea; and fair the smooth sea margent,
The brown dunes waved with tamarisk and willow.
Fair is the sea; and fair the seaman's daughter,
Fairer than all fair things in earth and ocean;
Fair is the sea; and fair the wayward motion,
The wavering glint of light on dancing water.
Fair is the sea; and fair the heavens above it,
And fair at ebb the grass-green wildernesses;
Fair is the sea; and fair the stars that love it,
Rising from waves new washed with Orient tresses.
Fair is the sea; of all fair sea things fairest,
Stella, thou sea-born star, art best and rarest.

DAUDET AS MUSIC CRITIC.

"THE entire work of Balzac pulsates with a fever of discovery and of impromptu." It was Alphonse Daudet, the little Hebraic David of the South, with "the head of an Arabian Christ," who wrote that sentence, a sentence which might be fitted aptly to his own case. Daudet loved Balzac, loved Beethoven, and—this may be a surprise for some—loved Wagner, knew Wagner. Why not? Style for him was a question of intensity and what was Wagner if not intense? And Daudet was no mean critic. He could recognize the unchanging moi of Hugo, and the miraculous gift of transforming himself, which gave to Balzac the power of multitudinous creation.

He could speak of Georges Rodenbach as "the most exquisite and refined of poets and prose writers, moist and dripping with his Flemish fogs, a writer whose sentence has the tender effect of belfries against the sky and the soft golden hue of reliquaries and stained glass windows." Friederich Nietzsche was "that admirable writer with a surprising power for destruction"; while in Ibsen's "Wild Duck" he found "the india rubber laugh, the [illegible] of Voltaire congealed by Pomeranian sleet." [illegible] of Dostoïewski's "Crime and Punish[illegible] his mind"; and for Tolstoy he [illegible] admiration. After Turge[illegible]nirs of his were pub[illegible]uisite unhappiness, [illegible]olled the artist [illegible] mystery by [illegible]n the offen[illegible]ous import, [illegible]ut the real[illegible]As I remem[illegible] that much [illegible]urts, Zola [illegible] this sim[illegible]ded him[illegible]n from [illegible] is ear," says this pious and admirable biographer, "had a delicacy and correctness most exquisite. Thence came his passion for music, which was an aid and assistance to his labors. He sits at his table in his workroom. My mother is at the piano in the next room and the music of Mozart, Beethoven, Schumann or Schubert follows, one after the other, and excites or calms the imagination of the writer." "Music is another planet." "I adore all music, the commonest as well as the loftiest." But no man could analyze and understand better the masters of harmony, no man lauded the genius of Wagner in more splendid terms or more brilliant images: "The conquest by Wagner and the philosophers."

Daudet often came home with wet eyes after a concert and we are told that his voice was delicate and penetrating when he hummed the tunes of Provence. His intimate musical friends were Raoul Pugno, the pianist, Bizet and Massenet. In later years Hahn, the "little Hahn," a composer of songs, often visited him and he dearly loved the mad music of the Hungarian gypsy orchestras. We all recall his fondness for the pastoral pipe and Valmajour, that thrice unhappy Valmajour urged in the pursuit of a hopeless fantastic love by an avaricious sister! I have often wondered who sat for the portrait of De Potter in "Sapho." It was possibly a composite of Gounod, Bizet and Massenet, though the conception of the love-stricken figure seems better to fit Gounod than the others. That Daudet's ear for verbal harmonies was of the finest there can be no doubt after reading this: "It seems that the phrase, as Chateaubriand uses it, has preserved the rhythm and movement of the sea; the rush of his crises comes from the furthest line of the horizon; their return is broad, quiet, majestic. Another example of sensitiveness to the period in writing, Gustave Flaubert, is the only one presenting, in the same degree as Chauteaubriand, that verbal wealth which gives a sensuous satisfaction to one's mind when reading."

Of Wagner he said: "Wagner was a phenomenon in this century just as he will be one in time to come, and no one is more fruitful than he in remarks of every sort. * * * He was a man belonging to another age. Nevertheless, he found a way to our nerves and our brains far more easily than one would have thought. If imagination has representatives, he was one of the giants. A Northern imagination, it is true, on which all the beauties and faults of the North have left their impress. He insists, he insists with violence and tenacity, he insists so pitilessly. He is afraid that we haven't understood. That language of motives which he has imagined, and of which he makes such magnificent use, has the fault of leaving us very often with an impression of weariness. * * * Still, it was absolutely necessary for him to invent that system of motives. * * * His characters seem clothed in sound. * * * In Richard Wagner the imagination is so representative that it saturates his work to overflowing with all sounds of nature, and leaves a limited space for episodes. The passion between Tristan and Isolde plunges into the tumult of the ocean which overwhelms it; then it appears on the surface, then it plunges under again. One invincible power raises the waves and the souls by a single movement. In the poem water, fire, the woods, the blossoming and mystic meadow, the holy spot become the more powerful characters. In this paganism of to-day all nature has become divine."

[illegible] pantheism never has been realized [illegible]r me his dramas deal with the ele[illegible]r than with men and women. [illegible]ognized this fact. Wagner [illegible]ancer says: "Your genera[illegible]ese splendors, this torrent of heroism and life, but you cannot present to yo[illegible] fancy the impression which that music exercised [illegible] men of my age. * * * There is everything [illegible] Wagner. * * * Turning his face toward Gay[illegible] he wrote the 'Meistersingers'; turning towa[illegible] Pain, Love, Death, the Mütter of Goethe, he wro[illegible] 'Tristan und Isolde.' He made use of the ent[illegible] human pianoforte and the entire superhuman [illegible] anoforte. Cries, tears, the distortion of despair, t[illegible] trickling of water over rocks, the sough of t[illegible] wind in the trees, frightful remorse, the song of t[illegible] shepherd and the trumpets of war—his tremendo[illegible] imagination is always at white heat and alwa[illegible] ready." Daudet wisely refuses to discuss Wagne[illegible] methods. "Let his methods remain in the da[illegible] like his orchestra. That imagination of his, fev[illegible] ish and excessive, has not only renovated mu[illegible] but has also overwhelmed poetry and philosop[illegible] Although theories disquiet me, still I feel th[illegible] trembling in Wagner behind each one of his hero[illegible] The gods talk of their destiny and of the conflict [illegible] that destiny with the destiny of men; they talk [illegible] ancient fate in a way that is sometimes obscu[illegible] but with a rush and a go that make one forget [illegible] question them. It is the famous wall of the 'Légen[illegible] des Siècles,' crowded with the tubas and the tru[illegible] pets of Sachs, tumultuous and glittering in th[illegible] mass."

"It is quite possible that Wagner desired to ha[illegible] characters of a size suitable to their surroundin[illegible] and that one would feel uncomfortable while c[illegible] sidering ordinary men who should be victims o[illegible] the Ocean of 'Tristan' or to the Forest of 'Si[illegible] fried.' What difference does it make? He s[illegible] ceeds in moving us with terrestial passions. [illegible] 'Tristan' humanity plays a larger part. These [illegible] our own wounds which are bleeding in the flesh [illegible] the lovers, wounds that the sacred spear, which [illegible] hero brings back with him, shall never heal." He [illegible] Daudet seems to have confused "Tristan" wi[illegible] "Parsifal," or else he has mixed his musical me[illegible] phors.

It will seem that these are the utterances o[illegible] man who has pondered music as well as deeply [illegible] has felt it. He knew Wagner and was a welco[illegible] visitor at Wahnfried. "Daudet pleases me [illegible] much," Wagner once said. The openly expres[illegible] admiration of this cultured Frenchman must h[illegible] flattered the composer greatly. Because Dau[illegible] admired Wagner his perception of Beethove[illegible] greatness was not blurred. He puts the case s[illegible] cinctly: "It were better to say that the masterpi[illegible] by Beethoven being more concentrated and clos[illegible] woven makes a total impression upon you i[illegible] much shorter time than does a drama with its n[illegible] cessary stops and changes of scenery and delays [illegible] explanation." This in answer to his son Lo[illegible] who had asserted that the emotions aroused b[illegible] Beethoven symphony include "a deeper and r[illegible] quality" than those evoked by the "Ring."

The elder Daudet finds that Wagner is sa[illegible] rated with nature and nature's sounds. "His [illegible] chestral parts cradle and swing me to and [illegible] His gentleness and power cause me to pass wi[illegible] a few hours through the most powerful emoti[illegible] emotions, in fact, for which no one can fail to [illegible] grateful forever to the man who has excited thr[illegible] because they reveal our inner depths to ourselv[illegible] I love and admire Beethoven also for the wide p[illegible] peaceful landscapes which he knows how to o[illegible] up in the soul of sound. Italian music ench[illegible] me, and in Rossini I experience that extraordin[illegible] impression of melancholy anguish which an ex[illegible] of life gives us. There is too much frenzy, [illegible] much movement; it is as if one were trying to[illegible] cape from death. I adore Mendelssohn and his[illegible] licious pictures of nature, the Scotch and Ita[illegible] Symphonies. There are certain hours toyr[illegible] nightfall when the soul of Schumann torm[illegible] me. * * * But to number them all would never end. I have lived through the power of sic; I am a dweller upon its planet." * * *

Now all this is quite satisfying when one realizes t Daudet in his love for music steps out of the ench literary tradition. French writers, even se of this century, have never been fanatics for sic, Stendhal excepted, and I can hardly com- nd his criticisms. Chateaubriand—"They all ne from Chateaubriand" boomed out the im- ial Goethe when asked about the Romantics of 32—Victor Hugo, Gautier, Alfred de Vigny—l ept Heine, as being a German—Charles Nodier, udelaire, De Musset, Flaubert, Dumas fils, the Goncourts—the brothers secretly abominated sic—Zola—this mixed company was not fond of sic. Catulle Mendès is a Wagnerian, and in his nescent way Paul Verlaine was affected by mel- y. He certainly wrote a subtle and magnificent m about "Parsifal." But perhaps it was what despiser of Kundry stood for, rather than gner's music, that set vibrating the verbal magic this "Chopin of the Gutter." Huysmans, of mish descent, has made a close if not sympa- tic study of church music and the old ecclesias- l modes.

How well Daudet understood that floating qual- , "the artistic temperament," may be seen in this se bit of analysis: "Neither sculptor nor painter presents anything which did not exist before in world. It is somewhat different in regard to sic. But, looking at things a little closer, music the lofty manifestation of a harmony, the mod- for which exist in nature. Nevertheless the ter, the painter, the sculptor and the musician, enever their work bears them honestly along, be- e honestly that they are adding to the world nething which did not exist before their time. blime illusion!" * * *

On this clear, critical note let us leave the de- ntful writer, once charming man. "Oh, Daudet, t de la bouillabaisse!" cries the author of "Evelyn nes." Yes, but is not bouillabaisse a fascinating h when a master chef has prepared it?

I. G. Wells contributes an article on "The Lit- ry Regimen" to the current English Illustrated gazine:

It is imperative," he says, "if you wish to write h any power and freshness at all, that you should rly ruin your digestion. Any literary person confirm this statement. At any cost the thing st be done, even if you have to live on German sage, onions and cheese to do it. So long as turn all your dietary to flesh and blood you get no literature out of it. 'We learn in suffer- what we teach in song.' This is why men who at home with their mothers, or have their elder ers to see after them, never, by any chance, how- r great their literary ambition may be, write any- g but minor poetry. They get their meals at ular hours, and done to a turn, and that plays very devil—if you will pardon the phrase—with 's imagination."

Theodore Thomas' concert season has begun in and his Chicago admirers, who are extremely erving, noted his new wig, says the Times. s reminded them of the story told about him few years ago. For many years Theodore omas, with his back to the audience, presented ood view of a shiny bald head. One night he eared in a becoming wig, an adornment that he worn ever since.

On his first appearance before his orchestra in wig Mr. Thomas was quite austere and stern ing the rehearsal. Walking to his music stand this occasion, he said:

Shentlemen, laugh vonce now, and laugh lt. That is all."

The members of the orchestra did not neglect their opportunity.

Toward the latter part of Rossetti's life he rarely left his house and garden. He depended upon a close circle of friends for society, and in his own way was a sociable man, but he preferred to see his friends and acquaintances by appointment, and woe betide the too intrusive stranger.

One day an enterprising man called who was duly armed with a letter of introduction, and the servant was nearly yielding to the impulsive stranger, whereupon the painter of "Dante's Dream" leaned over the banister and said, in firm, mellifluous voice: "Tell the gentleman that I am not at home."

The unexpected never happens. I did not hope to meet George Moore in Dublin. It was in Bayreuth, August 14, that I first saw him walking slowly down the Bahnhof Strasse, and it must be confessed not looking the other way when a pretty girl passed. But then there are not many pretty girls in that neat Bavarian town, so the famous author of "Evelyn Innes" and "Sister Teresa" was not sorely beset. After I made free of his gracious companionship I begged for an interview; not the stereotyped sort, but a mild unbosoming of the soul without the intervention of too many mechanical questions. The writer became wary. "I shall be glad to see you," he wrote, "and talk with you. I should like to tell you about the Irish language." I had read Mr. Archer's interview with Mr. Moore in the Pall Mall Magazine, and the invitation did not charm me, for I wanted to talk of George Moore—George Moore and the men and women of "Mike Fletcher," "A Modern Lover," "Confessions of a Young Man," "Mildred Lawson," "Esther Waters" and others of his fascinating books.

After the first act of "Parsifal" we met on the picturesque esplanade of the Wagner Theatre. A mob of melomaniacs moved slowly about, fatigued but happy because of the drugs Wagner had brewed for them in the long first act. Below, Bayreuth sprawled out on the fair landscape, and in the background wooded hills, punctured by an old Schloss, made a picture that may be seen only in Germany. Mr. Moore looked at me. I looked at Mr. Moore. I knew what he saw. This is what I saw: A tall, slender man, with sloping shoulders; narrow chested and with a long neck well covered by a high collar; the arms long, the feet listless and slow. On his head he wore a hat—even as you and I. It was a London make. His clothes, of unobtrusive cut and anxious rectitude, also looked English. Despite his Celtic sympathies, this writer still believes in British tailors. The shape of Mr. Moore's head is a lengthened oval. His mouth droops sadly at times. His eyes are pale blue, and darken when he becomes animated—which is not often. The coloring of hair and complexion is a kind of lemon yellow, while about the temples are modulations into gray. At first glance he gives the impression of youth, so blond is he; at a second, you see a man of forty-four, slightly disillusioned, very gentle and very incurious. That is, until one says "Boer" or "Irish"; then his languor vanishes, and he becomes a dealer in affirmations.

Once called the Irish Swinburne, this artist in fiction has played the entire gamut of the emotions from the brutal splendor of his early work to the gray-in-gray of Sister Teresa's renunciations. Like the later Wagner, he now sounds but one motif—the Mitleid, the Pity Motif. And to me this coda of an artistic life, charged to the full with material sensations, with shining, beautiful surfaces, with all the glitter and glow of a sensuous, refined existence—this ending, I repeat, is very soothing, very ennobling. I don't mean to say that Mr. Moore, like Huysmans, is about to make his exit into a monastic existence. Far from it. But he seems weary of the pomp of prose fiction, of the delineation of souls between book covers. He is in reality contemplating more strenuous days. He would revive the Irish language, the ancient Irish literature, and by the subtile and powerful aid of a living tongue unhorse Anglo-Saxon supremacy—perhaps free Ireland! With W. B. Yeats and Dr. Douglas Hyde, Mr. Moore is at the very forefront of the Neo-Celtic movement in poetry, art and the theatre. It is a lovely many colored drama—but I fear only a dream.

Having traversed Mr. Moore's outer man and newer soul let me proceed to the fatal interview. Now, I am a poor hand at interviewing others. I can spill out my own soul on paper as well as may be; but to tap another's, to play the male midwife and deliver some poor struggling celebrity of a sentence—in that I am not successful. So I circled around my victim, whose aquiline nose grew discouragingly longer as he pulled his pale moustache, watching me as he would some rare, curious, tropical bird when captured by a cruel ornithologist. Mr. Moore did not purpose to be taken easily. I wished to speak of Evelyn and he began to talk of Erse. It is the only language, he said, worth reviving. It would become a new tongue, full of new surprises and delights after the shop-worn currency of the English speech.

"Did you actually rewrite 'Evelyn Innes,' Mr. Moore?"

"I am Pro-Boer and for that reason I have left England."

"Is 'Sister Teresa' the same in the American as in the English edition?"

"You Americans are always on the right side in a struggling cause. You freed Cuba and even if you do gain a material profit the end justifies the means. You did right."

"Why won't you give the world a picture that does not falsify your features?"

"I hate photographs," he replied, and then hastily continued: "I have asked my kin to study Erse and when I return to Dublin I expect to hear them speaking it with ease."

We finally drifted to Wagner and, of course, to Flaubert. "I don't believe in books," he remarked. "We read too much. It is better to sit on a fence in the sunshine and look at things than to bury one's head in a book. If you read half a dozen books in your lifetime, read and reread them, you shall have conquered all bookish wisdom." The names of Shakespeare, Turgenev, Tolstoi, Flaubert, Hugo—this last was pronounced with certain inflectual reservations—were mentioned. "No one can hope to equal such writings as Flaubert's. Why attempt it? We are all imitators." And just as the air became dense with all sorts of delightful possibilities, the Parsifal motif was sounded from the theatre and we all went within to watch Klingsor and the "Flower Girls"; also to compute the duration of Kundry's kiss when she attempts to lead that fat "reine Thor" from Parsiphallic paths.

A flaring sunset greeted our eyes after Parsifal had demolished with his holy lance Klingsor's magic and infernal castle. I again sought Mr. Moore, this time determined that any attempt on his part to elude the subject of George Moore would be sternly checked. The Irish language did not interest me—has it long been in the curriculum of Maynooth College? I infinitely preferred Mr. Moore's English—streaked as it is with delicate Celtic accent. He swam into view. Humbly I accompanied him. I alluded to his own memorial and drastic phrase, A stuffed Christ," when writing of Parsifal in "Evelyn Innes."

"The theatre," he interrupted, "is the only field for the twentieth century artist. By placing before the eyes and the ears of the people your story, you gain an immeasurable advantage over the written word. The spoken word—always! Consider the power of Wagner! His is the real art of the new century—speech reinforced by tone. And such tone!" Bulging as I was with questions relating to the identity of "Evelyn" this new cut made me very sad. Mr. Moore became very British, very distant. In feverish accents I spoke of the London music critics—Runciman, Vernon Blackburn, of Max Beerbohm. But it was useless. The spell was snapped and my favorite writer of English fiction grew restless and unhappy. He evidently suspected me of trying to "pump" him. He was not far from wrong. I did try to "pump" him and failed magnificently. I might have known from his letter that he wished to talk of the latest land of his heart's desire—Ireland. Oh, why didn't I give him his head and then by degrees guide him into my own pet pastures! But I have already told you that I am not a born interviewer.

Now I fully appreciate Mr. Archer's difficulties when he essayed an interview with this Irish author. George Moore is a difficult man; I am tempted to add, a shy man. He is certainly morbidly modest about his own work, and he does not wear his art on his sleeve. To approach the inner courts of his intellect one must pluck petal after petal from the delicate flowery barrier behind which hides his subtle soul. As I write I can see the curious glance from those Celtic blue eyes when I attempted my verbal surgical operation. He seems to care little for publicity, for fame, for money. He is writing plays, poetical plays, founded on Irish legendary themes. October 21 Dublin witnessed the first performance of his new drama, "Diarmaid and Grania"—a title not unfamiliar to readers of "Evelyn Innes."

Du reste, he was not satisfied with the Bayreuth of 1901—what sensitive critic could be?—and expressed admiration for the thorough and hearty way of reviewing books in America. He spoke warmly of the critical work of Royal Cortissoz, of the New York Tribune, and has read Harry Thurston Peck's discriminating review of George Moore. Despite the pessimism of his novels he is still a fighter for art. It is Irish art—after long and fruitful excursions into the fields of French, English and Russian literary art. And we may look for a goodly crop of plays—perhaps novels—during the next decade. Such was my first meeting with the strange and gifted Irish writer, George Moore.

Jan Kubelik.

JAN KUBELIK has finished his Continental tour, and reaches London during the present week, appearing in Brighton November 16, and the farewell London concert is advertised for the Queen's Hall, November 9, and the following day he sails for New York. Already announcements are made of his London dates for next year, with Richter and the Philharmonics, May 15, the opening of the season, and July 2, 1902, when he plays young Randegger's new Violin Concerto. It is not yet settled what he will play at his first New York concerts, December 2 and 7 (the seat sale for which opened Monday), but undoubtedly the Paganini Concerto, and the famous "Devil's Trill," by Tartini, will be heard at the first one, in addition to numbers by the orchestra, and the Henselt Concerto, by Miss Shay, and at the second a sonata for violin and piano, which has been one of the most successful numbers on the programs at his concerts in Prague and Budapest last month, will be played.

FROM PARIS.

PARIS, OCTOBER 31, 1901.

CARRYING out his intention of giving a symphony by a foreign composer, with one by a native of the same period, Colonne placed on his program for last Sunday a symphony by Mozart and one by Méhul. The comparison was not favorable to the latter composer, who may, indeed, be said to have suffered cruelly by juxtaposition with the immortal Mozart. Méhul's Symphony in D, which is very long, only possesses a relative interest, and lacks that simplicity and naturalness very apparent in his other works, his opera "Joseph" for example. Charpentier's suite, "Impressions of Italy," invoked its usual great success; its freshness of inspiration, its inherent charm and originality grow on the listener at every subsequent hearing. I do not know if this charming work is known to concert givers in America. If not, I can strongly recommend it, merely drawing their attention to the fact that its proper execution requires a viola player of the first rank. The Concerto for piano and orchestra in C minor, by Saint-Saëns, brought out the brilliant technic and artistic qualities of that sterling pianist, Mme. Clothilde Kleeberg.

The remaining novelty was the arrangement by Alfred Bruneau of his four preludes or entr'actes to his opera, "L'Ouragan," produced last season at the Opéra Comique. These have been arranged as a suite in two movements, and produced a much better impression as a concert number than when performed in the theatre. It may have been owing to the fact of a larger orchestra, or perhaps to the greater attention on the part of the audience, but certainly the grandeur and poetry of the music were more apparent in concert form.

At the Lamoureux concert of the same date was given a second hearing of the "Polovtsien Dance," with chorus from the opera of "Prince Igor," by Borodine. As the composer died before his work was completed, its instrumentation was intrusted to Rimsky-Korsakoff. The peculiar methods of this master are everywhere apparent in the way he has utilized the piccolos, harps and drums. The work is interesting and picturesque. The concert concluded with a really splendid performance of the Choral Symphony, conducted in a masterly manner by Chevillard.

At the Opéra "Les Barbares" is given, and succeeding performances have bade it go much more smoothly. I am still, however, of the opinion that while not unworthy of the pen of the author of "Samson and Delilah" it will not add very greatly to his reputation, or even secure a lasting place in the repertory. Arrangements have been completed for its production at Nice during the winter.

All teachers of music are familiar with the manner in which names of favorite public performers, particularly singers, are sometimes used by unprincipled professors as a bait to attract people. A singer who has sometimes merely rehearsed a role, or an aria, with an accompanist is paraded as pupil of so and so; or, on the other hand, a pupil who may have only taken half a dozen lessons from a celebrated teacher is proud of drawing the attention of the public to the fact of having studied with such and such a distinguished teacher, although the pupil may not be authorized to do so, or exemplify in any shape or manner the teaching of the individual whom he is proud to call master. It is not infrequently that we see the Tamagnos, De Reszkés, Calvés, Eameses, &c., claimed as pupils by the pianists of theatres with whom these singers may have rehearsed at some early period of their career, and, on the other side, the last professor with whom a pupil, subsequently famous, may have studied frequently, gets all the credit, due in many instances to more deserving but less known teachers. Melba was a pupil of but nine months with Marchesi before she made her début at La Monnaie in Brussels in "Lakmé" and "Lucia." Yet this self-advertising teacher claims all the credit, while the poor singing masters in Melbourne and elsewhere, who, with Providence, taught Melba all she knows are never heard of, and get no benefit whatever of their now famous pupil's prestige. The following incident may prove interesting to teachers and pupils alike. In the Paris Figaro of October 21 appeared the following item in the musical and theatrical column:

"A young pupil of M. Trabadelo has just made her début at the Opéra in Berlin as Marguerite in 'Faust.'

"She obtained a great success, and the papers compare her voice to that of the greatest singers.

"This is a new success for M. Trabadelo, who was t teacher of Sibyl Sanderson and Miss Garden, who sin at the Opéra Comique."

Miss Mary Garden, who has for the past season be engaged as one of the sopranos at the Opéra Comiq wrote the following note, marked "urgent," to the musi editor of the Figaro:

"It is by a mistake, no doubt, that a note published in t Figaro of to-day, and coming from Berlin, styles me a p pil of M Trabadelo. My only master is Fugère, and it to him only that I owe the little I know (sic). You w oblige me much by inserting this little rectification.

"MARY GARDEN."

This was published in the Figaro, with the followi comment by the musical editor: "The note in question (t first one) came to us from M. Trabadelo himself, and w has already thanked us for its insertion."

In the same journal of the next day appeared Trabadel reply to Miss Garden's letter:

"OCTOBER 22, 190

"DEAR SIR—Miss Garden is quite free to attribute h talent to whichever of her professors she pleases.

"But it is none the less true that for two years Miss G den came three times each week to me for lessons. To quite exact, from September 1, 1896, to July 15, 1898. letter of hers, dated March 14, 1899 (nearly a year af having ceased her lessons), and which I send you, as w as other correspondence, in which she calls me 'my d master,' or she 'hopes to do me shortly great credit,' styles herself 'always your very grateful pupil,' establish sufficiently what she owes me from an artistic point view.

A. TRABADELO

"P. S.—I add to my letter a photo of Miss Mary G den, with the dedication 'To my very dear master, Trabadelo.'"

To this communication, published by the editor of t Figaro, Miss Garden never vouchsafed any reply.

Now in this little quarrel surely neither side need f offended. Fugère, to whom Miss Garden attributes the l tle she knows (the words are her own), although a popu member of the Opéra Comique for a number of years, more esteemed as actor than singer. He was, if I mista not, first of all a sculptor, and came out as a public p former at a music hall, I think the Ba-ta-clan. Miss G den admits that she knows but little of the art of singing and surely she is the best judge—so that Fugère, whom s claims as teacher, need not feel flattered, and Trabade who claims her as pupil, need not feel offended.

DE VALMOUR

Pappenheim Pupil from Denver.

MISS LEILA VAN NEST, Denver, Col., will arrive New York this week to resume her studies w Madame Pappenheim. The young lady's delay in arrivi so late in the city is due to the grave misfortune which l fell her in losing her father, who died last September, the time when she and her mother were on the point starting for the East. Mr. Van Nest was prominent Denver, being largely interested in mining enterprises.

If the hopes of Madame Pappenheim are realized (she known to be an excellent judge of promising singers), M Van Nest will very shortly rival Miss Frieda Stender, w is now making her way before the public as an artist. B while Miss Stender's voice is an excellent dramatic s prano, Miss Leila Van Nest has a coloratura voice of ra beauty and power, and besides this possesses perso charms and magnetism, all the qualities of becoming a pu lic favorite.

MRS. HADDEN-ALEXANDER.—Mrs. Alexander's servic as concert pianist are continually in demand, and within few days she played at the following: November 2, Sherry's, at the Daughters of the American Revolut gathering; Mrs. Alexander is a member. November at t Sorosis meeting at the Waldorf-Astoria, her choice t these occasions being the Chopin Fantasie in F minor. (tober 31, with Mr. Alexander, baritone, she gave a reci at Columbus Hall, and November 7, also with Mr. Ale ander, one at Fordham. On this latter date she also ga an entire recital before the Thursday Morning Club, Madison, N. J., playing compositions by Chopin, Sch mann (the "Carnival," which Mrs. Alexander plays esp cially well), the Liszt "Forest Murmurs," and short works by Strong and MacDowell.

MORRIS PIANO SCHOOL.—Before long the pupils of t Morris Piano School will give another public recital. M. Morris, the director, reports that the idea of daily instru tion for children is most successful.

ITICISM, THE PUBLIC AND CONTEMPORARY ART.

HEN we cast a really scrutinizing look on the rich musical life of the present, and seek to fathom v far it is truly promoted and guided to genuine devel- nent by criticism and the public, we cannot escape the fession that contemporary criticism in general does make it sufficiently its business to intelligently mediate ween the creative artist and the public, and hence it not be acquitted to-day of the often alleged charge of productiveness.

The numerous musical journalists, that is, critics in the marckian sense of the word, "people who have failed their profession," and who labor to feed the public h some unmeaning figures of speech from the rich ndance of their own artistic ignorance, have indeed ly met some opposition from professional critics of e knowledge and serious thought; but even of these y a small part are able to have a really instructive ef- t, ennobling the taste and forming the judgment that being truly productive on the creative artist and on ir own narrower or wider circle of readers. Many of really professional critics restrict themselves too much theoretical speculation, or use their judicial function exclusively in the sense of prejudice, for the simple lic to follow with interest their decisions, which are at es too much like those of Solomon, at times too Dra- ian. Others come to their professional duties without asure or interest, and consequently can only have an arious effect on the artistic sense of their readers, and ully, in the case of many music critics, party interests essitating a preponderance of praise or blame, render ir judgment unsatisfactory and perplexing.

The important task of keeping awake the belief in the sibility of a productive manifestation of criticism, and rewith the interest of the cultured public in serious ics, has consequently fallen to a pretty small group worthy young art critics, who have true artistic inspira- , who honestly labor and continue to honestly labor bring closer together the creative artists and the pub- and, before all things, to weed out the rich growth of judices which spring from the lack of æsthetic and torical knowledge, and which so frequently trip up the lic on its first approach to new art worlds. But for s end it was requisite that criticism should give up that ertorial function to which hitherto it has almost ex- sively devoted itself, and should become a careful guide l an instructive teacher of the public.

Thus we have come to the indispensable aids of preliminary cussion and of the various critical, æsthetic analyses t appear under the most difficult titles, which are noth- else and profess to be nothing else than that "introduc- y" criticism, in which the professional writer, who is iliar with the intentions and the facture of a new or n older work, calls the attention of the public to the ential peculiarities, the style of composition, and all the re important assumptions and formative moments of work in question; and thus, without forcing on the der a final judgment, enabies the hearers of the work receive it more understandingly. The model creations Richard Wagner and the bold attempts of writers of gram music have given to the technic of stage compo- ons, and even of concert music, a hitherto undreamed complexity, a congruity, spread through whole works, the motival and thematic formation, and a symbolic nificance of all tonal figures, which often render it icult or even impossible for the unprepared hearer to arly grasp, at the first hearing, the essential contour of the tone picture. Here productive criticism has to use the highest powers of its office by creating, not retrospectively but preliminarily, a more intimate relation between the work of art and the public; here has it to give hints and explanations of the ideas and technic so that all the weightier parts of the composition can be clearly perceived and a scientific judgment of the æsthetic sense and value of the whole can be attained by an intelligent apprehension of details.

These requisites of productive criticism correspond throughout to the conception which the great critic Hans von Bülow cherished respecting the real duties and the proper starting place of a criticism of any artistic value. These he has stated clearly enough in the monumental phrase, "True criticism has merely the duty of giving hints to the understanding and of calling attention to what is prominent and significant. The artist himself is the lawgiver and the judge, not the public, not the critic." Again he says, "The question what the artist intended, not what he ought, precedes in discussing the achievements of an artist, the reply of honest criticism."

In the complex relations between the artist and the public, the latter is not merely the receptive party, as the stupid arrogance of many artists and art critics loves to represent it; the public has to give, it must give, if art is truly to flourish and become life. As the artist creates his work out of the necessity of imparting himself to the public, so the public has, with an intelligent reception of his creation, to give to the artist the fairest spiritual reward for what he has done, and at the same time to give him the most powerful incentive for further work. There can be no doubt that the capacity for such a rewarding can be instilled into the public and be increased by intelligent instruction on the side of criticism. The history of music may tell us of many foolish misapprehensions of new works on the side of the public, as the rejection of "Fidelio," "The Barber of Seville," "Carmen" and other masterpieces; yet, in general, the public, with all its thoughtless delight in many trashy apparitions of a day, has in many instances judged quite rightly, often more rightly even than unproductive reportorial criticism—perhaps instinctively, about serious creations difficult to understand. And here let us recall a very significant fact that the German public surrendered itself with joyful heart to the magic of the Wagner tone drama, while the guild of critics indulged in the most shameless slanders and harshness of the creations of Wagner, towering high as heaven above all gray theory.

A certain familiarity, the ideas and formal intentions that lie at the basis of a new work, will at all times facilitate the understanding of the author by the public, but it is especially requisite that this familiarity shall appear in all cases when the very first performance of a new not quite simple composition and its first success or non-success are in question. Here the public is to a certain extent a bench of judges, whose decision can only have validity when it rests on the knowledge of the documents in the case. A carelessly adjudged success can not only produce a perversion of public opinion, but may lead the artist astray or induce him to remain astray. But worse, much worse in its consequences for the creative artist, and indirectly also for the whole world, is a light minded rejection of a new work without serious examination.

Well is it for the artist—within often very narrow limitations caused by the diffusion of press notices—when he can appeal against a condemnation of his creation when it seems to him unjust, and appeal to the judgment of the public of other cities. The first verdict, however, booms and whizzes through the bustling press, and can when a non-success is reported easily be a sentence of death to the artist and his work, or a lifelong imprisonment in the archives of the theatre. In such a case only the highest sovereign in all art matters, the unprejudiced and therefore juster afterworld, can effect subsequent rehabilitation and amnesty of the unjustly condemned artist. The public, therefore, ought always to be conscious that in its verdict on a new work it is intrusted with a high and honorable responsibility to the work itself, to its author, to the present and the coming world of art, and that in discharging this task the momentarily greater or less amusement and dilettante outbursts of approval, to which the lay public of to-day is often beguiled by resemblances of the instrumental coloring, ought not to give the casting vote.

Criticism and the public must look the new forms of art in the face, openly, honorably and trustfully, with a seriousness disturbed by no prejudices, and with the simple purpose of understanding and not of merely thoughtlessly enjoying. Thus they will reward the artist for the faith and confidence with which he has created his work and presented it for judgment to criticism and the public.

Frank H. Shepard Harmony Lectures.

MR. SHEPARD, of Carnegie Hall, is the originator of a system of theory methods which undoubtedly supplies a vital element in musical culture. It is not harmony study alone, but makes clear the underlying principles of music, and brings them into the life of the player or singer with a force unknown to traditional methods. It teaches the practical side of harmony and analysis. Mr. Shepard teaches much of it by the use of the piano keyboard, followed by analytical tests, part writing tests, ear tests, and all this may be thoroughly learned in a single season.

A thorough and complete understanding of all this may be obtained by the Shepard system, in a few months, with only thirty minutes' daily study. It is done without the endless grind of the traditional exercises.

A course of ten lecture lessons, for classes and music clubs, is one of the Shepard plans, and harmony study by correspondence is a specialty. Resulting from methods of study peculiar to this system, the correspondence work becomes direct and positive; it is surrounded by safeguards in the form of test questions, practice guides, records, &c., and makes this study absolutely practical and successful. It is designed not only for students at a distance but for those who are unable to take the regular lessons, giving a few moments daily to it. Correspondence study stimulates independent thought; the student obtains a broad and logical view of the matter when putting his thoughts on paper. Weekly or fortnightly lessons. There is a lecture course on Saturdays, 11:45, Carnegie Hall, beginning November 16, and another beginning January 8, 1902, 4:30, Wednesdays. The class is limited to forty members. A limited number of invitations may be obtained for the first lecture.

Mr. Shepard has issued a useful little teachers' calendar, running from September, 1901, to September, 1902, which may be had on request.

McCALL LANHAM.—McCall Lanham, the baritone, leaves New York on November 14, for Helena, Ark., where he is to sing at a fashionable wedding on the 20th. On the 22d he will give a recital at Pulaski, Tenn.; on the 24th he will give one at Clarksville, Tenn., and on the 26th he will give another at Pine Bluff, Ark. During the winter Miss Kate Chittenden will give a course of ten lectures, at which Mr. Lanham will sing. Mr. Lanham has just been appointed choir director and organist of the Seventh Street Methodist Episcopal Church, New York, for the coming year.

MUSICAL COURIER OFFICES—FINE ARTS BUILDING.

CHICAGO, November 7, 1901.

ST. VINCENT'S CHURCH became the scene of a notable musical event last Tuesday evening, November 5, when a new organ was dedicated, William C. Carl, the eminent American organist of the "Old First" Church, New York, and director of the Guilmant Organ School, being the performer. Mr. Carl's finished and masterly playing delighted the large and discriminating audience, and the representative selections which he interpreted served to illustrate his great versatility. Remarkable pedal virtuosity, complete command of manuals and stops, exquisite phrasing and true insight into the intention of the composer, were among the characteristics which he displayed. Upon securing so capable a soloist and scholarly a musician to give an inaugural recital on their fine new instrument, the congregation and musical committee of St. Vincent's Church are to be congratulated.

Bertrand Mullette, organist of the church, gave valuable assistance, and the other soloists of the occasion were Glenn Hall, the Chicago tenor, whose beautiful voice is being heard at many important events this season; Mabelle Crawford, one of the leading contraltos of the West; Mary Healy-Mullette, soprano, a singer of exceptional taste and refinement, who is to appear frequently in public, and G. Wuerst, the baritone.

Under the direction of Bertrand Mullette, members of the choir were heard in several interesting numbers. The program well may be printed in full:

Adagio and Finale, First Organ Sonata.....Mendelssohn
Bertrand Mullette.
Vocal, Recitative and Aria, From My Soul's Depths (from Paradise Lost).....Rubinstein
G. Wuerst.

Vocal, Ave Maria.....Gaston Dethier
Misses Gubbins, Jones and Giles.
Organ, Marche Heroique de Jeanne d'Arc.....Dubois
(The march portrays several incidents in the life of Joan of Arc.)
William C. Carl.

As a matter of record it is appropriate to recall Mr. Carl's successful appearance in this city several years ago at the World's Fair. It is to be hoped that he will visit this city again during the present season.

The following production appeared in the Chicago Inter Ocean of November 5:

"The Thomas concerts are under way, with an increased number of devotees and much display of sumptuous attire. Our versatile raconteur, Edward Freiberger, who never misses an event of importance to society, has been on hand, and tells with commendable frankness of some of the instructive things he has heard. For example:

"The following conversation proved highly interesting during the intermission at last Saturday evening's concert of the Chicago Orchestra, the first speaker being a woman and the second a man:

"'But I must say I'm surprised to see you here. I always understood you to say that you didn't care for music at all.'

"'Well, and to tell the truth, I don't like it at all yet.'

"'Then why do you come here?'

"'Well, I'll tell you already how it is. Once a week already my wife wants me to put on my dress suit. She says it's fashionable and it gives me some style. Well, and so long as I've got to wear it somewhere, don't you see, I might as well wear it already where people can see me in it. Now you see how it is?'"

And again:

"A certain Prairie avenue matron, who knows all about music since her husband has made money in stocks, talked rather loudly at the concert of the Chicago Orchestra last Saturday evening. Some of her remarks interested her hearers, while some surprised them and others simply dazed them. For instance, she was expatiating on 'Theodore Thomas' wonderful knowledge of the insight of music,' as she called it, and then capped the climax by asking her neighbor: 'Don't you think that was a superfluous readi of Richard Strauss' "Macbeth" that Mr. Thomas gav So dispiriting, don't you think?' And everybody wonder what she meant. It is possible she has a faint idea of herself.

"Dear, dear, dear! If this is all true, whither is our p sion for musical culture going to lead us?"

Comment seems to be unnecessary.

Esther Feé, the exceptionally gifted American violin who spent the past five years in study abroad, has t week been greeted in Chicago by her many friends. October 5 she was married at St. James' Church, Lond England, to Rene Baragnon du Maisnil, a Paris gentlen of noble birth, who will accompany her on the Americ tour, which Charles R. Baker is directing. The you violinist will continue to be known to the concert-goi public as Esther Feé. In both Eastern and Western Sta much interest is centred in her forthcoming appearances

HELEN BUCKLEY.

This gifted soprano sang at Kalamazoo and Gra Rapids, Mich., last week, her numbers inspiring the follo ing press comments:

The feature of the evening, however, was the singing of the gif soprano, Miss Helen Buckley, who seemed even more vivid in work than when she was here with the Schuberts last year. selections were well chosen, giving a pleasing variety, especia in her second appearance, when she sang a group, including t beautifully contrasting songs, the old Scotch "Loch Lomond" a the sprightly French song, "Vous Dansez Marquise," both of wh were full of the finest coloring. The number on the progr which was evidently most enjoyed was Miss Buckley's singing Gounod's "Sing, Smile, Slumber," with a violin obligato Harold Knapp, which was in itself an artistic gem. Miss Buckle voice was at its best in this number, and she was compelled repeat a part of the song in order to satisfy her delighted listene —Grand Rapids Herald, October 30.

Miss Buckley has a beautiful voice of great volume and excell schooling. Her tone production especially is notably good, and voice has gained much in breadth and volume since she first sa here a few years ago.—Grand Rapids Evening Press.

Miss Helen Buckley is not only the possessor of a fine sopra voice, but she has a fine stage presence. It is not only a delig to hear her sing, but it is a pleasure to watch her, and one is once in sympathy with her efforts.

The Schumann Club, of which Emma E. Clark, of the e Arts Building, is president, has been established for benefit of the professional musician, as well as the sic student.

Frederick Warren, baritone, of the Auditorium Conservatory, consented to sing the following group of old l new English songs before the Ossoli Club at Highd Park on Thursday afternoon of this week: "Drink Me Only With Thine Eyes," "Ah Willow!" arranged Lane Wilson; "Love Me or Not," Secchi; "Oh, the tty, Pretty Creature," arranged by Lane Wilson; "In ven Where Corals Lie," Edward Elgar; "To My First ve," "You'd Better Ask Me," Löhr, and "Long Ag· Alcala," Messager.

Florence Gallup Atkins, contralto, and Lionel Monse Parker, baritone, have been appointed members of quartet at the Centennial Baptist Church in this city. h vocalists are pupils of the eminent instructor, Mrs. na Groff Bryant, of the Fine Arts Building.

"The Development of the Singing Voice."

This is a new and valuable work by D. A. Clippinger, well-known and accomplished vocal instructor of Kimball Hall. The interesting preface to the book is as fols:

ie object of this book is to present the fundamental principles oice production in a way that can be easily understood, and it in some measure, it is hoped, to make the subject more ingible to the masses of people who are interested in the cultiva- of the voice.

is safe to say there is no subject upon which the uninitiated express himself with so little certainty of being right as the luction of a tone. The organ which produces it is invisible. re is no way to determine with the eye whether the tone is e correctly or not, and as to the ear, each individual has his standard, which is the measure of his development along the of the beautiful.

at tone production has not yet been reduced to an exact science een in the diametrically opposite ways in which the "learned " express themselves on every phase of the subject, and it is at all safe to say that people sing better now than they did be- the invention of the laryngoscope and other more complicated ts of the mechanic. Indeed, if we may believe history, they do sing so well. The wonderful tales told of the followers of Por- could hardly be duplicated in the present generation.

is should at least teach us that singing is more a mental process a physical one; and with a correct mental conception of autiful tone, the student need not be greatly alarmed if he does know the name of every muscle involved.

do not offer the slightest objection to the study of anatomy, one may study anatomy until his own is in a state of collapse out increasing his conception of a beautiful tone, and until that eption is formed he never will sing a beautiful tone.

the attempt to get at the truth there is a tendency to go to extremes and make singing purely physical or purely metaphysi- In one case every muscle, extrinsic and intrinsic, small or t, is developed and brought under control. In the other, the ical structure is entirely ignored and the process is transferred e realm of the ideal. The first makes voice culture and aths one and the same thing. The second brings it under the of suggestive psychology. Too much attention to physical proc- is likely to result in quantity rather than quality. genius does not need a method. He himself is the method. will get at the truth in spite of the teacher, for he is the truth; the great masses of people who study have to be led slowly and carefully over every step of the way, and it is this class for which books have to be made.

I am well aware that the study of the mechanical processes of voice production, without being guided constantly by musical intelligence, will never produce a good voice, and it must be understood that in the practice of the following exercises tone quality is the first consideration.

But it is not best to be radical on any point. If I see a pupil raising his shoulders and sinking at the waist when he breathes, and beginning the tone with a sudden drop, or holding his lips, tongue and throat rigidly, and indulging in various facial contortions, I can see nothing wrong in making a few pertinent suggestions. The development can often be greatly facilitated by showing the pupil the points of interference.

The exercises here given for the development and control of the singing voice are free from technical difficulties, but it must be remembered that an exercise means very little unless guided by musical intelligence.

It is not presumed that the exercises can be used in every case in the order in which they appear.

The needs of pupils are not the same in every case, and it is taken for granted that the teacher will always give the pupil what he needs most at any given time.

Among the most advanced pupils of Mrs. Regina Watson, the eminent piano instructor, of Chicago, may be mentioned such genuinely artistic players as Miss Veronica Murphy, Miss Mary Hale, Mrs. Elizabeth Coolidge, Mrs. Clarence Woolley, Miss Emily Parsons, Miss Eleanor Scheib, Miss Margaret Root, Miss Edith Baxter, Mrs. Clyde Carr, Miss Elsa Matthei, Miss Beatrice Byers and many others who have passed the amateur boundary. Miss May Auport, one of her "star pupils," occupies a handsome studio of her own in the Fine Arts Building, and Prof. P. C. Lutkin, the dean of the music school of Northwestern University, also is one of her older pupils. Many of them are filling honorable positions in various schools and colleges throughout the country. They owe this success to the thorough training received from Mrs. Watson.

The following interesting program will be given by the American Violin School, Joseph Vilim director, on Saturday afternoon, November 16, at Kimball Recital Hall:

Sonatina, for violin and piano (new).....Dvorák

On November 14 at the first of the series of four ballad concerts to be given this season by the Clayton F. Summy Company, in Music Hall, Fine Arts Building, the artists announced are Mrs. Genevieve Clark Wilson, soprano; Holmes Cowper, tenor, and Otto Pfefferkorn, pianist. Mr. Pfefferkorn will interpret a number of his own recent compositions.

Henrietta Crosman and her company are attracting appreciative audiences to the Studebaker Hall, Fine Arts Building, this week, the plays presented being "As You Like It" and "Mistress Nell."

Esther Feé, the violinist, will give a recital at Des Moines, Ia., about the middle of November. As previously stated her first American concert will take place in Carnegie Hall, New York, on November 18, with the Paur Orchestra.

Miss Electa Gifford, the soprano, has been engaged to gave a song recital at Duluth, Minn., during the first week in December.

William H. Sherwood, pianist, and Clara Murray, harpist, will be heard in a joint recital at Bloomington, Ind. in March.

The Chicago Musical College.

The Chicago Musical College is to be congratulated upon the success of a matinee performance given on Tuesday of last week by pupils of the School of Acting, under Hart Conway's competent direction. Sydney Grundy's "Glass of Fashion" was the play, the cast of characters being as follows:

Peg O'Reilly.....Miss Ethel Dovey
Hon. Tom Stanhope.....Francis Lieb
John Macadam.....Joseph W. Tuohy
Mr. Prior Jenkyn.....Irving Christensen
Lady Coombe.....Miss Marie Henley
Prince Rodowski.....C. Eugene Stockdale
Mrs. Trevanion (Nina).....Miss Adelaide Nowak
Colonel Trevanion.....Herman Lieb
Servant at Trevanion's.....Miss Myrtle E. Wilkins
Rodowski's servant.....William Fitzsimmons

In reference to a professional performance of this play given several years ago in this city, Mr. Conway kindly furnishes The Musical Courier with the following items of interest:

"Stella Boniface, daughter of George Boniface, Sr., and sister of George Boniface, the comedian, played Peg O'Reilly. Stella Boniface is now the wife of Henry Weaver, playing in 'Ben-Hur.' Sarah Jewett, for some years leading lady of A. M. Palmer's Union Square Company, played Mrs. Trevanion. Frank Mordaunt played Mr. Macadam, and Lewis Morrison, who produced 'Faust' finely and played Mephistopheles for years, was the Prince Rodowski."

Among many pupils of Mr. Conway now meeting with success before the footlights are Elsie Esmond, Bonita in "Arizona," and Mr. Ainsworth, Lieutenant Denton (the hero) in "Arizona"; while Henry Hall has been engaged for the production in New York of Augustus Thomas' new play, "Colorado."

November 9, 1901.

William H. Sherwood left on Friday evening for a concert tour through Nebraska and Iowa. His trip through Indiana was a great success, the pianist appearing before large audiences. He will visit North Carolina and other southeastern points in January. On Monday afternoon, December 2, Mr. Sherwood will be heard in recital at Chickering Hall, Boston, and on the same evening at Wellesley College, Wellesley, Mass. He will play at Rutherford, N. J., on December 3.

The Indiana University Lecture Board has engaged Mabelie Crawford, Glenn Hall, William H. Sherwood and Clara Murray to give concerts in Indiana during the first half of March.

In order to fill their engagements, under Charles R. Baker's direction, in this city on December 9 and 10, Suzanne Adams and Madame Sembrich will come from San Antonio and Dallas, Tex. Miss Adams will sing on Glenn Hall, the well-known tenor, left for Boston on Friday to fill his engagement with the Händel and Haydn Society, which has engaged him for three appearances this season. His manager states that he probably will fill a greater number of engagements than any tenor in the country this season. Mr. Hall's success in Denver recently resulted in a re-engagement for him next year.

Mrs. Garrita Nash, of Milwaukee, who is giving an interesting series of concerts, visited Chicago this week. She spoke in glowing terms of Gregory Hast, the English tenor, who made his American début at her concert on Monday evening, November 4.

MRS. THEODORE WORCESTER'S CONCERT.

A large and musical audience attended Mrs. Theodore Worcester's piano recital at the New England Church, Aurora, Ill., on Saturday afternoon, November 2. The program, which appeared in these columns on October 23, was of an exacting character, severely testing the varied powers of this brilliant artist. Opening with the Liadow Variations on a theme by Glinka and following these with Balakirew's "Song of the Lark," Mrs. Worcester beautifully illustrated the work of the new Russian school. The Brahms Rhapsody in B minor, Capriccio and Scherzo concluded the first part of the program. Of these the pianist was at her best in the Rhapsody, playing it with great force and sympathy. In the second part of the program the most noteworthy interpretations were of the "Elfenspiel" and Jensen's "Kypris." Mrs. Worcester's technic is remarkable for its delicacy, clearness and more than feminine power.

The program throughout was thoroughly appreciated by the musicians present, many of whom came from Chicago and the surrounding towns. A few extracts from local notices are subjoined:

Mrs. Worcester's great talent and skill as a pianist were never better demonstrated.—Aurora Daily Express, November 4, 1901.

The intricate productions of Liadow, Brahms, Tschaikowsky and other great masters were rendered with an artistic finish commensurate with a musician of rare genius and talent.—Aurora Beacon, November 4, 1901.

The large audience was much pleased with Mrs. Worcester's work, the excellence of which places her in the highest rank of American pianists.—Aurora Daily News, November 4, 1901.

Mrs. Marguerite R. Krosser, the pianist and accompanist, is teaching in the Fine Arts Building this season.

Miss Mary M. Shedd's gifted pupil, Irene Briggs, sang six numbers at a concert in Bloomington, Ill., on November 7, and, as is always the case when she appears in public, the audience was surprised at the wonderful tone of a girl of thirteen. Miss Shedd has many promising pupils at her studios in the Auditorium Building.

A Bach, Händel and Scarlatti program is being presented this afternoon at the American Conservatory.

"Karleton Hackett, of the American Conservatory, is a remarkable singing teacher," said a competent and unprejudiced musical authority, who recently conversed with a representative of THE MUSICAL COURIER. "The results he secures," the speaker continued, "are admirable."

Activity constantly prevails at the Auditorium Conservatory, where Frederic Grant Gleason, president, and Roy Arthur Hunt, manager, with their many competent associates, are engaged in advancing the interests of musical and dramatic education.

"The Wedding of Ulfasa," the first of a series of plays to be given here in the Swedish tongue, was presented at the Studebaker Hall, Fine Arts Building, on the evening of November 2.

Eva Emmet Wyckoff, the talented soprano, of the Fine Arts Building, will be heard in this city during the present season at a number of important events.

Miss Emma G. Smith's residence recently was the scene of an artistic recital given by Margaret Jeannette Loudon, pianist; Grace Whistler Misick, contralto, and Otto Roehrborn, violinist. Miss Loudon and Mr. Roehrborn aroused enthusiasm by their excellent interpretation of Rubinstein's Sonata, op. 13.

On November 3 an interesting musicale was given at the Vendome Hotel by Max Kramm, Jan Van Oordt and Henry Willis Newton.

Selections to be played next week in this city by the Chicago Orchestra include Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis," Brahms' Second Symphony, Dvorák's "Mein Heim" overture, Saint-Saëns' symphonic poem, "La Jeunesse d'Hercule," and ballet music, "Ruses d'Amour," Glazounow.

The program for the fifth concert (November 29 and 30) contains three novelties—Edward Elgar's "Cockaigne" concert overture, Rimsky-Korsakow's "Antar" Symphony and a tone-poem, "Siegfried in the Forest," founded on material from Wagner's "Siegfried." Charles Gregorowitsch will play Concerto for Violin, Mendelssohn.

Wm. A. Willett, the popular baritone, appears with the Toledo Symphony Orchestra, of Toledo, Ohio, on November 13, and with the Germania Club, of this city, on November 21.

As a rule musicians are not without charity. And yet conditions sometimes would lead one to believe that there is a subject which surely must worry some of them: In Heaven, who will their next door neighbors be? When you think of this question a little you suddenly are conscious of an ardent hope that there may be plenty of room in "the land that is fairer than day."

It is rumored that in these days professional jealousy is prevalent. And yet last week the Chicago Tribune printed an article stating that one gifted pianist recently died for love of another equally gifted pianist.

"Love," do you mean? Yes; that's what the article said, "love!"

The Hinshaw School of Opera is giving a praiseworthy series of events this season, William Wade Hinshaw being manager and D. A. Clippinger conductor. At the successful performance of "Fra Diavolo," recently held under the auspices of Medinah Temple, the cast included W. W. Hinshaw, G. Robert Hubner, Lillian Mattick, W. S. Palmer, Eugene Post, Florence Gertrude Smith, Henry Brown, L. R. Richardson and Fred Rogers. Mr. Clippinger conducted in a musicianly and magnetic manner.

Mrs. Marie Hoag Haughey, Mrs. Groff Bryant's brilliant pupil, has been engaged as soprano soloist at the West Presbyterian Church, New York city.

Madame de Vere's Triumphs in Melbourne and Sydney.

THAT Madame De Vere Sapio's Australian tour has been successful it seems but necessary to read the additional criticisms:

Madame De Vere is indeed an ideal Gilda; no one need wish a better. Here two duets of the second act were most charmingly and delightfully sung, and prepared the way for a really beautiful performance of the familiar aria, "Caro nome," an item which would assuredly been encored had the dramatic exigencies of the situation permitted; as it was the action of the play was stopped by the vehemence of the applause evoked by her delicate and refined singing. Still better, if possible, was her performance of the great duet with Rigoletto, the passionate allegro movement of which was persistently redemanded; while her share in the great quartet and the subsequent trio call also for emphatic recognition.—The Age, Melbourne.

A splendid house faced the curtain at Her Majesty's Theatre when Mr. Williamson's Italian Opera Company appeared for the first time in Verdi's "Rigoletto." Madame De Vere's Gilda was a most sympathetic creation, and her velvety voice and brilliant vocalization evoked enthusiastic demonstrations of applause from the audience. She rightly declined to repeat her artistic rendering of "Caro nome," but, after the famous quartet, excellently sung by all participants and victoriously led by her ringing soprano, a remarkable demonstration ensued, and nothing short of a repetition of the whole number would have quieted the excited audience.—Melbourne Herald.

Madame De Vere's ingenuous and youthful Gilda gave many interest. She exhibits that artistic temperament which enables to color the stronger outlines of her role as the ill-fated daughter of the jester. Her duets with the jester and Duke, respectively were among the hits of the evening, and her brilliant rendering of "Caro nome" was vociferously applauded.—Sydney Daily Telegraph.

This was the first appearance of Madame De Vere in opera in this city, and a very warm welcome was tendered her. We have pleasant recollections of the grand musical festival held by our Philharmonic Society in 1894, when Madame Sapio was associated with them in the performances of "Elijah," "The Messiah" and a miscellaneous entertainment at which she sang "Let the Bright Seraphim," and which is held to-day as being one of the finest vocal efforts ever heard in Town Hall. Now, as then, we can safely assert that Madame Sapio's singing of the melodious "Caro nome" last night was one of the most successful pieces of vocalization ever attempted in Sydney. Her voice has lost none of that sweetness, flexibility and charm for which it was noted, and the ease with which she sang the florid passages throughout the aria aroused the utmost enthusiasm. For purity of tone, intonation and evenness in quality no artist that has ever sang here can excel her.—The Australian Star, Sydney.

In a performance well nigh excellent, the Gilda of Madame De Vere was conspicuous for its alluring grace, its gentle charm and its artistic completeness. Since she commanded our admiration in concerts and oratorios in 1894, Mme. De Vere Sapio has, if anything, added to her accomplishments as a refined and moving singer, while the beautiful voice has retained its richness, its sweetness and its sympathy. We had not before seen this artist in opera. Our highest anticipations were realized, the audience greeted the prima donna with genuine warmth, and as the opera progressed, enthusiastically honored her as a great singer.

From first to last we had nothing from this handsome and graceful artist save the bel canto (beautiful singing); no ranting, no screaming, nothing slovenly, nothing in the way of scamping; everything well studied, well directed, well delivered, well sustained; the whole performance crowned by a deep earnestness in which claptrap exaggeration had no place.—The Sydney Truth.

HENRIETTE WEBER IN DEMAND.—The season is opening up brilliantly for this young pianist, who has dates booked as far ahead as March 1. November 13 Miss Weber plays at Wallkill, N. Y., and on November 22 she will give a recital in Mansfield, Ohio, with Minne Humphyres, a well-known soprano.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The First Pair of Concerts.

WITH the following program the Boston Symphony Orchestra last Thursday evening, in Carnegie ll, opened its twenty-first season:

nhäuser—Overture, Bacchanale and Scene between Tannhäuser and Venus from the first act (Paris version).
Meistersinger—Walther's Prize Song.
Götterdämmerung—Siegfried's Parting from Brünnhilde. Siegfried's Death. Funeral March. Closing scene.

fr. Gericke conducted. Milka Ternina and Ellison n Hoose were the solo singers.

Vhatever the attraction may have been—whether the hestra, the program or the possibility that at last the olic of New York is becoming a music loving one—the remains that for the first concert a larger audience embled than has been seen at any of these affairs in rs. A glance at the music scheme tells that it is an isual one—all Wagner, and operatic excerpts, at that. ny objections might be raised, in theory, against Wagin concert, but the size of the audience proved beyond speculation that it was a wise move on the part of the nagement.

Vith the very familiar Paris version of the "Tannser" Overture then, the concert began. In his read- of this Mr. Gericke surprised no one—at least no one o ever had heard this conductor's interpretation of any gner number; in fact, it seems at this late day quite sible to anticipate the every effect which he is about to duce, and that without any great musical cunning, er. And while a constant striving after unusual effects a bad habit with some conductors, it easily finds an use when the piece performed is by Wagner, for guer is nothing if not theatrical; his music, more than other, needs the footlights and a scenic backround. if we are to resort to our memory for these, let us at it have an unacademic reading of the score to stimulate imagination. Evidently Mr. Gericke does not share se views, and as a result we hear a very carefully con- red performance to which climaxes are foreign. There e portions in the orgic Bacchanale which sounded al- st sedate.

the succeeding number there breathed more life, due btless to the spirit in which Milka Ternina and Ellison n Hoose sang their duet; it was easily to be seen that of them remembered "Tannhäuser" as an opera. The nce of solo orchestra work was confined to the "Fual March" from "Götterdämmerung." Here again the ductor's chief care appeared to be in preventing hearty rance on the part of the band. No one knows—Mr. icke least of all—what a superb tone of brass is conitly being stifled by that menacing, overcautious left d. The logic of Mr. Gericke's everlasting piano seems v doubtful; surely that collection of strings can hold own against any proportionate amount of brass and odwind, and would it not be extending the dynamic ge (and with it the possibilities of orchestral effects) allowing the brass occasionally to have its say in a true, ly manner? Van Hoose's voice, sturdy and true to intion, responded nobly to the demands put upon it. iant in the Venusburg duct, it was as tender in the lther's "Prize Song" and heroic in the "Götterdämung" numbers. He sings with a full comprehension both roles, and with a surprisingly clear enunciation.

ernina was in vocal glory, and made meaningful the matic significance of her words. "The "Immolation ne" went off capitally; there was in her voice the tone bold resignation, so needful to the understanding of complicated episode.

fter her last words, and long before the band had e with the closing scene, there was among the audie a wholesale ducking under seats for wraps and as liberal an adjustment of head gear, which must have annoyed the singer not a little, for she deliberately turned her head and stared at the wall. New York audiences are always tardy in arriving at a concert and as anxious to leave before it is quite over.

One innovation was the reseating of the orchestra, which seems scarcely to improve the mass of sound; to the contrary, at times the various groups (especially the woodwind) sounded segregate. The orchestra played with that superb quality of tone to which we have become accustomed. Once or twice there were traces of a lack of balance—again in the woodwind—but this may have been the result of the new arrangement.

Another change from the usual were the annotations to the program; these are now done by Philip Hale, who has departed from the former order of analysis, and has instead collected an amazing mass of anecdotal facts, and retailed them in that subtle and ironic manner which characterizes his writing. They are interesting reading, and surely appeal to the concertgoer more than the mere laying bare of form.

At the matinee of Saturday the following numbers were comprised in the program:

Overture, Richard III., op. 68.....Volkmann
Concerto for 'Cello and Orchestra.....Lalo
Symphonic Poem, No. 7, Festklaenge.....Liszt
Symphony in A major, No. 7, op. 92.....Beethoven

Jean Gérardy gave a beautiful reading of the Lalo Concerto. His tone, mellow as an organ's, proved his sympathy with the work under hand, and a beautiful and grateful concerto it is. Gérardy does not try to make obvious the 'cello gymnastics—in themselves ghastly things to watch—and never fails to draw from the instrument that sympathetic vocal quality which he commands so easily; in this way he succeeds in making figuration beautiful in itself. Mr. Gericke's accompaniment was praiseworthy. Gérardy was recalled four or five times.

Of the orchestral numbers the overture to "Richard III." may be passed over as an interesting but not a remarkable work, while the Liszt "Festklaenge" have scarcely any deep claim to a place on a modern program. There remains yet the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven. We all know how much praise has been heaped over this beautiful work, and how richly deserving it is of it all. And partly for that reason it sounded better than it was played at this concert. Mr. Gericke indulged in some very strange tempi. After the Introduction, taken at an impressive gait, he dragged his band through the rhythms of the Vivace, which he varied not at all. Fortunately he missed the repetition. The wonderful Allegretto was played with a balance of tone and a superbly even tempo that are seldom possible. There were moments in it when the message became a speaking, human one; particularly at the entrance of that pathetic viola and 'cello melody, and again at the clarinet episode in the major. The Presto went lightly but without much swing, while the Trio was dragged out unmercifully until one pitied the woodwind. In the coda was again a noticeable instance of beautiful tone balance and rich color. With the Allegro Mr. Gericke awoke and gave us what we had been wishing for earlier in the symphony—the swirl of the dance. This movement came off splendidly and repaid one's patience and longing. And with it the concert closed. Again was the audience large and enthusiastic. At both affairs were there numerous recalls for the solo singers and performers.

MRS. JOSEPHINE JENNINGS-PERCY.—This charming singer, soprano of the Unitarian Church, Fourth avenue and Twentieth street, has issued a unique folder calling attention to her success as a concert singer. There are many flattering notices from various Eastern and Western cities, and a handsome picture graces the front.

Vittorio Carpi.

VITTORIO CARPI, the renowned baritone and vocal instructor, who is busy teaching at his residence, 210 West Fifty-ninth street, opposite the Park, and who will reappear in New York at Mendelssohn Hall on the evening of November 29, has favored us with some interesting information of his career, which we will publish from time to time.

After his opera tour in the United States and South America he sang from 1878 until 1884 in the most important theatres of Europe, with Patti, Donadio, Bellincioni, Nevada, Gayarre, Masini, &c. During that time he was engaged to sing at the theatres of Baron Von Dervies in Lugano and in Nice. In these theatres the greatest artists of the day were engaged, and the famous orchestra was conducted by Müller Berghaus, who orchestrated the second Liszt Rhapsody, and who, by the way, has orchestrated expressly for Signor Carpi "La Prière du Soir," of Gounod. The first violinist at that time was César Thomson. The opera and concert given were gratis and for charity, and the spectators were princes, dukes, and all the élite of the city. In the year 1881, "La Vie pour le Czar," by Glinka, was given, and the Grand Duke Nicholas of Russia, now Czar, was invited for the occasion. After the performance Signor Carpi was invited to the royal supper, the grand duke congratulated him for the manner in which he executed the role of Sussanin, and he received from the baron a handsome and costly jewel.

When in Palermo, in 1884, he sang thirty nights in "Traviata" with Mlle. Lablanche (Davenport). During the same year he sang in Turin at the time of the exposition, eleven nights with Tamagno. One of these performances was given in honor of the royal family. He also sang at a great charity concert in the salon of the exhibition with Tamagno and Bellincioni before the court. The king and queen at the end of the concert congratulated personally all the artists before more than 4,000 applauding people. During the season 1885 in London a musicale was given at the home of the Duchess of Manchester in honor of the Princess of Wales, Signor Carpi being the only artist invited to sing, accompanied by Sir Arthur Sullivan. The duchess' guests that night were all ladies of the court.

A few days later he was invited to sing at a grand soirée at Marlborough House. Two days after he received the following letter:

MARLBOROUGH HOUSE,
LONDON, June 30, 1885.

Lieut.-Gen. Sir Dighton Probyn, Comptroller and Treasurer of the Household, presents his compliments to Signor Carpi, and has been directed by the Prince and Princess of Wales to ask his acceptance of the accompanying pin as a souvenir of his visit to their Royal Highnesses at this house on Sunday evening, the 14th inst.

VALUE OF PROGRAMS AS ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE program is undoubtedly a form of advertisement. It is a much better advertisement for any musician to have his name printed upon a program than it is for him to have it printed upon a large number of circulars together with his press notices. Press notices are often overlooked. It takes some mental exertion and some time to read press notices; and it is a well-known fact that the majority of the inhabitants of our sphere try to avoid the former whenever it is possible. Then, too, time is valuable, and when there is any danger of any of it being spent in exercising one's brain it should be hoarded. It is a very bad plan to indulge in this thinking habit.

But to return to programs. Fortunately, people can look at programs and read them without thinking very hard. Furthermore, they have a habit of looking at a program to find out what is being sung or played or fiddled—not that it is exactly necessary to do this, as the program often contains the wrong information on this point and serves only to tell them what is not being sung or played or fiddled; but they don't care fiddlesticks and so "they are right and I am right and everything is right as right can be."

Well, anyway, a man's name will be read if it is on a program; and some people will take home the program and paste it in a scrapbook and bring it out to show whenever there is any company in the parlor. So the program is a good form of advertisement.

Notwithstanding the splendid advertising value of this little sheet of paper which is handed around to the audience, musicians are just about as careless in getting out their programs as it is possible for them to be. Programs that are correct in every detail from beginning to finish are almost impossible to find. Picking up any program at random, one can almost always find a large number of careless errors, and had I space to insert right here all the programs of last season's Washington concerts, hardly one would be found which could be called perfect.

I pick up a recent program which is really much better than the average, and will point out a few mistakes it contains. Here it is:

FIRST STUDIO RECITAL,
Pupils of Archibald Olmstead, 1323 G street, November 1, 1901.

Etudes, E flat, D mi.....Moscheles
Miss Gladmond.

Cappriccosso, A mi.....Stavenhagen
Miss Eva Barrows.

Novellette .....MacDowell
Miss Ethal Offutt.

Gypsy Camp.....Behr
Master Grove Morgan.

Song Without Words, A mi.....Mendelssohn
Miss Bessie Orchard.

Valse, C sharp mi.....Chopin
Miss Gladmond.

Octave Studies, Theme and Var.....W. G. Smith
Miss Barrows.

Natchstücke .....Schumann
Tarantelle .....Moszkowski
Mr. Olmstead.

The first mistake I notice is the spelling of capriccioso, the second that of "MacDowell." This latter mistake is frequently made in Washington programs. Secondly, the spelling of "novellette" and "Nachtstücke," a result of mere carelessness, not ignorance, although the spelling of "Novellette" is correct from the German standpoint. Thirdly, the abbreviation Mr. Olmstead uses for "Minor" is not good, although I have seen it used. Then there is an inconsistency in the program. The heading tells us that the recital is by the "pupils of Archibald Olmstead," and the last pupil who performs is "Mr. Olmstead." Surely Mr. Olmstead is not a pupil of himself. The next is a suggestion, not a criticism. Instead of writing the names of his pupils as "Miss Gladmond" and "Miss Barrows," why not give the first names of these young ladies? Also, it would be an improvement if Mr. Olmstead had given the "opus number" of each selection.

And yet this sample is much better in all matters of detail than the average Washington program.

The second musical entertainment of the Saengerbund was given at the clubrooms last Sunday. The program included a chorus, "Serenade," by Spicker; violin solos "Cavatina," by Raff, and a Brahms "Hungarian Dance," played by William H. Scholz; soprano solo, "Chanson Provençale," by Dell' Acqua, sung by Mrs. Alice Kraft Benson; piano solos, "Nachtstücke," Schumann, and Chopin's Waltz in E minor, played by Rebecca Heine Behrend; Schubert's "Der Lindenbaum" and "Good-bye, Robin" (an unannounced alteration in the printed program), sung by Mrs. William T. Reed, and tenor solos. Schubert's "Schäfer's Klagelied" and "Last Night," by Kjerulf, sung by Charles B. Xanten. The encores were a piano arrangement of the "Song to the Evening Star," from "Tannhäuser," by Miss Behrend, and Chadwick's "Dear Love, When in Thine Arms," sung by Mrs. Benson. Leon Reizenstein was to have sung a bass solo entitled "The Silesian Toper and the Devil." None of the gentlemen mentioned were present, however, and Mr. Claudy, the president, ventured the opinion that Mr. Reizenstein was spending the evening with his fiery friend. One of the principal features was the singing of Mrs Alice Kraft Benson, who has a well placed voice and who sings coloratura and other styles with artistic discrimination. Mr. Xander is to be commended for the singing of the society under his direction. He did not reach his usual high mark, however, in the accompaniment to the Dell' Acqua piece.

A recent addition to the force of the musical department in the Congressional Library is Oswald Welti, a well known violinist in town; also a member of the Rakemann String Quartet. The superintendent is W. Whittlesy, and the assistant superintendent is Miss My L. Mason, who will be remembered as the author of so interesting articles in the Etude.

I have received neat announcements from Sol Minsk and Miss Mary A. Cryder.

One of the most talented pupils of Fräulein Koehler Herbert Fit Kalaze.

Judging from the singing of the majority of the hi sopranos in Washington I should say that good voices this class were in great demand. Mrs. Alice Kraft B son is a soprano who should be heard more frequent Mrs. Joseph Chunn and Mrs. Charles H. Bayly are t other sopranos with good voices. Last but not least, three are good looking. BERENICE THOMPSON

Clavier Piano School.

THE third recital of this season at Clavier Piano Sch was given last Friday evening at Clavier Hall. program of piano numbers was presented with some structive and encouraging remarks by A. K. Virgil, dir tor of the school. The program speaks for itself:

Prelude and Fugue, C minor.....B
Air with Variations.....Han
Gavotte .....Gluck-Brah
Frank Jones.

Murmuring Zephyrs.....Jen
Miss Bertha Kilian.

Romance .....Rubinst
Valse, E minor.....Cho
Miss Grace E. Hodgson.

Sonata, op. 13.....Beetho
John R. Rebarer.

Berceuse .....Brahms-Ben
Miss Bertha M. Hoberg.

Rhapsodie, No. 6.....L
Miss Jennie Wells Chase.

It is perhaps unnecessary to speak individually of t playing of these pupils. Their playing was characteriz by the same clearness, individuality and musicianship t Mr. Virgil's pupils always show.

Mr. Virgil's remarks were, in effect, toward the uni ing of the school work, arranging the course of study grades according to the several terms.

That these recitals have come to be recognized in t musical life of this city as something more than the usu pupils' recitals is shown by the large audiences and e thusiastic interest manifested.

The recitals this season will be varied by the assistan of artists, both singers and instrumentalists.

HUGH WILLIAMS SINGS.—This prominent pupil of Du ley Buck, Jr., recently sang for the Women's Press Cl and made a big hit with "Daphne's Love," by Ronalds, a the popular "All Thro' the Night." Williams is getti a firmer hold on his fine voice and can thank Mr. Bu for this steady development. A singer of manly appe ance, and blest with temperament, he should make a su cess of his career. The Babcock-Buck Sunday musica will be resumed the first Sunday in December.

A TRIBUTE TO FREDERIC ARCHER.

PITTSBURG, Pa., November 4, 1901.

tors The Musical Courier:

HE passing of Frederic Archer, at the height of his fame and usefulness, impels us to reckon up his life k for art, wherein his busy hand and brain have been prominent.

Ie will be remembered, we think, not only as the emit exemplar of the modern school of organ playing, nor a foremost master of the resources of his instrument, o fascinated the attention both of the American and the ropean world, nor as the brilliant lecturer and critic, merely as the skilled composer and director. And yet was all of these—and more. Such men cannot be said die. They leave too deep an impress upon their age time. Their works abide.

t is as the artist and musician that the next generation l rate Mr. Archer higher than even we have done. The e breadth and liberality of his cultured taste and rend judgment, his perfect candor as a seeker after truth i beauty, and his benevolent wish to judge none but nteous judgment upon the merits, will point with deepng emphasis his views upon the true mission of art to race. If that unmanly envy and narrow jealousy of ers, which have so often marred the history of music, nd lodgment in his heart, they must there have died, as uncongenial soil. For in his public instructions they e never heard. He sought the good, the content, the rming soul, the genius of his art, first of all; and, having found it, proceeded to interpret it with all his might, in day and generation, through the media of all schools.

rt was at once his shrine and native home—'twas there lived and worshipped. No selfish ambition swayed him. was loyal to his standards, and inspired by the courage his strong convictions. Thus he was not merely magic, but often electrifying to the multitudes that flocked his recitals.

here were about a half million attendants during his seasons in Pittsburg, and were numbered by millions re he came to this country.

Ie believed his art to be the best offering he could make neaven, and with the religious devotion of the born artshe sought to eliminate from that oblation all that was the earth earthy. Before he had attained majority he already known in England and on the Continent as a ing master of music. He was never satisfied with his attainments, but with the instinct of real genius, conitly sought at once to improve himself as well as others. he purity of his standard was ever conspicuous in his positions, his lectures, his transcriptions and his con work. We found it to be the same here in his highly cessful choir service at the Episcopal Church of the ension during the closing years of his life, where some he best religious music to be heard in America was conitly offered, and where on the sad occasion of his burial eeply moved congregation attested their sense of an irrable loss.

lis lectures and more of his compositions should now ublished than he permitted to be put in permanent form ing his life. The only complaint we remember to have rd was that his exceeding modesty made him unwilling to play his own pieces, as often as his public longed to hear them. Writers have repeatedly alluded to the catholicity of his intellectual taste, using the term, of course, in its non-religious sense. This was quite true of him. Whether as an interpreter of the rugged genius of the North, born amid its wild peaks and auroral skies, or the passionate languors of the South, the barbaric simplicity of the West, or the sensuous splendors of the East, he was at home in all schools of his art and painted his tone pictures with a master touch.

We did not know whether he showed the more consummate skill in his reproductions of the majestic lines of Bach and Händel, or the enchanting and fairy-like conceptions of Mendelssohn, ancient or modern, fugue or witches' dance. Gregorian tone or opera, grave or gay, he found the good in everything, and instantly impressed it upon his audience with the indelible hand of genius.

Wherever he wrought, he leavened the public taste. That was to him his sacred goal. To that his whole life bore witness. No self-seeking, no hunger for applause, no thirst for popularity, could move him from his purpose. He died as he had lived, full of plans for the advancement of true art and the education of the people. We have laid to rest a great musician who has raised his art in the esteem of his age, and left it better than he found it. He now listens to rarer harmonies than earth has known.

E. H. RUSSELL.

HERBERT WITHERSPOON.—Herbert Witherspoon, the basso, has already filled several important engagements, and has been booked for many more. On October 18 he sang in Pittsburg at the Musical Art Society concert in Carnegie Hall, with great success, and he was immediately re-engaged for the Pittsburg Orchestra concert in March. On October 21 he sang in concert at Philadelphia, and on the 24th gave a sing recital, assisted by Mrs. Witherspoon, at Stamford, Conn. Mrs. Witherspoon's beautiful accompaniments earned her instant recognition.

Mr. Witherspoon's engagements are as follows: November 18, Brooklyn Amateur Club, Harry Rowe-Shelley conductor; November 26, Atlanta, Ga., song and 'cello recital with Gérardy; December 30, St. Louis, song recital for Union Musical Club; December 5, Denver, song recital with Mrs. Julie Wyman; December 6, Boulder, Col., song recital; December 11, concert with Victor Harris, New York city; December 12 and 13, Oberlin, Ohio, "Messiah"; January 22 and 23, Montreal, Canada, "Creation"; February 6, Brooklyn Institute; February 13, Buffalo, N. Y., Twentieth Century Club, recital; March —, Pittsburg, with Pittsburg Orchestra; March —, Akron, Ohio, orchestral concert; April 9, Belvidere, Ill., recital; April 10, Chicago, concert.

Mr. Witherspoon also has a large class of pupils, and is busier than ever. In his new residence studio, 571 Park avenue, the "Hetherington," he is most pleasantly situated for this part of his work.

HUGO KAUN.—As a welcome on his return home the many friends of Hugo Kaun, the composer in Milwaukee, arranged a grand "Kommers" for last Wednesday night, and a large body of Wisconsin citizens attended. They gave him a great reception.

BLOOMFIELD ZEISLER RECITALS.

THE rcitals of Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler at Mendelssohn Hall, Saturday afternoon, November 16, and Tuesday afternoon, November 19, are attracting the usual enthusiastic interest. Both programs include a number of "requests," and in case of each list the great artist departs from the conventional arrangement.

Saturday afternoon, November 16, Madame Zeisler will play this program:

Caprice on Airs from the Ballet of the opera Alcèste.....Gluck
Sonate, op. 111.....Beethoven
Thème Varié et Fugato (dedicated to Mrs. Zeisler).....Schütt
A le Bien Aimée (Valse), op. 59, No. 2.....Schütt

E. M. BOWMAN.—Last week we printed a story of the session of the Wyoming and Lackawanna County Musical Alliance held in Factoryville, October 21 to 25, which was conducted by E. M. Bowman, the well-known organist and teacher, and at which his daughter, Bessie M. Bowman, was the soloist.

The Scranton Tribune of October 24 said of E. M. Bowman's conducting: "The way that the chorus handles the difficult music taken up demonstrates the fact more fully than ever that Professor Bowman is a remarkable conductor, and that he has a system of instruction all his own."

The Scranton Tribune had the following to say of Miss Bessie M. Bowman's voice and singing: "Miss Bowman has a very strong, sweet contralto voice, of which she has splendid control, and at once captivates her audience. * * * Her concert work last night as solo contralto was of the highest class, and she was repeatedly encored by the appreciative audience."

MADAME TORPADIE BJORKSTEN PUPILS.—Miss Nellie Wright, the pretty daughter of Rosa Linde, the celebrated contralto, who has been a pupil some time of Madame Bjorksten, has a series of three engagements in North Adams, Mass., and in Bangor, Me. She is a most pleasing singer. A young lad named Carl Anderson, a Dane, has made a five years' contract with All Angels' P. E. Church, on West End avenue, and other pupils are making names for themselves and their teacher.

WHITNEY TEW

The London Press says of Mr. Tew's singing:

The Stage—"Mr. Whitney Tew proved himself a singer of excellent capabilities. His voice, which is a bass of great compass, is delightfully sympathetic—now full of tenderness, now instinct with passion and joy. He could not have been surpassed in his rendering of Schumann's 'Der Knabe mit dem Wunderhorn' and Liza Lehmann's curiously weird 'Myself when Young.'"—July 4, 1901.

London Musical Courier—"Mr. Whitney Tew's singing was marked by a high order of intelligence. He is one of the few singers now before the public who possesses the many qualifications that mean success. Besides a voice powerful and sympathetic he has a remarkable memory, and he never fails to display an intuitive knowledge of the poetic and dramatic significance of the text. In four songs by Bach, Brahms, Schubert and Schumann he exhibited great powers of vocalization and expression, and a style in singing German so thoroughly Teutonic that it was hard at times to realize his American origin . . . Three songs in English were equally impressive."—July 5, 1901.

Ladies' Field—"That fine bass singer, Mr. Whitney Tew, gave the first of his recitals in Steinway Hall. Madame Lehmann's 'In Memoriam' was a great test of Mr. Tew's manner and inflection, and he sustained the interest of his audience well throughout it; and it is a supremely hard work for a single voice—fragmentary, passionate, moody, with its pedal-note of acute sorrow. . . . Mr. Tew is fortunate in possessing a powerful voice of fine quality, and he has both the voice and brains for success."—May 25, 1901.

Daily Telegraph—"Mr. Tew is an artist who commands attention and deserves praise. Especially has he the gift of feeling and the power of conveying it to others, while in point of intelligence he leaves but little to desire. Mr. Tew essayed last evening songs of widely contrasting kinds and of various countres, but the manner and spirit proper to each were easily revealed, and the result was a conspicuous success."—May 23 1901

HOTEL CECIL, LONDON,
November 3, 1901

THE present week has seen a very considerable advance into the musical season. Hitherto most of the concerts that have taken place have been given by performers of recognized standing. Now, however, the platforms of the London concert halls are beginning to be filled by artists of less renown and often of very much less competence, who are either making their trial flight or are giving their "annual concert," more, it is to be feared, with a view to personal endowment than to making any valuable addition to the storehouse of art.

The most important concert of the week has been that given on Monday night by Dr. Richter at St. James' Hall. His program was by far the most interesting of any of the three which he is giving. Not that that is saying very much, for, as we have pointed out before, novelties in Dr. Richter's programs are conspicuous by their absence. On this occasion, however, he gave one work which was new at any rate, as far as the Richter concerts are concerned. Dr. Edward Elgar's "Cockaigne" Overture is a welcome addition to the Richter repertory, for it is a fine, well written work, and quite worthy to represent a man who is, perhaps, the most promising of the younger English composers. The least familiar of the other numbers was Smetana's "Ultava," while Tschaikowsky was represented by his Third Orchestral Suite and Mozart by his G minor Symphony. To dilate on Dr. Richter's readings is quite superfluous.

On Monday evening a new humorist made a bid for fortune at Bechstein Hall. Harrison Hill has a great advantage over the majority of the modern society entertainers in that he possesses a very strong sense of humor of a rather sarcastic and cynical turn. He is, moreover, an excellent pianist, and some of his musical skits were particularly happy, especially his variations on "Three Blind Mice" in the styles of well-known composers, in which he hit off the peculiarities of Chopin, Bach, Mendelssohn, Händel, Mozart and other composers with remarkable accuracy. His Richter-Sousa combine was another very successful sketch, the idea being that each of these two great conductors conducted his orchestra simultaneously with the other. The idea is a good one and certainly proved very entertaining. Mr. Hill succeeded single-handed in holding his audience for the best part of two hours, and he should prove a great success as an entertainer.

Tuesday was particularly rich in concerts. Two piano recitals took place in the afternoon. At St. James' Hall Ernest Schelling presented a program which, though thoroughly orthodox in every way, could hardly be described as anything but stereotyped. His performances of Beethoven's "Sonata Appassionata" and Schumann's Fantaisia in C call neither for praise nor blame. He displayed a certain amount of sympathy with the music and a good technic, but his readings did not bear the stamp of individuality. He also gave a group of Chopin pieces, but in these he hardly caught the spirit of the composer, and his interpretation was cold in the extreme.

At Steinway Hall a clever and very young Australian pianist, Percy Grainger, made a successful first appearance on the same afternoon. As a performer he has undoubted merits, but it is difficult to understand what could have induced him to include a transcription of Tschaikowsky's "Casse Noisette" Suite in his program. There is plenty of good piano music in existence without falling back on transcriptions from orchestral works, and of all orchestral pieces in the world this would seem to be least adapted for the purpose, depending so greatly as it does on the orchestration.

Bechstein Hall was occupied by Kelley Cole and David Baxter, who gave a successful vocal recital, at which Miss Kathleen Bruckshaw acted as pianist.

In the evening W. H. Bell's new symphonic prelude, "A Song in the Morning," was played for the first time in London at the Queen's Hall Promenade Concert. This work, which was written for the Gloucester Musical Festival, improves greatly on acquaintance. Well written, well scored and full of interesting matter, it stamps Mr. Bell as a composer with a firm grip of his art from whom great things may be expected. At this concert, too, Glazounow's "Ouverture Solennelle," a beautiful work which has never been played in England before, was included in the program.

At Steinway Hall, on the same evening, Miss Mary Warley gave the second of her three recitals.

Wednesday seemed to be given over to chamber music. In the afternoon the Kruse Quartet, which has now become quite an institution, and a very valuable one, gave the first of three concerts at St. James' Hall. The program opened with Eugen d'Albert's Quartet in E flat, a beautiful and interesting work, which deserves more frequent performance. The curious second movement, remarkable for the clever coloring, was particularly well played. This quartet has not been given in London for some years now, but it is to be hoped that it will in future be included in programs of chamber music more frequently. Herr Johann Kruse was also joined by Isodor Cohn in a violin sonata by Richard Strauss.

In the evening the Wessely String Quartet, consisting of Messrs. Wessely, Spencer Dyke, Lionel Tertis and B. Parker, gave an excellent concert at Bechstein Hall. These works were included in the program: Brahms' Quartet in A minor; Dvorák's, in G, and Haydn's, in D, Op. 64, No. 5. The advantages of constant association were very manifest in the playing, and all three works were treated with an admirable ensemble and real artistic ability.

A rather unnecessary concert was given in the afternoon at Steinway Hall by C. P. Castleman and Miss Anne Parsons. Mr. Castleman is a somewhat amateurish baritone and composer. His voice is rather hard and thin, and his songs have not much musical value. The best of them was a setting of Heine's "Der Asra," but Rubinstein has little to fear from this fresh rival. Miss Parsons' playing can hardly be criticised, as she asked the indulgence of the audience, owing to the fact that she has recently been suffering from a severe illness. Mrs. Helen Trust sang with her usual charm and distinction, and J. E. Hambleton also appeared.

In the evening Miss Violet Defries gave a vocal recital in the same hall.

On Thursday evening concerts were given at the Bechstein Hall by Miss Elvira Gambogi and Miss Amelia Hoeing, and at Steinway Hall by Miss Florence Almond.

On Friday afternoon Miss Marie Molto gave a concert at the Bechstein Hall. She had originally intended to give this concert in conjunction with Miss Marie Busch, but illness preventing the latter from appearing her place was taken by Miss Beatrice Spencer, a pupil of Mme. Blanche Marchesi, who sang a number of songs in excellent style. Miss Molto herself played a number of interesting violin pieces, including Bach's E minor Sonata, with piano accompaniment, and Brahms' Sonata in G, the piano part being taken by Miss Maud Brenwell. In these she displa roughly good taste, though her readings were nothing of the ordinary.

On the same afternoon Miss Lilly West gave a piano ital at St. James' Hall.

On Saturday afternoon the first of those musical orgies own as the London Ballad Concerts took place at Queen's ll. Mme. Lillian Blauvelt, Miss Louise Dale, Mme. ra Butt, Miss Ada Crossley, Miss Edna Thornton and ssrs. Plunket Greene, Whitworth Milton and Ivor Fos- were the singers, treating their audience to some and a half hours of uninterrupted ballads, good, bad indifferent.

During the week the Carl Rosa Opera Company has been forming at the Coronet Theatre. The only incident of e was the first London performance given by this com- y of "Siegfried." The undertaking was little short of oic, and though the performance was not above criti- m, perhaps naturally enough, seeing that it is a touring npany, it was, upon the whole, very satisfactory. E. C. dmondt's Siegfried was a particularly good performance. sang the music splendidly and acted well from begin- g to end. Most conductors, by the way, have to com- in that performers do not pay sufficient attention to the t. Mime seemed to have taken this to heart, and never, parently, did anything else, which rendered his actions her trying after a time. The staging was good, though or two hitches occurred. The anvil, for instance, was impressed by the virtues of Nothung that it fell in two g before the sword was half forged. The orchestra, wever, was very good, and Mr. Goosens proved an ad- able conductor. The company certainly deserves all dit for its enterprise.

A Saenger Pupil's Success in Opera.

MRS. MARIE RAPPOLD sang the leading role in the production of Strauss' opera, "Die Fledermaus," by Arion Society, of Brooklyn, at the Arion Hall and also he Amphion Theatre, and scored a great success, as the owing notices testify:

e palm of the evening belonged undoubtedly to Mme. Marie pold as Rosalind. She sang brilliantly, played brilliantly and e a brilliant appearance.—Brooklyner Herold (translation).

Mme. Marie Rappold Mr. Claassen had, above all things, a alind than whom no director could wish a better or more beauti- one. Madame Rappold achieved a great success. She looked a goddess and acted and sang magnificently. Oscar Saenger well be proud of this pupil.—Brooklyner Freie Presse (transla-).

e Rosalind was Mme. Marie Rappold. Her lovely, sympathetic onality and her fine vocal work undoubtedly added greatly to success of the performance.—New York Staats Zeitung (trans- n).

any of the opera houses might consider themselves fortunate to such a Rosalind as this charming Madame Rappold, who is histrionically and vocally so excellent. She has an elegant ap- ance, and in costume and carriage was just the grande dame the part demanded.—New Yorker Herold (translation).

EVERN-WALKER RECEPTION DAYS.—Mr. and Mrs. Ed- d Severn and Francis Walker have issued cards for uesdays" during the season at the Van Dyck studios. reception hours are 4 to 7 p. m. These artists are tly interested in a school opened this autumn, where all nches of music are taught after methods that appeal eason and the artist sense.

THE SAAR CONCERT.

LOUIS SAAR gave a concert of his own compositions in Carnegie Lyceum last Friday evening. This was the program:

Variations and Fugue, op. 29
First prize, Boston, 1899.

Songs—
Thränen (MS.).
Sternlein, op. 19, No. 1.
Der Schwur (MS.).
Liebesfahrt (MS.).
Gefunden (MS.).
Miss Edith R. Chapman.

Piano soli—
Prelude.
Elegie.
Kleine Romanze.
Rhapsodie.

Songs—
Abends, op. 16, No. 4.
Für Dich, op. 24, No. 4.
Harfenmädchens Lied, op. 14, No. 2.
Liebesquell, op. 24, No. 2.
Miss Edith R. Chapman.

Piano soli—
Berceuse, op. 22, No. 4.
A la Valse, op. 25, No. 4.
Etude, op. 28, No. 3.
Walzer, op. 28, No. 1.

The Variation and Fugue were reviewed at length in THE MUSICAL COURIER. In performance the euphonious treatment of the instrument, without any attempt at mere color massing, gave to the composition a less austere character than a casual reading suggested. And the composer played the work with abundant technical skill. The other piano soli are all cast in an agreeable formal mold. The Prelude, Rhapsodie and Walzer are interesting specimens of fanciful invention, melodic gracefulness and unaffected idiom. Mr. Saar struck a deeper note in his Elegie, though in this particular the Brahms influence was apparent.

Of the songs there can be but one verdict: they are full of unaffected charm and lyric impulse. "Gefunden," "Für Dich," "Liebesquell," "Thränen," these are gems romantic in color, movement, feeling. Saar's leanings are ultra modern, yet he has not lost his native note of personality. Miss Chapman did full justice to her numbers. and was sympathetically accompanied by the composer. There was present a fair sized and very appreciative audience.

Gerardy in Philadelphia.

THAT Gérardy is a remarkable artist was the universal opinion of all who heard this wondrously gifted young Belgian 'cello virtuoso play in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon last with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. After his playing of the Lalo Concerto he was recalled six times, and an encore would have been insisted upon by the over enthusiastic audience, but they knew the rules of the orchestra forbade it. Gérardy was also the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at their second concert in the Academy of Music in Philadelphia. The papers on the following morning said the following about him:

First in point of interest in last night's program comes the playing of the Lalo concerto by the Belgian 'cellist, Jean Gérardy. It is only a few years since Mr. Gérardy was playing in this country as a juvenile prodigy, but there is nothing to remind one of those days now. He is no longer juvenile, either in appearance or in playing. He handles his instrument like a master, his tone is large, round and of beautiful quality. He has temperament, too, though he uses it with admirable discretion. He impresses one as a man with a wholesomely poetic mind, and so well equipped technically that he can express the most delicate shades of thought with the greatest ease and accuracy. His playing of the concerto was remarkable for the lovely quality of his cantabile, for perfect accuracy and the freedom and ease of his bowing. He was recalled again and again by an audience that was plainly captivated by his playing.—Ledger, Philadelphia, November 7, 1901.

Lacking the potency of Wagner, disarranged for concert purposes and also the vogue of the first series, the first concert of the second series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra drew a small audience to a chilly auditorium at the Academy of Music last evening to hear a delightful soloist, an artist of the first rank, Gérardy, the 'cellist, in a legitimate orchestral program, in which Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A major was easily first in interest.

Lalo's concerto is a work that is not long drawn out, and the melodic beauties, as well as its harmonic and rhythmic background, have a certain exotic effect, which, however, are quite in the vernacular of the 'cello. Gérardy is a most satisfying artist. His tone is of a beautiful singing quality, ravishing in the broad, sweeping cantilena and always sure and pure and mellow. The concerto is a charming work and the rendering was thoroughly in its spirit and a revelation of true art.—Philadelphia Press, November 7, 1901.

The Wednesday night concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was a symphony concert, rightly so called. Its two distinctive features were the 'cello concerto of Lalo, played by Jean Gérardy, and a particularly interesting performance of the beautiful Seventh Symphony of Beethoven. The Lalo composition is exceedingly poetical and charming, rich and varied in color and full of admirable invention, and Gérardy played it with an exquisite sentiment and with the firm and fluent style, the facile execution and the unaffected grace of a master. His performance was so entirely satisfying, and its fine art was made vital by such an individual charm of lyrical expression that it left an impression quite unusual. The virtuosity of the orchestra in this work was scarcely less remarkable than that of the soloist, and equally to be remarked was the tasteful appreciation with which Mr. Gericke conducted it.—Times, Philadelphia, Pa., November 7, 1901.

BROUNOFF RUSSIAN LECTURE RECITALS.—Platon Brounoff gave last week his celebrated lecture, with musical illustrations on Russian life and music, at Bay Ridge, Brooklyn. some 2,000 people being present, with standing room only. Mr. Brounoff sang, gave many interesting experiences, illustrated with happy anecdotes, and Miss Clara Gorn, soprano, a pupil of his, also sang.

Mr. Brounoff amplifies this lecture recital, using his Russian Capella, in peasant costume, to sing the weird and sad Russian folksongs, and this form of the entertainment always pleases. He can also furnish a solo quartet alone. to illustrate.

MARY D. PEARCE.—Miss Mary D. Pearce, solo soprano of the Irvington Presbyterian Church, Irvington, N. Y., is a young woman who will before long gain distinction in her chosen profession. She possesses a truly beautiful soprano voice of great range, with a clear, bell-like quality of tone. Her musical ability is inherited, her father, James Pearce being organist of St. Michael's Protestant Episcopal Church, New York. Last Sunday night Miss Pearce and Irving Stewart, the tenor, sang Stainer's duet, "Love Divine, All Love Excelling," at a musical service held in St. Michael's.

GOODRICH AT THE GUILMANT SCHOOL.—A. J. Goodrich has been engaged by the Guilmant Organ School to teach a class in harmony, beginning Thursday afternoon of this week at 2:45 o'clock. The large experience of Mr. Goodrich in theory work makes this an opportunity of rare advantage to all students contemplating the study of harmony. Application for membership can be made to Mr. Carl previous to the lesson. A class in musical analysis under Mr. Goodrich's tutorship was formed last Thursday, with a large enrollment of students. The first monthly organ recital of the present season will be given at an early date.

A LAMBERT PUPIL.—Gussie Zuckerman, the talented young pianist, a pupil of Alex. Lambert, has been engaged to play at the fourth Young People's Symphony concert, under Frank Damrosch's direction.

"LES BARBARES" AGAIN.

PARIS, OCTOBER 24, 1901.

I THOUGHT as much. Saint-Saëns, the accomplished stylist, the dilettante, has not taken that step into the chaotic untidyness of Germanic-horde days which was expected by a certain few of his admirers, when it was announced that "Les Barbares" was to be the next opera of "France's favorite son." The author of that expression must have been in Paris on a Saint-Saëns first night to have fashioned it so cleverly.

The house was packed last night, not one seat being available after 2 o'clock in the afternoon, and anyone who held places and could not go had a good investment. One lady asked 100 francs. She never got any further than the asking. When the curtain went down on the last act the audience made a bolt for the doors and then stopped, cheering and growling in the same breath. The cheers were for the man, the growl for the composer. There is no doubt musical France is disappointed, and the press is almost unanimous in decrying the new opera. It is a nice opera, but power is conspicuous by its absence ("banal" expression).

The Barbarians are not the wicked-uncle variety one reads about in histories of Rome and France (in the early part of the book before it gets dull), but then history is notoriously inexact. That fact has been proved once again. The Barbarians who softly trod the operatic wilds last night were gentle, well behaved creatures, who came up with the sweetest of smiles, when called, and ran away waving a tin hatchet and paper battle axe when their chief "shoo"-ed them off their legitimate prey. The book is by Victorien Sardou and P. B. Ghensi, a literary man from Toulon. It entirely comes up to Saint-Saëns' own remark that "any dramatic situation is capable of being set to music." This is "any" situation.

The composer's hatred of all things Wagnerian, legends, symbols, &c., is well known, but if he would look at Wagner with less prejudice he might be able to pick out a few of the ideas which form the basis of the great German's fame, and I am sure his work would not suffer in consequence. The overture is in pure symphonic form, reviewing the best motives—of which there are a few, though some of the critics deny it—in a highly skillful contrapuntal manner. It is broken by the prologue's reciting, as in the old Greek plays, the story of the action which is to follow, after which the symphony is resumed.

The curtain rises for the first act on the terrified vestals and women of the City of Orange in Roman Gaul gathered close round the altar, where burns the undying flame of the patron goddess, Vesta. The high priestess, the Vestal Virgin, Floria, alone remains calm, for to her Vesta had promised the city's deliverance. However, the goddess seems to have lost her power, for the watcher on the wall comes down and tells how the Romans are beaten and Euryalus, one of the consuls, killed.

Livia, the wife of Euryalus, asks "Who killed Cock Robin," but the watcher did not see, and Livia swears to discover the slayer and kill him with the piece of javelin she extracted from the dead consul's wound. Here the Barbares come in to the only highly exciting music in the opera. As usual they look for their victims everywhere but where they really are. On discovery of the priestess and the other women they make a dash forward, wave their weapons and wait for further orders. The slaughter bids fair to be as well arranged as Armour's factory on killing day.

The Barbarians (Parisians every man Jack of them) proceed to cry "A mort," which makes Vesta in the form of the flame jump. This startles Marcomir, who asks Floria who she is to thus invoke the Goddess of Fire. Floria, of course, tells him and he his warriors "sit-up-Fido," by calling them "dogs and sons of dogs." They go off with their tails, or rather those of their bearskins, between their legs, and you can hear them muttering "Isn't he rude?" Marcomir remains entranced by the beauty of Floria, and the curtain goes down.

The second act shows the vestal and her sister priestesses grouped around the altar of their goddess, and in the background is the old amphitheatre of Orange, from which M. Ghensi got the idea. This is a lovely anachronism, an intentional one I believe, why I don't know. Floria wishes to be alone in order to be able to think, but as soon as the other women have gone she says "cuckoo" and Marcomir comes to see her.

He tells her he loves her and will spare the city if she will be his wife (sic.) She gets mad and says she is vowed to Vesta, but "il s'en foue," and she finds out that it would be rather jolly to save the city in such a manner. The act ends with an exquisite duo between Marcomir and Floria.

The third and last act opens with the population on their knees in gratitude to Floria for her sacrifice, but she is honest enough to confess that she did not object and that she is married (the old story) to Marcomir, with whom she is going away. For her companion she chooses Livia, who finds Orange dull since her husband got himself killed. Marcomir asks who was the husband of Livia and Floria tells him it was Euryalus. He is quite shocked and says he believes he had something to do with that, but he had met so many people in the course of his barbarian career that really he could not remember. Of course, this was only an excuse. Floria, after this confession, tells Livia that the Germanic atmosphere is not healthy and she had better stay behind to hang wreaths on Eurylaus' tombstone. Livia "smells a rat," so to speak, and accuses Marcomir of having struck her husband in the back.

"Tu mens," he replies, "c'était au cœur." "Au cœur donc," says Livia, sheathing the broken javelin point in the Barbarian's breast.

Then she exclaims "I have avenged my husband" and the curtain drops.

That is the play. As for the music, it does its best to lighten up an exceedingly weak book. The instrumentation is perfect throughout, some beautiful oboe and violin themes making themselves heard above the contrapuntal web of harmony. Saint-Saëns always retains his old love of melody in this day of realistic opera, when beauty is eliminated in favor of erudite dissonances called originality. The vengeance theme and the Vesta motive are full of interest and wonderfully handled.

The first act is stiff and severe. One would almost think the composer wished to contrast the beginning with the meeting of Marcomir and Floria.

But throughout the whole opera there is a great charm of exquisite phrases and delightful harmonies.

There is a lovely phrase in the violins accompanying Marcomir's question to Floria, and also in the oboes and horns to the goddess' response, but the most beautiful in the whole opera is where Marcomir contemplates in silence the Vestal, Floria.

In the second act the love duet is the "clou," a true inspiration, by a marvel of technical skill knitted in with "Invocation to Venus," as before sung by Livia. The curtain falls on the pair in each others arms.

The last act, from a musical point of view, is not interesting; in the farandole a theme of four bars is repeated twenty-four times running, and becomes decidedly monotonous.

The funeral march of Euryalus is like all the rest, more or less barbaric in quality.

If you forget the story and close your eyes, you can enjoy an evening's symphony concert very nicely, but if you try to imagine anything very wild about it, you will need a much livelier imagination than is possessed by yours truly. Livia was splendidly played and sung by Heglon, Delmas perfect as Scaurus, and Vaguet's voice sounded beautifully rich and full in the exquisite solos and duos imparted to Marcomir.

ARTHUR BLES.

THE LEHMANN SONG RECITAL.

MME. LILLI LEHMANN, formerly a well-kn Wagner singer, gave a song recital at Carn Hall last Friday afternoon. During the course of an l she sang, with great difficulty, songs by Schubert, Ber Schumann and Loewe. Mercifully short as was the p gram, it was much too long for this singer. The rea is a simple one—Lehmann has no longer any voic any breathing power. Time is cruel and art is long; Lehmann has not allowed herself to believe that she is the same woman who electrified us in 1885 with Brünnhilde. If she pleaded poverty or even posed a exponent of lieder literature, we would perforce be sil But she is not an object of charity, being a rich wom she has enjoyed successes innumerable during her t years in public, and she never was and never will b lieder singer. Ten years ago she would have scouted notion herself as being beneath her dignity as a g Wagner interpreter. And yet when her voice is gone, dramatic powers on the wane, her enunciation that very young or very aged person, she essays an art demands of a singer voice, passion, poetry—the l Lehmann never possessed, only overweening brillian delicacy, finished vocal art and extreme versatility. Lehmann sings everything alike; her Schubert sou like her Schumann, her Berlioz like her Loewe.

But indiscreet friends tell her that her voice is as it a decade ago, that she has never sung so gloriously, lo so well as this season. The pity, the cruel pity of it. At a time when most women of her profession are imp ing to their pupils the mysteries of their art, this in ably ambitious woman insists on singing in public tho every nerve and muscle are in revolt, though her th plays such pranks as must make the recording angel high hide his face. The recital last Friday was one culated to send Lehmann's old admirers shivering to t homes. She had no breath. She leaned against the p and—such is her indomitable will power—forced herse sing, or rather cackle, for what else were the noises made in "Waldesgespräch"? Schubert's "Die Allma was a colorless attempt, from which all the voice had squeezed. "Du bist die Ruh," one of the most tr songs ever written, exhausted the concert giver so she could hardly whisper her way through "Auf Wasser" and "Die Sterne." Two ugly songs by Ber one in the mock antique style—"L'Absence," Barca and an arioso from "The Damnation of Faust"—wer sawdust in the singer's mouth. Her best number "Der Nussbaum," which was given with a sort of fa sweetness and was hardly distinguishable. Worst of all Madame Lehmann's enunciation, which even Mr. K biel found unbearable in his Tribune criticism. Ce structural changes in her mouth and palate could, h ever, account for this shortcoming; a novel one, for l mann in the early times could enunciate with remark clearness. Loewe's "Des Glöckenthurmer's Töchter" is not for a singer of Lehmann's style. It suffered comparison with Sembrich's charming interpretation season. The coup de glotte was often heard. But a v without color, resonance, beauty, cannot be pressed service, though the art guiding it be wonderful, an we said before, Lehmann was not a great lieder singe her palmy days. The pity of it all!

MARY JORDEN BAKER.—Miss Mary Jorden Bake talented pupil of Professor Scherhey, sang with great cess at a tea given by the Poliklinik members at the A Hall on Thursday, November 7. This young singer made wonderful progress since last season. She D'Hardelot's "Mignon," and "Soupir," by Bemberg. I method and style Miss Baker showed the results of study under Scherhey. She is a conscientious and studi pupil. Already she has a number of engagements for early winter.

BALTIMORE.

BALTIMORE, November 10, 1901.

WE have had three concerts within the past four days, the first Boston Symphony at Music Hall Tuesday, the Kneisels and Mr. Randolph at the Pea- y Wednesday, and Katharine Fisk at the second Pea- y recital Friday.

he Boston Symphony concert was a brilliant affair in ery sense. The audience was the largest and most inguished ever seen in Music Hall, except at the dedi- on of our great concert hall, the occasion, also, of an al Boston Symphony. Never has the great organiza- been heard to better advantage than in the rendition he rather unique Wagner program, comprising the rture, "Bacchanale," and scene between Tannhäuser Venus from the first act (Paris version); Walter's ize Song" from "Die Meistersinger"; Siegfried's ing from Brünnhilde, Siegfried's Death, Funeral ch and closing scene from "Die Götterdämmerung." r. Gericke proved himself more thoroughly in sym- y with Wagner than ever before, and the orchestra ed with splendid abandon. Milka Ternina and Elli- Van Hoose were the soloists. Ternina was very suc- ful. Mr. Van Hoose completely eradicated the im- sion made here last year. His is a beautiful organ, he proved himself a most satisfying artist, singing conviction, taste and authority.

he Kneisel program included the Haydn D minor g Quartet, op. 64, No. 5; two movements from César ck's String Quartet in D major and the Dvorák o Quintet, A major, op. 81. The Dvorák Quintet delightfully played, with perfect sympathy of purpose finish of execution. Mr. Randolph's eminent quali- as pianist and ensemble player have been repeatedly ed in these and other columns, nor can they be rated.

tharine Fisk's program was as follows:

on's Hymn	Beethoven
insamkeit	Brahms
nation	De Fontenailles
Wiedersehen	Nevin
rnacht	Hollaender
en's songs—
e Walking Bell	Schumann
e Discontented Duckling	Gaynor
ttle Boy Blue	Nevin
tzemann	Taubert
uring Zephyrs	Jensen
Throstle	White
er Boat	Gaynor
apanese Love Song	Thomas
arias from Samson and Delilah	Saint-Saëns Fair Spring Is Returning.
Oh Love of Thy Power.
Softly Awakes My Heart.

s. Fisk is the possessor of a noble organ, of rich and athetic timbre, and she has an admirable legato and ess enunciation.

e first group of songs was beautifully sung, though the "Creation Hymn" is impossible of satisfying reading by one voice because of its extraordinary demands for breadth.

The children's songs were charmingly done.

On Monday, October 28, a concert was given at Heptasophs' Hall by Mrs. J. E. Barkworth, the wife of the new teacher of organ at the Peabody Conservatory.

The program consisted chiefly of compositions by Mr. Barkworth, and they prove him to be a most welcome addition to Baltimore's serious musicians.

A 'Cello Sonata in C minor, played by the composer and Fritz Mueller, was received with much appreciation.

The most interesting of the compositions heard is a truly delightful cycle of songs, entitled "A Fateful Holiday," the texts being drawn from W. E. Henley's "Book of Verses." They are a charming setting of some beautiful stanzas, and form a grateful addition to the baritone's repertory.

Dr. B. Merrill Hopkinson, who was in splendid voice, proved himself an ideal interpreter of them.

Mrs. Barkworth sang a scene from Racine's "Andromaque," written by her husband; Schumann's "Waldesgepracht," "Mondnacht" and "Die Soldatenbraut"; a serenade from Gounod's "Biondina"; "Dokka," Emil Jessen, and "Oh, Can Ye Sew Cushions," Helen Hopekirk.

Mrs. Barkworth is a singer of interpretative rather than vocal gifts. Her work reflects a warm temperament and a keen appreciation of the musical content of a composition. A tendency to force the tone above the key detracted from her singing, while her exceptional linguistic ability and beautiful enunciation were admirable features.

The singer was most happy in her rendition of the Gounod serenade and the Norwegian song, which were charmingly sung.

Dr. Hopkinson joined Mrs. Barkworth in closing the concert with that delightful duet from Stanford's music to Tennyson's "Becket."

A FUND FOR JADASSOHN.

TORONTO, November 7, 1901.

Editors The Musical Courier:

IT was with deep regret that I heard that my revered teacher, the famous composer, Dr. S. Jadassohn, of Leipsic, has unfortunately lost money, if not all his savings, through the failure of a Leipsic banking house, and finds himself at an advanced age—when he should be taking life easier, deprived of the security afforded by the savings of many years—financially stranded.

It has occurred to me that if his many pupils in America knew of this, and some one of them would take the matter in hand, set the ball rolling, so to speak—they would gladly contribute to a fund, which amount could be forwarded to Dr. Jadassohn later. Christmas, which is but a short distance off, would be very opportune for this, and if THE MUSICAL COURIER will act as treasurer (pro tem.) of this fund, I will have pleasure in forwarding my modest offering as a first subscription. Sincerely,

W. O. FORSYTH.

Whitney Tew Sings in Boston.

H. WHITNEY TEW made his first appearance in Boston last Wednesday evening in a song recital at Chickering Hall. His reception at the close of the recital was most enthusiastic. Mr. Tew is to sing again in Boston with the Handel and Haydn Society in their performance of "The Messiah" on Christmas night. The following are some of the criticisms received in the daily papers on the day after his recital:

Whitney Tew gave a song recital last evening in Chickering Hall, Isidor Luckstone accompanying.

Mr. Tew has a very beautiful bass voice, with brilliant high and rich low notes. He sings in tune; he phrases musically; he enunciates with remarkable distinctness. Furthermore, he sings with both temperament and feeling, sharply defining every passing mood of the composer. The Händel and Mozart arias Mr. Tew sang beautifully. In Loehr's Irish song, too, he was very successful, and Maude Valerie White's song he had to repeat.

Mr. Tew is to be thanked for arranging so unhackneyed a program.—Boston Transcript, Thursday, November 7, 1901.

H. Whitney Tew, the American basso, who has passed a good deal of recent time professionally in England, appeared last evening at Chickering Hall, where he presented this extended and diversified program, touching those extremes of classicality and modernity which artists like to touch, and incidentally requiring the use of three languages besides his own, to say nothing of an English midland dialect and Irish brogue.

* * * Here is a strangely and impressively beautiful voice. Perfectly equable in calibre and timbre from the low C, through an upward range of two octaves, with an added note, perhaps, at top, it has a velvety sweetness, which threatens at first to be too soft and sweet, just as its methodical imperfection seems likely to be a certain openness of tone which degenerates into diffuseness. But there is a sturdy tenacity under the gentle seeming tone, and there is a further reserved power of concentration able to impart solid resonance or a vibratory ring when the moment comes.

The Saint-Saëns ballad was picturesquely told, with the right light cast on its knightly incidents of the joust, the youth's death, his mournful obsequies as "preux chevalier," and the gay homegoing of the victorious and the festive. The "In Memoriam" may be accounted a triumph. We have already cited the Whitman songs. The light things which went with them amused and charmed. The odd rustic ballad and the Irish song were made very light and piquant by that half voice, as the pensive things were made gentle, while the Chaminade song ended the evening with a merry ring.—Boston Herald, Thursday, November 7, 1901.

The recital of popular classical songs by Whitney Tew at Chickering Hall last evening was one of rare interest and enjoyment to a lover and student of music. The hall was well filled, and the close attention and appreciation shown by the audience to the singer was very flattering. From the beginning to the end of the program every one was charmed by the range and quality of Mr. Tew's voice. Mr. Tew opened his program with a song by Bach, which was followed by selections from Mozart, Saint-Saëns, Brahms and Schumann. Perhaps the vocalist's greatest effort of the evening was his rendition of "In Memoriam." It was of considerable length and displayed the talents of the singer to a marked degree. Following this were others by Charles Wood, Herman Lohr, Maude Valerie White and Chaminade. Reinhold Herman was at the piano.—Boston Daily Globe, Thursday, November 7, 1901.

ADELAIDE C. OKELL recently presented the following students' program, which is a fair sample of the class of pupils and the work she obtains from them:

Capriccio Brillante.....Mendelssohn
Miss Lichtenauer.
Polonaise, op. 26, No. 1.....Chopin
Miss Sayce.
Concerto (first movement).....Schumann
Miss Ruth M. Wilson.
An den Frühling.....Grieg
Venetian Love Song.....Nevin
Miss Schley.
Hungarian Rhapsodie, No. 2, for four players.....Liszt
First piano, Misses Quimby and Meeker; second piano, Misses Gordon and Hull.

Of Miss Wilson her teacher is particularly proud. This pianist is a teacher herself, having a good class in Glen Ridge, N. J. Miss Okell, who teaches the Carreño method, having been Madame Carreño's pupil several seasons, makes a specialty of ensemble playing, having two fine pianos in her studio.

P. A. Schnecker recently gave an organ recital at the West Presbyterian Church, of Forty-second street, where he has officiated for thirty years past, playing a program consisting of these works, in part: Symphonic poem, "Orphée," Liszt; overture to "William Tell," Rossini; Intermezzo, Elegy and Postlude "Cradle Song," "Reverie" and "Nachspiel," these six by himself, all as yet in MSS.; overture to "Der Freischütz," Von Weber; March, Guilmant.

This was one of the regular monthly entertainments arranged for the Young Men's Association of the church, and the new soprano, Mrs. Mary Hoag-Haughey, assisted, singing a song by Schnecker, "Father, to Thy Kind Love We Owe," from his cantata, "Faithful of God." Glancing through this work the writer was struck by the merit of the bass solo from the same work, "Thou Art With Me," and recommends it to church bassos.

At Mrs. Charlotte Babcock's handsome studio recently the writer had the pleasure of hearing some new singers, as well as some new songs, in part as follows: Walter B. Ball, baritone, a man with a most expressive voice, full of personal magnetism, sang Nevin's "Mon Desir" and White's "King Charles," the latter a rousing old-time English song. He should be a first-class church singer.

Charles Frank sang two German lieder, Franz's "Aus meinem grossen Schmerzen" and Grieg's "Ich liebe Dich"; he, too, has a sonorous voice, but must improve his English enunciation. He sang these lieder in English.

Miss Clodie Jordan, from Mobile, Ala., sang some new songs by Josephine Ware, which have been mentioned in these columns. They are soon to be issued, and show the composer to be of inventive fertility of mind, with much ardor of imagination. The "Fay Song" and "Joy of the Morning" I liked particularly, for they have much go in them, with a rushing piano accompaniment, on this occasion played by Miss Ware herself. Miss Jordan sings with intelligence and spirit.

Miss C. M. Demorest, a sister of Mrs. Elizabeth Leonard, and bearing a decided resemblance to her, sang some Scotch songs, which I understand she does usually in costume, when their effect is much heightened. This young woman has much spirit, and her enunciation is especially distinct and commendable. Their simplicity, and the really charming manner in which Miss Demorest sang, made them effective.

Jessie Mae Baker, of Ossining, sang in splendid fashion Holden's "Nearer, My God, to Thee," making much of this semi-operatic thing. Miss Baker has a high and clear soprano voice, and some church will do well to obtain this voice, for it is exceptional indeed.

Last, but not least, petite Fannie Jordan, sister of the singer, recited some things by Lanier, with piano obligato by Miss Ware. This young girl is a budding dramatic talent.

Harold O. Smith, of Columbus, Ohio, studied some years in the Berlin Hochschule, and last March located here. He is a college man, and knows French well, and this accomplishment it was which landed him as organist at the French P. E. Church of the Saint Esprit. He has composed quite a bit, plays accompaniments and intends to make a specialty of this. Knowing German also, it will be seen this young man begins the musical life here with much more than the usual capacity. He has been introduced in various ways by Mrs. Hadden-Alexander, which introduction has, of course, carried weight.

J. Warren Andrews sends THE MUSICAL COURIER a program of one of his organ recitals of last week, which he spent in the West, this recital in Delaware, Ohio, at the Wesleyan School of Music, at Gray Chapel. He played the Bach Toccata and Fugue, Martini's Gavot in F, Boellman's Gothic Suite, Guilmant's "Funeral March" and "Seraphic Chant," and a group of smaller pieces by Händel, Guilmant. Thomas and Widor; also his own "Reveries of Home." Further reference to this tour in another issue.

Pianist William H. Barber has been already engaged for a series of concerts in April, in a Southern recital tour, on his way to his annual Mexico, Mo., College engagement of a month's duration. He will play in Virginia, at the Charleston Exposition, in the Indian Territory, Little Rock, Ark., Kansas City and St. Louis. Right after the holidays he will give a recital for the benefit of the West Side Day Nursery, under distinguished auspices.

Robert Kent Parker is attracting attention to himself as a young baritone of exceptional merit. He recently sang at Holyoke, Mass., and judging from the press notices quoted below made a success. To-morrow, Thursday, he will sing on the battleship Kearsarge with Mrs. Elizabeth Leonard and Miss Burr. The notices:

Mr. Parker has a fine bass voice, well trained, and of his songs the greatest favor was for "A Border Ballad," by Cowen. The audience went very enthusiastic over it, and here he gave an encore, an Irish song, "The Little Plaid Shawl."—Exchange.

Robert Kent Parker is a stranger to the local musical world, but his splendid achievements in all his solos last evening placed him high in the estimation of those that heard him. He possesses a voice of great richness and strength and his range is unusually broad. His high notes are smooth and clear and his style and expression truly artistic. He was obliged to respond to several encores.—Exchange.

The soprano, Alice Breen, writes this paper asking a denial of the report that she is or was under financial indebtedness to a former teacher. She says: "I have always had my own lovely friends, who have long been interested in my welfare."

Obituary.

Lillian Irene Bailey Henschel?

"MRS. LILLIAN IRENE BAILEY HENSCHEL, wife of Georg Henschel, the composer, died in London, November 4. Mrs. Henschel was born in Columbus, Ohio, about forty years ago. As a child she showed musical talent and was carefully educated. Later her family removed to Boston, and there she continued her musical studies. Before she was twenty years old Miss Bailey made a successful début as a concert soprano. She sang for several years in public here and then went abroad, where she studied in Paris with Mme. Viardot Garcia, and in London with Georg Henschel. Mr. Henschel and Miss Bailey were married in 1881. It proved a very happy union. The Henschels made numerous tours in the United States since they made London their permanent home. Mrs. Henschel died from the effects of an operation."

The above is taken from despatches to the daily papers and has not yet been confirmed. Relatives of Mrs. Henschel in Boston have not yet been notified of her death.

James G. Peakes.

James G. Peakes, an operatic tenor of the old régime, died last Wednesday at the Post-Graduate Hospital in this city, after an operation. Born in Boston in 1841, Peakes made a reputation as a boy soprano. His voice in early manhood developed into a tenor. He studied for opera and sang in rotation with the Holman Opera Company, the Caroline Ritchings Company, with Clara Louise Kellogg and then with Emma Abbott. Leaving grand opera, Peakes sang with Lillian Russell in comic opera, and at the time of his last illness was in the employ of George W. Lederer, at the Casino. The deceased is survived by his brother, Henry G. Peakes, a basso.

Henry M. Aiken.

Henry M. Aiken, whose death is announced as having occurred in Boston on the 4th inst. was for many years a prominent vocalist. At the age of twenty-two he made his début as soloist in Händel's "Samson," given in 184[illegible] by the Handel and Haydn Society, of which he was a member. At the same early age he became connected with the quartet choir of Trinity Church, then under the direction of A. [illegible] Hayter. With the exception of one or two brief interims when he resided in New York, his connection with Trinity Church music lasted for a period of nearly fifty years. Mr. Aiken was also one of the original members of the Apollo Club of that city and sang with them for sixteen years.

Frank Henry Simms.

Frank Henry Simms, a prominent Southern organist, died last Wednesday at his home in New Orleans. He was forty-eight years old. Simms was born in Staffordshire, England. He studied under Sir George McFarram, at the Royal Academy of Music, London, where in his early manhood he became distinguished as an organist and choir conductor. On account of failing health, Simms was advised to remove to a warmer climate. He came to this country and settled permanently in New Orleans. At the time of his last illness he held the position of organist at St. Paul's Episcopal Church and the Jewish Temple Sinai and director of music at Newcomb College.

AMERICAN SCHOOL OF OPERA.

ON Thursday, November 7, the pupils of the American School of Opera gave its first public performance of season at the Herald Square Theatre. The house was nfortably filled, and in the audience were a number of atrical managers who were on the lookout for promis- singers. Quite a few vocal teachers were present, and appeared extremely interested in the work of the pupils the school. This is not surprising, for without interfer- with the teachers the school opens the way to many portunities beyond the reach of the ordinary vocal dent.

The curtain rose on "The Marriage of Jeannette," a act comic opera by Victor Massé, which had specially n adapted from the French for the school.

The cast was as follows:

nette, a village maiden.....Miss Ruth Peebles
, her lover.....Andreas Schneider
t Pierre, her cousin.....Miss Violet Wilton mas, a villager.....Charles Hillman
Chorus of villagers, &c.

he scene is laid in Jean's house in a French village.

Miss Peebles has been engaged for H. W. Savage's ing Dodo" Company, and this was her last appearance h the American School of Opera. She will, no doubt, ceed in comic opera, but ought not attempt to sing in nd opera. Mr. Schneider has a fine voice, and uses it ll, but he must devote more time to the study of acting. xt was sung the third act of "Aida," with the following t:

a.....Miss Pauline Johnson
neris.....Miss Edna Stern nafis.....Sylvester Ritter onasro.....Sinclair Gore
dames.....Ray Woodruff
Soldiers and maids of honor.

he action takes place at Memphis and Thebes.

Miss Johnson, who is a pupil of Miss Emma Howson, ng and acted the part well. Her voice is true and well ined, and she does not misuse it. Mr. Gore possesses ine, high baritone, and his acting is far beyond that of average amateur. Mr. Woodruff, who sang Rha- nes, has a good voice and displayed considerable abil- "Cavalleria Rusticana" was next given by the fol- ving members of the school:

tuzza.....Miss Maria Strakosch
a, Alfio's wife.....Miss Cecelia Quinn ia, Turiddu's mother.....Miss Jennie Flower Crosse
o, a teamster.....Andreas Schneider
iddu.....Joseph Smith
Chorus of villagers, peasants, flower girls, &c.

he scene is laid in Sicily on Easter morn.

Miss Strakosh's performance of Santuzza held the at- tion of her audience, but it was somewhat marred by r walk, which is noticeably odd, to say the least.

Mr. Smith's Turiddu was flawless. His voice is beautiful d his acting finished.

As a whole the various performances were distinctly od, and Mr. Stewart and the school are to be con- tulated on the progress made by their pupils.

Alma Powell in St. Petersburg.

THE Petersburger Zeitung of October 12 (25th) writes:

"Her voice and art are wonderful. The quality, color- ura and phenomenal range of this voice will everywhere cure her a grateful audience. Alma Powell possesses wonderful range, from the low G to the high F. At the ne time the voice is very expansive in the cantilene, and o in the low register, which is somewhat veiled.

"The coloratura, which the artist seems to have devel- ed with especial care, cannot be criticised, except that en the most perfect coloratura cannot imitate the trill of ird. Our guest also possesses excellent dramatic ability, hich is supported by appropriate facial expression.

"Each time when this voice rose to its extreme height, hich is provided exclusively for vocal bravura, a murmur astonishment and admiration swept through the audi- ence—this acme of acknowledgment, dearer to the true artist than the loudest bravo.

"Alma Powell had to repeat the 'Kinderlieder.' She was interrupted by spontaneous applause in the 'Variations on the Scala Diatonica' and the 'Valse,' which was sung with the most subtle grace and perfect bravura."

All of these compositions were written for Alma Powell by the eminent composer, Eugenio von Pirañi, who showed not only a remarkable understanding of the voice but as well a refined and pleasing inventive talent.

Van Hoose Wins Laurels With the Boston Symphony.

THE appended notices are extracts from the criticisms of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, written by the critics in New York, Boston, Philadelphia and Baltimore, in praise of the work done by Ellison Van Hoose, in connection with Madame Ternina, in the first tour of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra:

It was a pleasure to hear an American born tenor at these concerts. Mr. Van Hoose has an excellent voice, clear, robust, yet which lends itself easily to appeals of a gentler nature. He has the endurance which is needed imperatively in such concerts; he controls the long, broad phrase, and he is not wanting in finesse, as was shown in "Siegfried's Death." It was his first appearance at these concerts. Let us hope that it will not be his last.—Philip Hale, in Boston Journal, November 3.

Mr. Van Hoose sang remarkably well. He has an unusually good voice of heroic character, with beautiful high notes. In the excerpt from "Tannhäuser" he was admirable. This long scene, with the cruelly high tenor part, he sung in tune, with an admirable legato, with musical phrasing and with warmth; at the end there was no sign of exhaustion, the high A ringing out clear, strong and brilliant. There are few tenors on the German stage to-day who could carry the scene through so successfully.—William Apthorp, in Boston Transcript, November 4.

We were especially delighted with the work of Ellison Van Hoose, who sang with a steadiness and a purity of intonation that is not always present in a Wagnerian performance. We heartily enjoyed Mr. Van Hoose's interpretation of the "Prize Song," from "The Mastersingers." There was something of Alvary's earnestness in the performance, and we did not wonder at the enthusiastic recalls that followed. Here one finds the full glory of Wagner an everlasting rebuke to those who cry out that he was incapable of creating melody.—Boston Advertiser, November 4.

Ellison Van Hoose, who sang the "Tannhäuser" and "Siegfried" music, has reason to congratulate himself both on the company he was in and the very favorable impression he made. He is a robust tenor, who has improved immensely since he was last heard here with the Ellis Opera Company. As the young sailor in "Tristan and Isolde" and in all that he sang last night he acquitted himself well. He did succeed in all that he tried for, and his intonation was absolutely and at all times impeccable. He should prove a very valuable tenor.—Public Ledger, Philadelphia, November 5.

Above all, the honors were carried off by the singers. Surprise for the most of the audience—and it by no means concealed its approval—was the sterling work of Ellison Van Hoose, who has not been heard here since the opera season of 1898-1899, when he was a member of the Ellis Opera Company. Mr. Van Hoose possesses a pure lyrico-dramatic tenor voice, of beautiful tone quality, capable of sustained efforts and striking climatic effects. His phrasing is most artistic and the emotional coloring well laid in. His "Tannhäuser" music was splendidly declaimed and sung, and the "Prize Song" was broadly and delightfully rendered, and was not without the unction the music demands. In the "Siegfried" music he held his own with Ternina's splendid efforts, and the brief death grasp was artistically rendered. His success with the audience was unquestioned and his reception flattering.—Harvey Watts, in the Philadelphia Press, November 5.

Mr. Van Hoose has a fresh, robust tenor voice, the upper notes being especially fine. In the duet from "Tannhäuser" most of the music is pitched high, and the length of the selection is somewhat trying, but he acquitted himself with much success. He sang the "Prize Song" also beautifully.—Baltimore American, November 6.

Mr. Van Hoose sang with excellent tone, with beautiful smoothness and with intelligence. His advances in his art in recent years have been marked and his success with last night's audience was a fitting reward for his earnest study.—New York Times, November 8.

Ellison Van Hoose is a graduate from smaller parts who has risen through recognition of his really excellent voice to the position he occupies to-day. His singing is characterized by a depth of expression and sympathy with the part that is rare in many operatic soloists who give all attention to the perfection of technic. The vast audience heard in attentive silence his beautiful interpretation of the "Prize Song."—Baltimore Herald, November 6.

Mr. Van Hoose won many recalls also, and deservedly, for he stands at the head of American tenors.—New York Press, November 8.

The element presented last night was the purely musical, and it was wondrously presented. Therein lay its justification and its triumph. The lovers of Wagner's music, as music, enjoyed a revelation. They heard an orchestral euphony which was transporting; a reading of the orchestral score which was illuminating. They heard also a beautiful blending of vocal and instrumental tone. The singers were Madame Ternina and Ellison Van Hoose, both known to New York music lovers. They sang with beautiful purity of tone and in a manner thoroughly in consonance with the orchestra.—New York Tribune, November 8.

Mr. Van Hoose, an American tenor with a sweet and strong voice, sung with rare taste and finish Walther's "Prize Song."—New York World, November 8.

The audience gave evidence of thorough enjoyment by enthusiastic applause. It was no less appreciative of Mr. Van Hoose's singing. He revealed a voice of great volume and clearness. The high notes, especially the C's and A's, rang out sonorously, but always sweetly, and he sustained a high standard of excellence in every number. Mr. Van Hoose ought to be valuable as an operatic singer. There are not many tenors possessing a voice of such beauty. Neither is he lacking in temperament and animation.—New York Journal, November 8.

In Walther's "Prize Song" in particular Mr. Van Hoose made an excellent impression. He has a clear, ringing voice, well in hand, and he sings like one who understands and enjoys good art.—Henry T. Finck, in New York Evening Post, November 8.

Gregory Hast's New York Debut.

GREGORY HAST, the distinguished English tenor, will make his first appearance in New York in a song recital at Mendelssohn Hall, Monday afternoon, November 18, at 3 o'clock. Mr. Hast's standing among the concert tenors of the world is cordially acknowledged in Europe, and the high repute he has won and maintained abroad has preceded him. In his American début in Milwaukee, November 4, he made a sensational success, as will be seen from the press notices from that city, printed elsewhere in this issue, and there is every reason to believe that in his entrée on the concert stage in New York the same cordial recognition of his rare voice and art will be extended.

Victor Harris will be at the piano for Mr. Hast's recital next Monday afternoon, when the following program will be presented:

DR. GERRIT SMITH, of New York, attracted, besides the thousands of visitors, all his former Buffalo friends. He held his concert at the Temple of Music October 24. His program proved to be a genuine treat. Aside from selections of Schumann, Rheinberger, Guilmant and Rubinstein, Dr. Smith played numbers specially dedicated to him, "Eurydice Fantasy" (in press, Schirmer), by Chaffin; Fantasy, Sonate XII., Rheinberger; "March Pittoresque," Kroeger, and Allegro in F, Guilmant. All these, dedicated to Dr. Smith, therefore entirely new, were very attractive in themselves; and his scholarly production of legitimate organ music, rendered in a dignified manner, made this organ concert one never to be forgotten.

Dr. Gerrit Smith has given 275 free organ concerts in New York city, and over 800 different compositions have been played by him since he became organist and choirmaster at the South Church.

He has just returned from a four months' tour abroad, where he has been studying composition with Hamish MacCunn and Edward German in London. He spent a month with Grieg at his home in Norway. While he was abroad Dr. Smith made a tour of the cathedral cities of England, playing the great organs there.

Gerrit Smith was born in Hagerstown, Md. His first musical tuition was received at Geneva, where he was a boy chorister. Adolph Baumbach, organist of Grace Church, Chicago, gave him his first organ lesson, and for the last two years of the young student's course at Hobart College he was organist of the chapel there. A pilgrimage to Stuttgart, Germany, where he studied music and architecture, was followed by a course of hard work in New York, under Samuel P. Warren, in studying the organ, Mr. Smith having decided to make music his profession.

His first position as a professional organist was an important and difficult one. He had charge of the music at St. Paul's Cathedral, Buffalo, managing a choir of sixty voices on Sunday mornings, and of forty boys on Sunday afternoons. The young musician, at the same time, continuing his efforts at self-improvement by studying organ under Dr. Eugene Thayer, and piano under William H. Sherwood. Another sojourn abroad came next, this time at Berlin, under August Haupt and Edward Rohde, and later under Gustav Merkel and Dr. Ritter. A year later he went to St. Peter's Church, Albany, where he gave twenty free organ recitals and organized a choral club, which gave the first orchestral performance in this country of Dvorák's "Stabat Mater." Sixteen years ago he went to the South Church, New York.

Dr. Smith's degree was given to him by Hobart College. His compositions consist of over fifty songs, a church cantata, "King David," several settings of the "Te Deum," an album of piano pieces, numerous carols and some church anthems. Dr. Smith has been for years professor of music in Union Theological Seminary, has been president of the

MME. ABBIE S. FRIDENBERG.

New York State Music Teachers' Association, and is president of the American Guild of Organists.

Miss Miller, solo soprano of the Richmond Avenue M. E. Church, Buffalo, assisted at Dr. Smith's recital. She sang "The Lord Is My Light and My Salvation" with good attack and fine enunciation. She has a fine voice.

Gustave Frese, of Louisville, Ky., gave two organ concerts at the Temple October 25 and 26.

He is a musician whose merits should be appreciated, for he has been a deep student. His command of all the resources of the organ, the beautiful tone coloring he gives in all his combination of stops, reflect great credit upon him. His program was an excellent one, comprising the French and German school.

"The Elegy," Lemargre, and "Offertoire," Salome, were specimens of artistic interpretation not often heard. Overture, "William Tell," Rossini-Buck, was never more beautifully rendered. He was awarded with the most hearty applause, the vast audience insisting on repetitions. Mr. Frese was finally induced to play a short program after the regular concert.

Mr. Frese was at the conservatory, Leipsic, studying under Reinecke, Papperitz, Piutti, Rust, Weidenbach and others. He is director of the Frese School of Music, Louisville, Ky. He has been organist of the Warren Memorial Church and the First Presbyterian Church, but has severed his connection with the church position. We have heard of the conditions, or rather the lack of appreciation for good music, in that fair city of the Sunny South. The mistaken ideas of music committees of churches in cutting down the expenses of organist a singers in churches must be revolutionized, and the ti may come when unprincipled dissimulation, such as ofttimes practiced on organists and singers, will no long be tolerated, when all that is false will be shunned a when the art of music will receive proper recognition a support.

One of the pleasures of the week was the receipt of Jo Lund's "Wedding Music," which has just been publish by M. M. Leidt. The charming music, which was hea last winter in concert, has been gotten out in a most a tractive and artistic style, the title affording opportuni for very dainty illustrations. All with the senses of hea ing and seeing artistically developed will be delight with this series, which includes three selections. Of the three, "Before the Altar" has been translated for the org by William S. Waith and published separately. Organis looking for charming wedding music will find this sel tion a jewel. Mr. Waith has transcribed it for the org with admirable taste.

In the issue of this paper of October 30 appeared article describing the success achieved at the Pan-Americ Exposition by the unique concerts given by Mesdam Fridenberg and Merrick.

The picture of Madame Fridenberg was omitted becau of a delay in its receipt.

The following admirably sums up the artistic qualific tions of Madame Fridenberg:

Madame Fridenberg is not only a singer with a wealth of vo that runs the gamut of the emotions, but also exhibits that r artistic aplomb that places her high up in the ranks of musicia whose strong individuality entitles them to put their own stamp their work as interpretative artists.

Mme. Marie Merrick assisted as pianist of the solo nu bers at the concerts held at the Temple of Music Octob 10 and 11. Her selections were "Mazureck," Paderewsk "Albumblatt," Liebling; "Rigaudon," Raff; "The Fla terer," Chaminade; "Spring Song," Mendelssohn; "Ba carolle," Clara Korn; "Kammenoi Ostrow," Rubinstei "Rhapsodie Hongroise, No. 2," Liszt.

Madame Merrick's playing is characterized by a gre deal of depth and artistic intelligence. It is never mecha ical, but throbs with life and poetry of the true musicia This is recognized in all of her work; the virtuoso and m sician seem to be about equally balanced. Her repertory extensive, including the great concertos and the repr sentative works of the old as well as the modern classics.

Indeed, the Fridenberg-Merrick concert was perfect unique and the only one of its kind given at the Temp Buffalonians express a hope to hear the two artists aga

Mrs. Merrick, apart from her concert work and teachin has won distinction for the educational value of her lectur from men and women of note who have made pedagog work a life study. Her pleasant hours in the people's le ture courses, for three years under the auspices of the Ne York Board of Education, was no exception to the ru and led Dr. Leipziger to declare them to be distinctive educative, while many New York teachers freely acknow edge that they received from Mrs. Merrick's practic handling of her subjects reinforcement for their ow work; and some other tributes to her musically illustrate essays were the hearty indorsement of the Profession Woman's League.

At one of the concerts given by Mr. Corey the sopra soloist was Miss Caroline E. Wright, of Buffalo. S sang several selections. Her voice has a carrying pow easily filling the large hall, and she evidently has ha good schooling.

William B. Colson, of Cleveland, Ohio, gave three o gan concerts this week. Mr. Colson is an organist th Cleveland may well be proud of. He gives many co certs in Cleveland and surrounding country. He w assisted at one of the concerts by Edwin H. Douglas nor, of Cleveland, whose voice rang out as clear as a ll. He is a very busy teacher in Cleveland.

Another soloist is Miss Florence Kimberly, of Cleveıd. She made a lasting impression. Her voice is a ezzo contralto. Having just returned from a three years' ıdy abroad, first with Koenig (as coach), and later with liana, chef de chant à l'opera, where she has fitted herlf for the opera, she will doubtless make her appearance on in New York. She sang "Jerusalem" and "I'm earing Awa Jean."

William Gomph, the official organist of the Pan-Amern, will finish the course by a concert. Being a general orite, his concerts will be well attended by Buffalonians. e will be assisted by Miss Ada Gates, one of the best ntralto singers Buffalo has ever boasted of.

A season of rare enjoyment for all music lovers has ded which will go down to history and be remembered millions of people. It would be a pleasure to give each rticipant a mention, but to do justice to all would fill a ok. We have had organists of the old conservative, ssic kind, and those of the new school, whose chief pride s in the orchestral effects they produce and in transcripn from operas and works of the newer era.

Conspicuous it is that among the many there were lady ganists in no way inferior to the stronger sex, and who ndled the great organ with skill and vigor truly astonıing, nor had the intricacies and unusual build of the orn any terrors for them.

The Temple of Music was in such constant demand that ıny organists practiced near the hour of midnight, and as ss Fanny Spencer, of New York, expressed it, "a ıid person would have the horrors to be alone, when the epy shadows of departed spirits seemed to be hovering the great Temple."

We have had song birds of the lyric coloratura order, and ıtraltos and mezzos whose deep toned voices were rich melody. Basses and tenors were few and far between, t those that sang proved a great addition.

The bands whose world wide fame is acknowledged re brought here by the efforts of Hobart Weed, to whom visitors are grateful, for his selections were excellent. e great Sousa, who is winning honors with his band in ndon, England, at the present time; the splendid Cuban nd, which was sent to us from Havana by the Cuban vernment as a compliment to the American people, and ich, under the leadership of that fine conductor, G. The ies Band, our own Seventy-fourth and Sixty-fifth Regintal bands and Scinta's Band proved powers of attracn. The Highlanders and Seventy-first Regiment Band, New York city, gave much pleasure, as did many others. have had Canadian talent, proving by their skill that y also belong to the first rank. Miss Dales, violinist, Nebraska fame, made a lasting impression. Wm. mph, the official organist, did splendid work by his mutl assistance and courtesy to visiting organists and sing-

We also mourn the loss of that most famous organist deric Archer, whose life of usefulness covered many rs of musical activity, and who gave us two brilliant certs early in the season, the memory of which will er be forgotten.

VOCAL COMPOSITIONS BY FRANK H. BRACKETT.

FRANK HERBERT BRACKETT comes of good old New England stock, being a lineal descendant, on his mother's side, of John and Priscilla Alden. He was educated in the public schools of Boston, and graduated from Harvard in the notable class of 1880, of which class he was chorister. While in college, Mr. Brackett made a thorough study of harmony and composition, under Prof. John K. Paine. After graduating, Mr. Brackett pursued the study of vocal music with John Franklin Botume, George Sweet and the late Charles R. Adams, also studying the piano with

FRANK H. BRACKETT.

John W. Tufts, then organist of King's Chapel. Mr. Brackett is now located in Pittsfield, Mass., where he is one of the leading vocal teachers.

Mr. Brackett's most successful works have been in the line of sacred songs, the first of which, "O Eyes That Are Weary," was published by the B. F. Wood Music Company two years ago, after half a dozen other publishers had refused it. This song sprang into an immediate popularity, and was followed by "The Vesper Prayer," "The Singing in God's Acre," and "Around the Great White Throne"; also the sacred duets, "Rise, Crowned With Light" and "Jesus, I My Cross Have Taken," all of which have been remarkably successful. Three new songs just issued by the same house: "Jerusalem," "King of Kings" and "Love's Eternal Crown," bid fair to take their place among the most popular sacred songs of the coming season.

Mr. Brackett's melodies have a touch of Italian suavity, and his harmonies are expressive and sufficiently varied, without ever becoming strained or obscure. Some of his songs are quite remarkable for their dramatic intensity, notably "My King," a passionate love song for soprano. Other recent successes in the the secular line are "Love's Entreaties," "The Lullaby of the Night" and the "Friar's Song."

The B. F. Wood Music Company (Boston) has recently published in the form of a booklet for free distribution, a thematic list of Mr. Brackett's songs, containing also in small form the complete song entitled "The Lullaby of the Night."

Nevada Will Soon Be Here.

MME. EMMA NEVADA is well over the ocean by this time. The petite diva embarked on the steamship St. Paul of the American Line at Cherbourg on Saturday last, and is expected here on Friday of this week. On the same steamer are Pablo Casals, with his priceless Guarnerius 'cello, and Leon Moreau, the pianist. M. Maquarre, the flute virtuoso, who will be a member of the Nevada company on tour, has already arrived in this country, and is being entertained by some of his Parisian friends in New York.

Just previous to sailing Madame Nevada was the recipient of a flattering offer from The Hague, to sing in grand opera there this season. Nevada was the prima donna at the Dutch capital last year, and achieved the greatest success of any singer there for many years. At the close of her engagement the stage of the opera house was buried in flowers, and not content with expressing their affection for their favorite singer in this manner, a number of the auditors induced the orchestra to accompany them to the Café Continental, where they arranged themselves in the torchlit grounds facing the Amstel Hotel, at which Madame Nevada was staying. Then followed a serenade —the "Marche aux Flambeaux."

The music reached the diva, who had been informed of the incident, and, braving the damp night air, she sang to her ardent worshippers a number from "Mignon," as she alone can sing it. At the conclusion of her solo the whole front of the Amstel Hotel burst into light with Bengal fire, and then appeared a large device representing the sun, with the name of Emma Nevada in blazing letters across it. A supper within the hotel concluded the loyal offering to the prima donna, who raised a toast to the Dutchman and his country. The affair breaks upon one with surprise, as it savors more of the hot blooded Southerner than the quiet Dutchman, who is seldom roused to such extravagant demonstration. Madame Nevada, naturally, would have liked to return to a country where she has such a firm hold on the affections of the people, but her engagements in this country will not permit her to accept anything else this season.

One of Madame Nevada's special features in her concerts has been the costuming. She is noted as being one of the very best dressers on the opera stage. Her gowns this season will exceed in beauty and richness any that she has hitherto brought over, and are the very latest productions of two of the most famous dressmakers of Paris. In her performances this season, however, Madame Nevada will be costumed as the character in the opera from which the number is taken. This innovation promises to be an agreeable novelty.

ANNA LANKOW'S REPLY.

The following is in reply to Henry Pierson's letter published under the head of "Official From Berlin," in our issue of October 2.

NEW YORK, November 8, 1901.

Editors The Musical Courier:

GENTLEMEN—I had concluded to let Mr. Pierson's letter, published in THE MUSICAL COURIER of October 2, go unanswered, but owing to the many inquiries that are made concerning this matter, and especially after the cablegram in the New York Staats Zeitung of November 5, which reveals that another young American singer, Miss Farrar, is now experiencing the same treatment from the same people, I now feel that a reply has become necessary.

OPFER DES KÜNSTLERNEIDS.

Die amerikanische Sängerin Geraldine Farrar hat in der Königlichen Oper einen schweren Stand—propter invidiam. Der Künstlerneid hat sie zum Opfer erkoren. Zahlreiche Solistinnen weigern sich, aufzutreten, falls die Rivalin erste Rollen erhält. Aehnliche Erfahrungen machte im Jahre 1899 Frl. Webster Powell, menn nicht gar schlimmere, obgleich man nicht weiss, wie Frl. Farrar noch fahren wird. Frl. Powell murde seinerzeit derartig chikanirt, dass sie lieber zwölftausend Mark Konventionalstraffe an die General-Intendanz zahlte, nur um ihren Kontrakt lösen zu können.—Cablegram, New York Staats Zeitung, November 5, 1901.

TRANSLATION.

(Cablegram, New York Staats Zeitung, November 5, 1901.)

A VICTIM OF ARTISTS' ENVY.

The American singer Geraldine Farrar has at the Royal Opera here a hard time—"propter invidiam." The envy of the other artists has now chosen her as a victim. Several first singers refuse to appear, if she is to sing first parts. Mrs. Powell has just passed through similar and even much worse experiences, although nobody knows what Miss Farrar has yet to endure. Mrs. Powell had to suffer such humiliating annoyances that she preferred to ask for a release from her contract.

Were Mrs. Powell in America she certainly would have defended her statements given to the Sun of September 1, but she and the pianist-composer, Eugenio von Pirani, are making a grand concert tour, which is to extend around the world. They are now in Russia, where, by the way, they are having immense success, and so, in her absence, I, as her teacher and adviser, write in her stead.

The insinuating statements in Mr. Pierson's letter cast a shadow of doubt, or intend to do so, upon the truth of the facts Mrs. Powell gave out. Not only are her statements true, but the half has not yet been told.

This was not a case of trying a "débutante," but, on the contrary, this "débutante" was sought by the Berlin management, through the Von Selar Agency, as a great attraction, Mrs. Powell being a phenomenal singer, and a young and beautiful woman, who had made in her first engagement a sensational success.

The Berlin management, by letters and telegrams, had urged Mrs. Powell to hasten to Berlin, and so built up her

Mr. Grant Hadley, the well known baritone, and director of the Voice Department of the "Des Moines Musical College" and of "Highland Park Corservatory of Music," has an extensive repertoire, including the following songs by American composers: "The Lass of Norwichtown, by "Frederic Field Bullard; "The Blue Bell," by Frederick Chapman; "Shine on, O Stars," by Frank E. Sawyer; "The Wind is Awake," by Homer N. Bartlett; and "Fast Asleep," by Anton Strelezki. Mr. Hadley received his musical education in America; possessing a naturally rich baritone voice, he was fortunate in having for his instructors some of the best teachers of Chicago and Boston.

To those seeking new music of the highest quality, either vocal or instrumental, the catalogs of Oliver Ditson Company will be found invaluable, containing as they do the works of the eminent American and foreign composers. Especially is this true of the new thematic and analytical catalogs (a series of six), which will be sent upon request.

confidence in their intentions toward her, that, alas! she was overpersuaded and gave up her more than brilliant offer from the Opera House in Breslau, with Dr. Löwe and Theodore Habelmann.

However much the Berlin management, in their carefully worded article, desire to impress the public that Mrs. Powell left Berlin at their wish, the facts are entirely to the contrary. There can be no question of Mrs. Powell's positive success as an artist, as the criticisms of the Berlin papers, as well as private communications from Theod. Habelmann, Eugenio von Pirani, Prof. Ludwig Pietsch, Miss Martha Hofacker (now at the Strassburg Theatre) and others, all united in one expression, "Splendid success"; at the same time some of them predicting that, on account of this very success, she would meet the greatest opposition from her colleagues.

If Mr. Pierson's insinuations are true, why did the management make an exception of Mrs. Powell by engaging her after her first appearance, when the general rule calls for three different appearances before closing a contract?

Why was Mrs. Powell, after her début as Rosina in "The Barber of Seville," billed three times as Queen in "The Huguenots," in which part she had made such a hit in Breslau, "if she did not fit in the symmetry of our structure" at the Berlin Opera?

Why did the Berlin management, by delaying their answer to Mrs. Powell's plea for release, keep her from accepting an excellent offer from the Royal Opera in Budapest?

It is evident that "an American soprano singer," in this case, was the "artist," and that they were reluctant to part with her.

If the foregoing is not convincing proof that Mrs. Powell insisted on her release, on account of intrigue of some of the singers, and lack of support, in every way, of the management, why then it is only necessary to append the answer of the intendancy, which reads as follows:

BERLIN, den 8 Juni, 1901.

Auf das gefällige Schreiben vom 3. d Mts. theile ich Ihnen ergebenst mit, dass ich Ihren W'unsch um Enthebung von Ihren Verbindlichkeiten gegen die Königliche Oper zu erfüllen bereit bin und hiermit den zwischen uns abgeschlossenen Vertrag für aufgehoben erkläre.

Mit Vollkommener Hochachtung. GRAF VON HOCHBERG.

An Frau Alma Webster Powell.

TRANSLATION.

In answer to your letter of the 3d of this month, I reply that, in accordance with your desire to be released from your obligations toward the Royal Opera, I will give this release, and with this consider that the contract between us is ended.

Very respectfully, COUNT VON HOCHBERG.

Everybody knows how much superior talent is required, how many years of unceasing mental and physical labor are necessary, to say nothing of the outlay of money, to be fitted for a public career.

This country's fad, to accept no singer who does not bear the stamp of foreign success, and especially the approval of Germany, has made a beginning here even of the fittest artist utterly impossible. I wonder if Americans ever will be willing to recognize their own noble talent?

Now when in the face of all obstacles an absolute success in a foreign land has been made, shall one allow it to be questioned or by false insinuation destroyed by the willful intent of others?

At the time when the knowledge of these things came to me, my indignation was so great that I even wrote a letter to my Emperor, who, if he ever really gets it, is too outspokenly righteous to tolerate such actions.

I have never so much regretted an advice given to a pupil as that which, convinced of the "sincerity" of the intentions of the Berlin Opera management, I myself gave to Mrs. Powell to choose Berlin before any place in the world, because I had for fourteen years cherished the thought of returning to Berlin, that most artistic and glorious Kaiserstadt, and devote my art with Germans for Germans.

After the many-sided experiences of Mrs. Powell, I gladly stay where I am. ANNA LANKOW-PIETSCH.

Opera in English.

ON November 18 the Columbia Theatre, in Boston, will open for a season of opera in English under the direction of Robert Grau. Mr. Grau intends to engage only American singers, and hopes to make his enterprise the home of opera in the vernacular. Although the first opera produced will be "The Mikado," with an all star cast, as soon as he can get ready he will present greater works. Mr. Grau has in contemplation "Queen of Sheba," "Rienzi," "Oberon" and other important works.

ANGELA ANDERSON.

MISS ANGELA ANDERSON, the talented and charming young American pianist, who will give a recital in conjunction with Rosa Olitzka (under the direction of W. Adlington) in London on November 18, told our London representative the following:

"You may not know that my great-grandfather was Lorenzo da Ponte, Italian poet and librettist of "Don Giovanni," "The Magic Flute" and "Marriage of Figaro," and was among the first to introduce opera in New York in 1833. He was a very interesting character, and Krehbiel has devoted a whole chapter to him in his book, 'Music and Manners.' My grandfather was also a scientific man and professor at Columbia College—Dr. Henry James Anderson—and well known in scientific circles in New York.

"I went to Paris six years ago at three days' notice to play for Paderewski, who was to decide whether I should take up the career of pianist. He not only advised me to do so, but interested himself personally in my lessons. I studied regularly with Stojowski, whom I consider a magnificent teacher. My début (first concert) at the Salle Erard was really a brilliant success in every way. All the best musicians in Paris came—Bauer, Moszkowski, my teacher, Stojowski, and Förster, and all have evinced the kindest interest in me ever since. I was loaded down with flowers and made enough money to go away for a summer holiday."

We append some press notices and a program of the recital referred to above:

Miss Angela Anderson, of New York, is one of the most serious piano students in Paris. Passionate musician and student of music, Miss Anderson came to Paris expressly to have the advice of Paderewski as to making a professional career. Encouraged by him in most unequivocal terms, he placed her in charge of M. Sigismond Stojowski, with a general program of study, which has been carried out to his great satisfaction. The young lady has already made her début, playing a most successful recital at the Salle Erard last season. Ill during a year of her stay here, this result is all the more remarkable. Miss Anderson is a most charming personality, of more than usual intelligence, depth and seriousness as to art and life.—MUSICAL COURIER, February 21, 1900.

A great deal of interest was shown by the American colony in Paris in the début of Miss Angela Anderson as a pianist, which took place at the Salle Erard last evening.

Miss Anderson is a niece of Mrs. Walden Pell and also a niece of E. Ellery Anderson, the well-known New York lawyer. For the last three years Miss Anderson has studied constantly under Stojowski, and has also had the advantage of the personal supervision of Paderewski, the latter's strong encouragement having decided the young lady to take up the piano as a profession.

The concert last evening was a pronounced success, Miss Anderson receiving a most enthusiastic reception. Her rendering of Paderewski's "Cracovienne Fantastique" was a graceful tribute to the great virtuoso, and also showed her exceptional skill. So also in Godard's "En Route," the young débutante displayed temperament and brilliant technic.

Miss Minnie Tracey and M. Ladislas Gorski contributed in no small degree to the success of the entertainment, and earned well merited applause.—New York Herald, Paris Edition, June 8.

Miss Angela Anderson, an American pianist, pupil of M. Stojowski, gave her first concert last evening at Salle Erard. The young lady has many excellent qualities as a pianist; in the first place, that of interesting her audience. Her playing is sure, warm, sincere, and shows the effect of careful and artistic instruction. Beethoven's Sonata, No. 26; Chopin's Valse and Impromptu, Mozart's Sonata in G and a Reverie from the pen of her teacher called forth most enthusiastic applause. Miss Anderson's manner is pleasing, and her timidity did not make itself felt. Miss Minnie Tracey and M. Ladislas Gorski added to the pleasure of the performance. Rarely if ever, did Miss Tracey do herself such justice and create so much enthusiasm as on this occasion. She grows more in her art than any of the singers.

When executants are offered flowers why do they not leave them on the stage during the rest of the performance? What is the object of carrying them off? Taking them up and off is always awkward and clumsy. Being hauled off by somebody else seems stupid. The gestures of despair over their size are mincing and affected, and bringing them back to bow has a still worse effect. Why not leave them on or about the piano, the most natural, pretty and gracious thing to do? Nobody would eat them.—NEW YORK MUSICAL COURIER, June 28, 1899.

Miss Angela Anderson, who made her début at the Salle Erard in Paris as a professional pianist on Wednesday, is well known in New York society, although for the past three years she has been abroad finishing her musical studies under the chaperonage of her aunt, Mrs. Walden Pell, so conspicuous in the American colony in the French capital. Miss Anderson is a daughter of Mrs. Edward H. Anderson, of this city, and a niece of E. Ellery Anderson. She had been known as an accomplished amateur pianist until four years ago, on the advice of Paderewski, she decided to prepare herself for a professional career. Her first studies to that end were under his direction, and he has always shown an interest in her career. The cable accounts of her début report that it was brilliantly successful. Miss Anderson will probably return to this country next winter. She is a handsome girl, and her intention to become a professional was wholly due to her devotion to music, as she is far removed from any necessity to make use of her talents. Her task of preparation has been severe, as her decision to place herself before the public was followed by a term of the most arduous study and a renunciation of all the social pleasures to which she had been accustomed here. Miss Anderson is one of the few descendants of Lorenzo da Ponte, the author of the libretto of "Don Giovanni," who came to this country during the early part of the century and died here. She is the first member of the family since his time to appear in artistic life.—New York Sun, June 12, 1899.

EUROPEAN NOTES.

The first orchestra of Nuremberg devoted to serious sic, which has hitherto been known by the name of its ector, Krug Waldsee, has adopted, since his call to gdeburg and the appointment of Wilhelm Bruch as his cessor, the title of Philharmonic Orchestra. The first formance was a Wagner evening.

The performance of Klughardt's new oratorio, "Judith," the Royal Theatre of Weisbaden will be of great inter- . The chorus will be reinforced by singing societies m Mainz and Weisbaden, and will number 400 mem- s. During the coming season it will be given in Halle, gdeburg, Münster, Dessau, Innsbruck and Branden- rg.

Amsterdam will next January have a Netherlands Music stival, devoted exclusively to the works of Dutch com- sers still living. Circulars have been sent to all Dutch mposers whose works are not known in Holland to d in scores, &c., to the conductor of the festival, W. ngelberg, Amsterdam. Native soloists have been in- ed to assist.

On October 11 the 150th birthday of Bortrijanski was ebrated at St. Petersburg. He was born in 1751, and s patronized by the Empress Elizabeth and the Em- ror Paul. He was the reformer of Russian church sic, and is styled the Palestrina of Russia.

The well-known lieder and oratorio singer, Johanna ez, will give three historical lieder evenings to friends music in Munich, in this and the following month. orks by Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann, Franz, Bülow, Cornelius, A. Ritter and Richard Strauss will be per- med.

The Prince Regent Theatre of Munich has just repro- ced Cherubini's "Des Deux Journécs," which had not en given since 1888. It was received with great applause, d the warm welcome given to it proves that the Munich blic is not exclusively Wagnerian.

A traveler in Bosnia has found in the capital, Seraievo, nusical society, "The Lyra, a singing society of Spanish ws." The singing was all in Spanish, as all the Jews o, on being expelled from Spain, settled in Bosnia, are phardein, and speak the Spanish of the fifteenth century. e traveler was struck with the beauty of the voices, es- ially of the tenors, but was of the opinion that the mu- of the pieces performed was of German origin. Are re no Jew composers among the Sephardein in Bosnia?

A series of unpublished letters from Verdi to the poet islanzoni, concerning the libretta of "Aïda," will soon be ued. In these letters Verdi explained his views, dic- ed the scenes and even proposed some verses to his col- orator.

The city of Rouen has a population of about 125,000, and ssesses an opera house and an enterprising manager. He ens his season with Charpentier's "Louise," and then gives a series of new works "inedites." "Les Guelfes," grand opera in five acts, music by Benjamin Godard; "La Fille du Calife," in two acts, music by Lachourié; "Mimi la Provençale," lyric comedy in three acts, music by Georges Palicot; "Le Clocheton de Paimpol," music by Charles Hess, and a ballet and three "divertissements." That is something like a program, for a season, in a small manufacturing town.

HAROLD BAUER.

GEORGE W. STEWART, manager for Harold Bauer, who begins his second United States tour January 7, has already booked the following dates for the pianist:

Tuesday, January 7, Troy, recital.
Thursday, January 9, Cambridge, Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Friday, January 10, Boston, Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Saturday, January 11, Boston, Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Tuesday, January 14, Philadelphia, Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Wednesday, January 15, Baltimore, Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Thursday, January 16, New York, Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Friday, January 17, Brooklyn, Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Wednesday, January 22, Providence, Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Friday, January 24, Ann Arbor, recital.
Monday, January 27, Indianapolis, Indianapolis Orchestra.
Tuesday, January 28, St. Louis, Apollo Club.
Thursday, January 30, Toronto, Mendelssohn Choir Club.
Friday, February 7, Cincinnati, Cincinnati Orchestra.
Saturday, February 8, Cincinnati, Cincinnati Orchestra.
Friday, February 14, New York, Philharmonic Orchestra.

Saturday, March 1, Philadelphia, Philadelphia Orchestra.
Friday, March 14, Baltimore, Peabody Institute.
Friday, March 28, Chicago, Chicago Orchestra.
Saturday, March 29, Chicago, Chicago Orchestra.

In addition to these several other engagements have been booked, such as the Pittsburg Orchestra, but the dates have not yet been settled.

The above means that the Bauer tour is already an assured success.

PITTSBURG ORCHESTRA IN THE WEST.

THERE is a big proposition on foot to conclude an arrangement by means of which Victor Herbert and his Pittsburg Orchestra are to give, in addition to ten concerts now projected in the neighborhood of Chicago, a series of important classical productions to be heard as far West as the Pacific Coast.

Naturally a huge project of this kind requires much forethought, ample preparation and skillful leadership, and as Chas. R. Baker, of Chicago, is mentioned as the manager of the scheme, we have the greatest confidence in its ultimate success.

Sembrich, Suzanne Adams, William H. Sherwood and others will be the soloists at these concerts.

Esther Fee's Debut.

THE violinist Miss Esther Feé will make her American début at Carnegie Hall Monday evening, November 18. She will be assisted by the Paur Symphony Orchestra and Leopold Winkler, pianist. The program arranged for the evening follows:

Overture to Genoveva.....Schumann
Concerto, G minor, op. 26.....Bruch
Symphonic Poem, Vltava.....Smetana
Concerto, E flat.....Liszt
Slavic Dance.....Dvorák
Souvenir de Haydn.....Leonard

Whitney Tew's Recital.

WHITNEY TEW, an American basso, of European fame and training, gave a song recital in Mendelssohn Hall last Monday afternoon. A large audience received the singer cordially. He presented a long and varied program. Tuesday being "press day," a criticism of Mr. Tew's recital will be published next Wednesday. Elsewhere in this issue will be found the Boston opinions of Mr. Tew's appearance in that city last week.

SIBYL SAMMIS COMPANY.—The concert company of which Miss Sammis is the soprano, has had many fine houses, being now in Michigan. Later they are to be at Batavia, Utica and North Adams, Mass. When in Dayton, Ohio, this was written of the brilliant singer:

Miss Sibyl Sammis, the soprano, possesses a voice of rich mezzo quality of unusual range and power, and she sings most intelligently, particularly in the cavatina from Gounod's "Queen of Sheba" did she show the many beauties of her voice and her ability to use it artistically. Miss Sammis only last week suffered a sad bereavement in the death of her betrothed and is singing with a heavy heart. Those who have heard her before could detect in her singing last evening a touch of pathetic sorrow.

GERARD-THIERS LECTURES.—Mr. Gerard-Thiers will give his lecture on "Technic of Musical Expression" before the Musical Club of Floral Park, L. I., on November 21; at Public School No. 166, on November 25; at Mrs. Heermann's residence on November 28; at Public School No. 141, on December 2; at the Rivington Street Public School on December 4.

WILLIAM WORTH BAILEY.

Blind Violinist Makes a Successful Debut in Wilmington, Delaware.

"WILLIAM WORTH BAILEY, the blind violinist, a marvelous young man, and his company were heard last night (Monday evening this week) at the New Century Club Building by a representative audience, which immediately stamped him as a wonder. Bailey scored a distinct hit, and Miss Northrop, the soprano, and Mr. Shonert, the pianist, came in for a good share of the honors.

"The concert was a success both financially and artistically—and the musical public of Wilmington should thank those who were instrumental in bringing such a fine combination here. Bailey's rendering of the Mendelssohn Concerto was the best violin playing that has been heard here in a long time, particularly in the beautiful andante movement, which is so pathetic and poetic. It seemed to be more so in the hands of this blind boy than usual. His playing appealed to the sensitive and sympathetic nature of his audience, making the use of handkerchiefs necessary in many cases. It is understood that this was Bailey's first American appearance, he having been quite ill since returning from Europe, a few weeks ago. If he succeeds with his audience everywhere as he did last night, he has a great future before him.

"Miss Northrop was most pleasing in her group of songs, and she received much applause for Arditi's 'Parla.' Mr. Shonert is a careful and conscientious pianist, and he received encores for his playing of the Schubert-Tausig March. This company is sure to meet with success wherever it appears, and it was said last night by those capable of judging that it was one of the best and most enjoyable concerts ever given in Wilmington.

"R. E. Johnston, the manager and discoverer of Bailey, has brought here within the past ten years nearly all the great violinists, including Musin, Sauret, Marteau, Rivarde, Huberman and the great Ysaye. He certainly has brought to this country another big artist, and for himself has secured a big money winner. Bailey will be welcome again to Wilmington."—Wilmington (Del.) News.

Sight Singing Classes.

MISS DEMING, the teacher of sight singing and ear training, announces the opening of a class to begin Thursday, November 14, at 3 o'clock. Students are invited to attend the first two lessons, Thursday, November 14, and Monday, November 18, at 3 o'clock promptly. Illustrative lessons and talks will be given showing the methods used. Miss Deming uses as the basis of her work the Galin-Paris-Chevé method, but has developed original ways of presenting this work, which have proved most helpful to her many pupils. Miss Deming has been a student of all the prominent methods used in Europe and America, and her work is broad and is meeting a long felt need with many vocal students.

During the past few months Miss Deming has been abroad studying and visiting schools in England, France, Switzerland and Germany, and developing much that is original in this work. New class will meet Mondays and Thursdays at 3 p. m., at Miss Deming's School of Sight Singing, 402 and 403 Carnegie Hall.

CASTELLANO PIANO RECITAL.—Miss Eugenia Castellan an Italian pianist, who played here ten years ago, gave recital at the Waldorf-Astoria last Monday evening. Tl artist made the strongest impression in her performan of the compositions by Sgambati, Scarlatti and Martuc her own countrymen, by the way. Her program also i cluded works by Beethoven, Schumann, Chopin, Jense Liszt and Tausig. The audience, a musical one, and mac up of some of the best known concert goers, heartily a plauded the pianist.

GERMAN HEADQUARTERS OF THE MUSICAL COURIER,
BERLIN, W., LINKSTRASSE 17.

October 29, 1901.

The Grand Old Man of the Piano.

I WONDER whether you would like to hear something about the Grand Old Man of the piano, Theodore Leschetizky? I won't give you a chance to say no.

A few days ago the G. O. M. came here from Vienna. I resolved to get from him the true story of the recent Ischl tragedy. A bold undertaking, and remembering various stories of the G. O. M.'s irascibility, before I set out for the Central Hotel I provided myself with a pair of brass knuckles and a youth's size sand-bag.

I found Leschetizky wrapped n old brown dressing gown, his feet in slippers, cigar nouth, sitting before his writing table, copying a manu- pt. At his elbow stood a tray of breakfast dishes. Near was a grand piano. On the rack were Paderewski's anru," orchestral score, and Rosenthal's "Papillons." ictures of Lesehetizky are scarce, and I am a poor hand ortraying features. Imagine a face made up of dis- uishing characteristics from the masks of Johannes hms, Henrik Ibsen and Arthur Schopenhauer. My impression was beard, white, bushy and aggressive. rd on his cheeks, on his chin, on his lips, on his eye- ws, on his head. He has a trick of raising for an instant y few minutes the two beards that serve him as eye- ws. Then one's impression changes to eyes. And what they are! Small, keen, piercing, of amazing fresh- and fire for a man of seventy-one years. Brown, or , or grey? I don't know. His glances were like flashes ightning. They glowed for an instant, and then down e those bunches of beard.

From THE MUSICAL COURIER, eh?" he asked, in Ger- n. "I like that paper more than it likes me."

Not a very auspicious beginning," I thought. Aloud id: "I came to find out, Meister, whether—"

Not a word of it true," interrupted Leschetizky vehe- ntly. "I have already instructed my lawyers to proceed inst the papers that printed those libels."

Would you mind telling me the true state of affairs?"

Certainly. This young Frenchman, this pupil of mine, ton Lherie, had been recommended by Saint-Saëns. on noticed that Lherie was eccentric. He was by no ns my favorite pupil. I don't like young men who wear endous hats that cover their eyes, flowing scarfs like and hair like the foliage of a tree. Those are not things that stamp one a great pianist. Lherie was er happier than when attracting attention. Everyone ped on the streets to stare after him. He was not ular among his fellow pupils. I have one pupil, Miss nie Pyle, from Texas, who is probably the most beau- l American girl I have ever seen—and I have seen many utiful American girls. Lherie fell in love with Miss e. He told her so, but she would have none of him. rybody spoke of Lherie's infatuation and his queer be- ior. He went about mumbling and threatening that would shoot himself. Finally summer came, and my e and I went to Ischl. Miss Pyle spent her vacation in statt, an hour or so from where we were. Some weeks Lherie visited us. He spoke of going to Halstatt and posing once more to Miss Pyle. Against my advice he t. Witnesses of the meeting between the young persons that Miss Pyle was very decisive in her final refusal Lherie. She told him to keep away altogether. The e day I received a telegram from the girl saying 'Lherie just left for Ischl. Theatens to shoot himself. Watch him.' I sent my wife and her sister to the hotel at which Lherie had his room. They were to bring him back for dinner. Nearing the hotel they suddenly saw Lherie standing in the doorway. As they aproached, Lherie turned and ran upstairs. A minute later a shot was heard, and the poor boy was found dead in his room, with a bullet through his heart. That is all."

"Then you are not seeking a divorce from your wife?"

"Nonsense. Of course not. Why should I? My wife is coming here in a day or two."

"How do you account for the garbled version of the affair that reached the Berlin papers?"

"An enemy is responsible for that, a woman, a pianist, who lives in Berlin. I know her. Only women are capable of such despicable meanness."

Nothing loath to change the subject I drifted into other questions.

"Who is the most talented pupil you ever had?" Of course I expected him to say Paderewski.

"I have had many very talented pupils. Some are better known, some less known," evaded Leschetizky diplomatically. Up came the eyebrows and he flashed a smile at me.

"Was Paderewski a great pianist when he came to you?"

"Decidedly not, as he himself will admit. His touch was hard (!), his technic lacking in every essential. But he was a worker. He was as willing as a child. I put him at Czerny, and kept him at Czerny for six months."

"Did you foresee his great success?"

"One can be sure of nothing, but I well remember a conversation I had with Professor Epstein one night at a concert of the Tonkuenstler Verein in Vienna. 'He'll never be much,' said Epstein after Paderewski had played on that evening. 'Wait,' I answered; 'give him time to get out into the world.' I based my prediction on a knowledge of his ambition, and primarily on a knowledge of his character. He is a wonderful judge of human nature. He knows how to handle people. The greatest diplomat among the pianists, not even excepting Franz Liszt. And before all things a man of noble character. A prince in his friendship."

"Of course you knew Liszt?"

"Intimately. I knew him as a comparatively young man."

"Then you remember his early struggles, his battles——"

"Liszt never battled, and he never struggled; he conquered. I well remember his concert in Vienna after his first great Parisian successes. He was to play the piano part in Hummel's Septet. The hall was crowded. On the estrade sat Vienna's highest aristocracy. The six players were assembled on the platform. The seventh, Liszt, was missing. After five minutes he came in, strolled over to the estrade, and conversed nonchalantly with several princes and princesses of the royal house. The audience were aghast. The six musicians were horrified. After ten minutes Liszt remembered that he had to play. He walked slowly to the piano, sat down, and surveyed his audience. Then he looked at the piano. On the rack stood the music. Closing the book he threw it under the piano. 'What!' cried the audience, 'he would play without notes? Impossible! What impudence!' Then Liszt removed the rack and threw that under the piano. Finally the performance began. And such was Liszt's power over his audience that before twenty lines had been played the house was in a turmoil of excitement, and at the close of the piece it rose at Liszt and cheered him to the echo. That was the first time an artist had played from memory at a Vienna concert."

"I believe you are an old friend of Joachim, too, are you not? He is the dean of music here, you know."

"Yes, so I hear. But I am opposed to cliques and parties in music. They narrow and hamper art. Joachim and I have had many quarrels. We are opposite poles in music. I try to foster individuality; he tries to kill it. I hear that Rosenthal quarreled with him at a music festival recently about the proper tempi of the Schumann Concerto. Forty years ago I quarreled with him in London about the tempi of the Schumann Quintet. That is one of his pet hobbies. But he is small in other respects, too. I remember a benefit given in London years ago for the dying violinist Ernst, one of the greatest artists of his time. Wieniawski and Joachim were asked to play. 'What will you play?' asked Wieniawski. 'Ernst's "Elegy,"' replied Joachim; 'and you?' 'Ernst's "Othello" Fantasia,' answered Wieniawski. Joachim objected, and contended that the piece was not worthy of Wieniawski. 'What would you advise?' finally asked the latter. 'Play Ernst's "Erlking" transcription for violin alone,' was Joachim's friendly suggestion. The piece is one of the most difficult and ungrateful in the whole range of violin literature. The joke of the matter turned out to be, however, that Wieniawski learned the transcription in a week, and with it made the success of the concert."

"Are Joachim and you not of the same age?"

"No, he is older, but he is very sensitive on the subject of his age. In Dresden we met at the opera. I was walking up the stairs. 'How do you manage to climb so briskly at your age?' asked Joachim. 'How did you manage at my age?' I returned. There were a number of artists about, and they all enjoyed the joke."

"Did you know Brahms?"

"I used to call him Hans."

"And Rubinstein?"

"We were like brothers. Brahms and Rubinstein hated each other, and each other's compositions. I remember meeting Brahms in Hamburg just after Rubinstein had died. 'Christus,' Rubinstein's oratorio, was being performed. I was in raptures about the music. Brahms growled his dissent. 'Look here, Hans,' I shouted, 'I'm no Brahmsite, and I'm no Wagnerite. But I'll tell you one thing: I can put my finger on this place in your music and say it sounds like Wagner; on that place and say it sounds like Beethoven; on a third and say it sounds like Schumann, but I'll be damned if I can put my finger on any place in your music, or in anyone's else for that matter, and say it sounds like Rubinstein.'" Leschetizky roared with laughter at the remembrance. I did not ask what Brahms had said to him.

"How many pupils have you, meister?"

"About ninety, and they are all waiting for me to return to Vienna. I won't hurry though. I need the rest—and so do they."

"Do people pester you much with requests to play for you?"

"Indeed they do, but I have acquired a wonderful technic in disposing of them. Once I was badly caught. A girl came to play for me. I had to listen. She was bad. 'My dear child,' I said, 'the piano is a diffieult instrument. Let me try your voice.' She sang a few tones, and I advised her to study singing. 'You see,' I argued, 'singing is easy because you always have but the single tone. On the piano there are the bass, and the harmonies, and the double notes.' Quite content the girl left. Two years later a young woman forced her way into my house and insisted on singing for me. 'But I know nothing of the voice,' I protested. Without the loss of a moment she began to sing. She was bad. When she had finished I said: 'You see, singing is difficult. Absolute purity of tone is required. Now, why don't you study piano? That's easy. Each note is labeled C. D. E.' 'But you told me to study singing,' she said, tearfully. Merciful heavens, it was my pianist of two years before! Tableau!"

"Will wou tell me, meister, exactly of what the celebrated Leschetizky method consists?"

Leschetizky tiptoed to the door, peered through the keyhole, and turned the bolt and key. Then he fastened the windows, poked an umbrella up the chimney flue and pulled down the blinds. He beckoned me to the piano.

"My boy," he said, "I'll tell you. The Leschetizky method——"

Wou'dn't you like to know? That would be a cheap way of acquiring knowledge to buy this copy of THE MUSICAL COURIER for 10 cents. I intend to give lessons in the Leschetizky method now for $10 the minute. And I heard the grand old man of the piano play for over two hours. Fifteen dollars the minute will buy a lesson from me, with a full description thrown in of the impressions I received from Leschetizky's playing. The classes are now forming. There are an unlimited number of vacancies.

LEONARD LIEBLING.

Berlin Concerts.

The second Nikisch concert was a vast improvement over the first. Our good Philharmonikers always spend four months of every summer in Scheveningen (Holland), hard by the sea. There they make music daily, the sort of music that suits livers on the beach. They rollick through an overture or two, play and repeat Händel's Largo or Gounod's "Ave Maria," and are not above ending a program with a tuneful waltz by Strauss. The poor fellows need recreation after their arduous season here, and they make the most of their summer by the sea. They return to Berlin high in spirits and lax in rhythm. For a week or so the fun continues at the popular concerts, under Father Rebiczek's indulgent baton. Then along comes authoritative Mr. Nikisch from Leipsic, and with his iron will and firm beat he molds the orchestra into shape. This process was going on when we heard the first Philharmonic concert; at the second it was finished, and Nikisch had tuned and toned his instrument to his liking.

The Brahms Symphony in C minor was a superb performance. It would be hard to imagine a more suave and polished reading. Nikisch understands well how to smooth away rough edges and sharp corners.

Curiously enough, some of the German critics petulantly cry out against this very suavity and polish. Notably Dr. Schmidt, of the Tageblatt, wants his Brahms with the edges unsmoothed and the angles unplaned. A beautiful Brahms is no Brahms to the erudite Berlin critics. Whence comes the tradition, might I ask, that Brahms must be ugly in order to be correct? His own performances were no criterion. Persons who frequently heard him play and conduct his own works have told me that neither as a pianist nor as a leader did Brahms display the slightest interpretative ability. Some have even accused him of lack of musical taste.

Far be it from me to pose as an arbiter in this vexed question. The Berlin critics must know, for do they not know everything? But I cannot refrain from suggesting that some of these gentlemen, who are so ardent in their propaganda for the works of Brahms, might win many more friends for him from among the general public if they assured us less eagerly and less constantly of our utter inability to understand the cryptic Hamburg master. Music that can never be understood might as well never be written. There is nothing that our modern public does not understand; there is much that it understands only too well. It is by seeking and presenting the beauty in an art work that we win for it general understanding and lasting appreciation. Admiration of ugliness is perversion.

If Nikisch does not interpret Brahms properly, then there is no one in Berlin who can teach him.

The audience was evidently of my opinion, for it showered applause on Nikisch and his band after the last movement. Both were forced to repeated acknowledgments.

Nikisch is holding to his purpose of giving us one novelty at each concert. Last week the novelty was "Elaine and Launcelot," symphonic ballad, based on the versified tale of the same name by Tennyson.

Of the composer the program book said: "Anton Averkamp, born February 18, 1861, in Willige Langerok, Holland. Now living in Amsterdam, where he teaches singing and leads the 'Klein Koor a Capella.'"

Of our modern virtuosi we expect finger technic as a sine qua non; of our modern orchestral composers we expect technic in orchestration. Nearly all of them have it. We distinguish and rank them chiefly by the musical ideas for which the orchestral apparatus is set in motion.

Averkamp's musical ideas are pleasing, but not important. He lacks the power of characterization, the ability to suit the musical phrase to the word. That is a fatal defect in program music. To be sure a note informs us that "for those who do not wish a 'program' the poem need not exist." That only makes matters worse, for if the music does not illustrate the poem then why give the piece its suggestive title? Precisely that is my objection to the music. It might with equal propriety have been labeled "Calypso and Odyssey"; or "Heloïse and Abelard"; or "Adam and Eve"; or "Phædria and Thais"; or "Paris and Helen."

Averkamp's harmonization is Wagnerian. Whose is not, nowadays? The similarity was made even more evident by a slip of good taste on the part of Nikisch. He followed the "Elaine" ballad immediately with the Prelude and Love Death from "Tristan and Isolde."

Ysaye was to have been the soloist at this concert. He fell ill at the public rehearsal, and left the platform after playing very badly two movements of Beethoven's Violin Concerto. Ysaye generally falls ill when he is expected to play this work in Germany. We might almost exclaim with the comedian, "The first time it was an accident; the second time a coincidence; the third time a habit."

Fritz Kreisler was in town, and they asked him to play the Beethoven Concerto at the evening concert. Kreisler did not fall ill. He unpacked his fiddle, which he had hardly touched during a six months' summer vacation, and without a rehearsal he faced a vast audience that had hitherto regarded the classical concerto as the sacred p- vate property of Meister Joachim. Kreisler was aw- that to the critics here every tone was heavy with tra- tion, every measure hung with the cobwebs of conventi- But he played with courage and conviction, and it spe- well for his supreme musicianship and his personal m- netism that he conquered both critics and public. proved to us that a tone can be noble, yet sweet, and t- breadth can be attained without scraping, and sincerity expression without sawing. Some older pianists might find it difficult to imitate tender pathos with which the youthful virtuosa sang Quasi Adagio from Liszt's Concerto. In episodes f- this nature she was surprisingly mature. A melodi- Liszt-Mansfeldt transcription and Schumann's serious sharp Romanza revealed a nice appreciation of to- values. In the romantic Sauer Concerto Miss Al- knew well how to contrast effectively the two moveme- named respectively Allegro patetico and Larghetto an- roso.

The audience, among whom America was well rep- sented, applauded tirelessly, and after half a dozen calls compelled the future Carreño to add an encore.

Not the least artistic virtue about Alma Stencel is ter freedom from affectation, a fault as common in pre-cious children as it is disagreeable.

Perhaps for this, as well as for her musical accomplish-ents, praise is due Hugo Mansfeldt, of San Francisco, e teacher of Alma Stencel.
